SECOND SERIES

and Staff

This Second Series of Masterpieces of World Literature offers 500 additional sequence-by-sequence plot stories from the world's fine literature. Selected for popular as well as classic appeal, 1,010 summaries of well-known novels, dramas, poems and other works are now available in the complete series.

The same ready-reference format as that employed in the earlier volume has been retained. Information concerning type of work, authorship, type of plot, time of plot, locale, and date of first publication or presentation is clearly given. The principal characters and their relationships are listed separately for quick reference. The digests involve no editorializing; they are straightforward, readable outlines of the principal events, told in everyday language. A valuable feature of each digest is the critique, a short, incisive critical analysis of the original book. Printed in two columns for rapid reading, the plot stories are arranged in alphabetical order. A title index appears at the beginning of the book and an author index at the end.

PREFACE

THIS Second Series is an extension of the original Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form: a comprehensive collection of sequence-by-sequence plot stories from world literature, selected for popular as well as classic appeal. Summaries of 500 additional well-known literary works are included in this later series, condensations again having been prepared with the able assistance of a qualified and experienced staff. This brings to 1,010 the number of summaries in the complete series.

Planned as a further aid to busy people, the same ready-reference format as that employed in the First Series has been retained. Information concerning type of work, authorship, type of plot, time of plot, locale, and date of first publication or presentation is clearly given. The principal characters and their relationships are listed separately for quick reference, a feature which seems to be especially well received. Again critical comments have been confined to a critique, so that an element of cohesion is achieved in relating the plot story which otherwise would not be attained. Stories are arranged alphabetically by title, and there are two listings of the contents—a title index at the beginning, an author index at the end.

Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form is not the usual "reprint"; all the material it contains was written expressly for this book. As in the First Series, these résumés include no quotations from the works on which they are based, and no attempt has been made to re-create an original author's style. Summaries average about 1,500 words each but reach a length of 2,500 words in some cases.

Of major concern was the selection of the list of titles to be included in this new series. Titles for the First Series were chosen after consultations with scores of teachers of English and other qualified individuals. However, it was recognized that in limiting the original list to 510 titles, works had to be omitted which deserved attention and compared favorably with those retained on the list. This new series makes it possible to reinstate desirable titles which were crowded off the previous list and to encompass a wider area of literary achievement generally.

Consultations with specialists here and abroad have resulted in the inclusion of titles which are important but which are often overlooked when standard book lists are compiled. For example, a number of excellent but little-known Spanish and Latin-American works are represented, some of which have been translated into English only recently.

Interests and requirements vary, but almost any worth-while literary work will influence in some measure the writings which follow it and for this reason, a number of titles of historical significance were chosen regardless of whether they still enjoy a wide audience today. On the other hand, books written during the past fifty years usually are of greater interest to most readers today than are the works of earlier writers. Consequently, more than a third of the space in Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form is devoted to twentieth-century titles—368 of the 1,010 entries, to be exact.

As might be expected, novels predominate in the complete collection, accounting for more than two-thirds of the entries. Summaries of 682 novels, 215 dramas, 113 poems and miscellaneous categories appear in the entire series. But in the Second Series, a shift of emphasis away from the novel and in the direction of the older literary forms will be noted. Dramas account for only 51 of the titles in the First Series but 164 are included in the Second Series.

Many authors represented in the original series are also included in the Second Series, though more than half of the total number of authors in this later series are new to Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form. Two hundred eighty-nine authors are represented in the First Series; 325 authors have titles appearing in the Second Series. One hundred three of this number also appear in the First Series; 222 appear only in the Second Series. Thus, a total of 511 different authors are represented in the complete collection, 31 of whom are winners of the Nobel Prize in Literature. This wide author representation assures a broad range for the Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form series and adds much to its reference value.

As was the case during the preparation of the earlier series, the co-operation of certain authors, publishers, agents, and literary trustees was requested in connection with the work on the Second Series. Again, my requests were generously granted and I wish to acknowledge with thanks the assistance received from these sources. Copyright notices and credit lines appear as footnotes accompanying the appropriate titles.

Also, I wish to acknowledge with sincere thanks the able and cheerful assistance received from the many members of the staff engaged in compiling this set. Story Editor Dayton Kohler, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, whose work in editing individual stories has been so outstanding, is well aware of my appreciation for his performance. Others, too, have rendered invaluable service and I am most grateful to all for their aid.

PREFACE

Finally, I should like to express my appreciation to the many individuals who have taken time to convey in writing their favorable reactions to the First Series. I trust that this new series also will be of assistance and value to those concerned with the teaching, the study, or the sheer enjoyment of the world's fine literature.

Critique:

The Absentee, published in the second series of Miss Edgeworth's "Tales of Fashionable Life," is a novel of protest against the system of landlordism under which the owners of Irish estates disported themselves in fashionable London society while their tenants lived in misery and squalor, at the mercy of agents who were often unscrupulous and concerned only with their own interests. The Irish scenes of this novel are as fresh and vivid as those in the earlier Castle Rackrent, and the picture of London society, a world of thriftless absentees, wealthy snobs, fortune hunters, and match-making mothers, is excellent in critical and satirical detail. In this work the writer displayed a talent for caricature as well as deep regional feeling. Her vulgar Lady Clonbrony, Nicholas Garraghty, the dishonest agent, and Sir Terence O'Fay, an impecunious sponger, suggest later figures in the work of Surtees and Dickens.

The Story:

Lord Clonbrony was an absentee landlord. The owner of large but encumbered Irish estates, he lived in England because Lady Clonbrony, an extravagant, ambitious woman, would have nothing to do with Ireland or the Irish. People of wealth and position laughed at her and the silly determination with which she aped English manners and speech. Lord Clonbrony they ignored. A respected peer in Dublin and a good landlord when he had lived on his own estates, he was a nobody in his wife's fashionable world, and so he associated with questionable and dissipated companions like Sir Terence O'Fay. Little was known about Lord Colambre, the Clonbrony heir, except that he was a student at Cambridge and a young man of considerable expectations from a distant relative. A cousin, Grace Nugent, was well thought of because of her beauty and good manners.

Lady Clonbrony was anxious to have her son marry Miss Broadhurst, a young woman of much sense and large fortune. Although Lady Clonbrony and Mrs. Broadhurst did their best to promote the match, the young people, while friendly, were not drawn to each other, Lord Colambre because he was too much attracted by Grace's amiability and charm, Miss Broadhurst because she respected his feelings for his cousin.

In execution of a commission for Arthur Berryl, a Cambridge friend, Lord Colambre went to the establishment of Mr. Mordicai, a coachmaker and money-lender. There he overheard some talk which revealed that his father's financial affairs were not in good order. Questioned, Lord Clonbrony admitted that his situation was grave but that he relied on Sir Terence, often his intermediary with his creditors, to prevent legal action against him. The father reflected with some bitterness that there would be no need for such expediency if landowners would live on their own estates and kill their own mutton.

Lord Colambre saw for himself the results of reckless borrowing when Sir John Berryl, the father of his friend, was taken suddenly ill. Mordicai, demanding immediate payment of a large debt, attempted to have the sick man arrested and thrown into prison. Only Lord Colambre's presence and firm words of rebuff kept the money-lender from carrying out his intention. Mordicai left with threats that Lord Colambre would someday regret his insults. Sir John Berryl died that night, leaving his family almost penniless.

Deeply concerned for his own family's welfare, Lord Colambre decided to visit Ireland and see for himself the state of his father's affairs. Lady Clonbrony used every possible argument to dissuade her son, and Sir Terence suggested that the young man could best help his father by marrying a woman as wealthy as Miss Broadhurst. When Lord Colambre left suddenly for Ireland, his mother, refusing to give up her matrimonial plans for her son, allowed her friends to believe that he had gone to attend to private business in connection with his marriage settlement. Since many people expected him to marry Miss Broadhurst, that story satisfied the Clonbrony creditors for the time being.

Arriving in Dublin, Lord Colambre met Sir James Brooke, a British official well informed on Irish affairs, and the two men became good friends. The young nobleman, pleased with everything he heard and saw, was unable to understand his mother's detestation of the Irish. He tried to meet Nicholas Garraghty, his father's agent, but the man was away on business. Instead, he was entertained by the agent's sister, a silly, affected woman named Mrs. Raffarty.

He also met Lady Dashfort, who saw in him a possible husband for her widowed daughter, Lady Isabel. Although he heard no good reports of Lady Dashfort or her daughter, he became a frequent visitor in their home. At last, interested in securing an alliance for her daughter, Lady Dashfort proposed that he accompany her to Killpatrickstown, where she was going to visit Lord and Lady Killpatrick. It was her intention to show him Irish life at its worst, so that he would have no desire to live on the Clonbrony estates after his marriage to Lady Isabel. Aware of his affection for Grace, Lady Dashfort arranged matters so that Lady Killpatrick asked her to exhibit her genealogical table, which had been prepared as evidence in a lawsuit. She did so with seeming reluctance, on the grounds that she was ashamed of her remote connection with the scandalous St. Omars. She then revealed that Grace's mother had been a St. Omar.

Lord Colambre wrote to his mother to ask the truth. She replied that the girl's mother had been a St. Omar but that she had taken the name Reynolds after an affair with a gentleman of that name. When the Reynolds family refused to acknowledge her child, she had married a Mr. Nugent, who had generously given the daughter his own name. The young man realized that this disclosure put a bar between Grace and himself.

Through the Killpatricks, Lord Colambre met Count O'Halloran, regarded by his neighbors as an oddity because of his learning, his fondness for animals, and his liking for the Irish. When the count returned the visit, Lady Dashfort took issue with him because he criticized the improper conduct of an English officer with whom both were acquainted. Lady Dashfort's lack of good manners and moral sense, and the further revelation of Lady Isabel as a malicious flirt, showed the two women to Lord Colambre in their true light. He decided to leave the Dashforts and continue his tour alone.

Count O'Halloran prevailed upon him, however, to accompany that gentleman to Oranmore. There Lord Colambre found a family of taste and breeding, interested in affairs of the day and the welfare of their tenants. Stimulated by the example of Lord and Lady Oranmore, he planned to go immediately to his father's estate, but incognito, so that he could observe more accurately the conditions of the tenantry and the conduct of the estate agents.

He found the village of Colambre neat and prosperous, well looked after by Mr. Burke, the agent. After a dinner with the Burkes, the agent showed him over the estate with evident pride in all he had accomplished. He regretted, however, that the absentee owner took no interest in the land or the tenants, aside from the revenues derived from them. Burke's fears that Lord Clonbrony was displeased with his management were confirmed by the arrival of a letter in which his lordship dismissed the agent and directed him to turn over his accounts to Nicholas Garraghty.

Lord Colambre went next to Clonbrony. From a driver he learned that the tenants hated and feared Nicholas Garraghty, the factor, and Dennis Garraghty, his brother and assistant. The carriage breaking down, Lord Colambre spent the night with Mrs. O'Neill, a widow whose niece had been named after Grace Nugent. The next day the young nobleman was present when Dennis Garraghty refused to renew a lease promised to Mrs. O'Neill's son Brian. The arrival of Mrs. Raffarty and her identification of Lord Colambre caused Garraghty quickly to change his mind. Disgusted by the man's methods of doing business and by the unkempt, poverty-stricken appearance of the village, Lord Colambre wrote to his father and asked him to have no further dealings with the Garraghtys.

During the voyage back to England Lord Colambre's ship was delayed by a storm, so that the Garraghtys arrived in London ahead of him. He returned, however, in time to confront the agent and his brother with a report on their transactions. Hearing his son's story, Lord Clonbrony would have dismissed them on the spot if he had possessed the cash necessary to settle their entangled accounts. Lord Colambre then asked his father and Sir Terence for a full accounting of the distressed nobleman's obligations. In return, he proposed to settle the debt with the inheritance he would receive when he came of age, a date only a few days off, if his father would end all business relations with the Garraghtys and go to Ireland to live. Lord Clonbrony welcomed the proposal, but his wife, when she heard of it, treated the idea with scorn. She was already displeased with her son because he had not pressed his suit upon Miss Broadhurst and the heiress was to marry his friend, Sir Arthur Berryl. When Lord Colambre expressed pleasure over his friend's good fortune, Lady Clonbrony retired in disgust.

Under persuasion by every member of her family, Lady Clonbrony at last ungraciously agreed to return to Ireland. Meanwhile Lord Colambre, busy with his father's accounts, discovered that many of the London bills had been deliberately overcharged and that Nicholas Garraghty was in reality his lordship's debtor, not his creditor, as the agent had claimed. With some ready money sent by Lady Berryl, the former Miss Broadhurst, through her husband, Lord Colambre was able to settle his father's most pressing debts and Sir Terence was able to reclaim Mordicai's bond at a discount. Garraghty having been dismissed in disgrace, Mr. Burke was appointed agent of the Colambre and Clonbrony estates.

On the day he came of age Lord Colambre's first duty was to execute a bond for five thousand pounds in Grace's name, that amount of her own inheritance having been lent to her guardian years before. The young man's secret regret was that he could not offer his heart with his cousin's restored property.

Count O'Halloran, arriving in London, called on Lord Colambre. When the young nobleman confided his true feelings for Grace and told his friend something of her story, the count recalled a Captain Reynolds whom he had known in Austria. Dying, the officer had told of his secret marriage with a Miss St. Omar and had entrusted to the count a packet of private papers, among them a marriage certificate. The count had given the papers to the English ambassador and they had passed in turn into the keeping of Sir James Brooke, the executor of the ambassador's estate. Acting on this information, Lord Colambre went to Sir James and obtained the papers, which had never been carefully examined. When he presented them to the dead officer's father, old Mr. Reynolds accepted with delight the proof of his granddaughter's legitimacy and declared his intention to make her his heiress. Because Grace had never known of the shadow cast on her birth, Lady Berryl was delegated to tell her the whole story, a task which that friendly young woman performed with great delicacy and tact.

Acquainted with the true state of affairs, Lady Clonbrony offered no objections to her son's marriage with Grace. Lord Clonbrony and his wife returned to Ireland and there, in due time, Grace became Viscountess Colambre, much to the satisfaction of Lady Clonbrony, who saw so happily fulfilled her hopes that her son would marry an heiress.

AGAINST THE GRAIN

Author: Joris Karl Huysmans (Charles Marie Georges Huysmans, 1848-1907)

Type of plot: Exotic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1884

Principal character:

JEAN DES ESSEINTES, an aesthete

Critique:

Huysmans, profoundly influenced by Baudelaire and Mallarmé, is perhaps the outstanding prose writer of the decadent school. His writing has the characteristics of the movement: detailed, sensuous description and precise, erudite vocabulary. Against the Grain (À Rebours) is a novel in which almost nothing happens; what one learns of the action is through retrospect. Most of the book is concerned with the hero's library, his taste in interior decoration, his illusions, and the complete decadence which stems directly from his conception of Catholicism.

The Story:

The Des Esseintes were an old family. In the Chateau de Lourps the portraits of the ancestors were those of rugged troopers and stern cavalry men. But the family had followed a familiar pattern; through two hundred years of intermarriage and soft indulgence the men had become increasingly effeminate. Now the only remaining Des Esseintes was Jean, a man of thirty. By a kind of atavism, Jean resembled in looks his first grandsire. The resemblance was in looks only.

Jean had had an unhappy childhood. His father, living in Paris most of the time, visited Jean briefly at school once in a while when he wished to give moral counsel. Occasionally he went to see his wife at the chateau. Jean was always present at those hushed interviews in which his mother took little interest. Jean's mother had a strange dread of light. Passing her days in her shaded boudoir, she avoided contact with the world.

At the Jesuit school Jean became a precocious student of Latin and acquired a fair knowledge of theology. At the same time he was a stubborn, withdrawn child who refused all discipline. The patient fathers let him follow his own bent, for there was little else they could do. Both his parents died while he was young; at his majority he came into complete control of his inheritance.

In his contacts with the world Jean went through two phases. At first he lived a wild, dissolute life. For a time he was content with ordinary mistresses. His first love was Miss Urania, an American acrobat. Because she was strong and healthy Jean yearned for her as an anemic young girl might long for a Hercules. But Miss Urania was quite feminine, even prudish in her embraces. Their liaison prematurely hastened his impotence.

Another mistress was a brunette ventriloquist. One day he purchased a tiny black sphinx and a chimera of polychrome clay. Bringing them into the bedroom, he prevailed on her to imitate Flaubert's famous dialogue between the Sphinx and the Chimera. His mistress, however, was sulky at having to perform offstage.

After that phase Jean began to be disgusted with people. He saw that men brought up in parochial schools, as he was, were timid and boring. Men who had been educated in the public schools were more courageous but even more boring. In a frantic effort to find companionship, he wildly sought out the most carnal pastimes and the most perverted pleasures.

Jean had never been strong, and from childhood he had been afflicted with scrofula. Now his nerves grew weaker. The back of his neck always pained him; his hand trembled when he lifted a light object. In a burst of despairing eccentricity he gave a farewell dinner to his lost virility. The meal was served on a black table to the sound of funeral marches. The waitresses were nude Negresses. The plates were edged in black; the menu included dark bread, meat with licorice sauce, and wine served in dark glasses.

At thirty Jean decided to withdraw from the world. Having concluded that artistry was much superior to nature, he vowed that in his retreat he would be completely artificial. He found a suitable house in a remote suburb of Paris and made elaborate preparations for his retirement.

The upper floor was given over to his two elderly servants, who had to wear felt coverings on their shoes at all times. The downstairs he reserved for himself. The walls were paneled in leather like book binding, and the only color for ceilings and trim was deep orange. In his dining-room he simulated a ship's cabin and installed aquariums in front of the windows. The study was lined with precious books. With great art he contrived a luxurious bedroom which looked monastically simple.

Among his paintings Jean treasured two works of Moreau which depicted Salomé and the head of John the Baptist. He pondered long over the meaning of the scenes. History being silent on the personality of Salomé, Jean decided that Moreau had recreated her perfectly. To him she was the incarnation of woman.

His library was his chief concern. Among the Latin writers he had no love for the classicists: Vergil, for example, he found incredibly dull. But he took great delight in Petronius, who had brought to life Roman decadence under Nero. He loved ardently a few of the French sensualists, Verlaine and Baudelaire among them. He had also a small collection of obscure Catholic writers whose refinement and disdain for the world suited his own temperament.

For months his life was regular and satisfying. He breakfasted at five and dined at eleven. About dawn he had his supper and went to bed. Because of his weak stomach he was most abstemious in his diet.

After a time his old ailments came back to plague him. He could eat or drink very little and his nerves pained him. After weeks of torture he fainted. When his servants found him, they called a neighborhood doctor who could do little for him. At last Jean seemed to recover, and he scolded the servants for having been so concerned. With sudden energy he made plans to take a trip to England.

His luggage having been packed, he took a cab into Paris. To while away the hours before train time, he visited a wine cellar frequented by English tourists and had dinner at an English restaurant. Realizing afresh that the pleasure of travel lies only in the anticipation, he had himself driven home that same evening and thus avoided the banality of actually going somewhere.

At one stage of his life Jean had loved artificial flowers. Now he came to see that it would be more satisfying to have real flowers that looked artificial. He promptly amassed a collection of misshapen, coarse plants that satisfied his aesthetic needs.

But Jean's energy soon dissipated. His hands trembled, his neck pained him, and his stomach refused food. For weeks he dreamed away his days in a half-stupor. Thinking of his past, he was shocked to realize that his wish to withdraw from the world was a vestige of his education under the Jesuits. Finally he became prey to hallucinations. He smelled unaccountable odors, and strange women kept him company.

One day he was horrified to look into his mirror. His wasted face seemed that of a stranger. He sent for a doctor from Paris. After the physician had given him injections of peptone, Jean returned to something like normal. Gradually the doctor began injecting cod liver oil and other nourishing food into his veins. For a while Jean was entranced with the notion of getting all his sustenance through injections. One more activity would thus be unnecessary.

Then the doctor sent his little artificial world crashing; he ordered Jean to leave his retreat and go live a normal social life in Paris. Otherwise his patient would be in danger of death or at least of a protracted illness with tuberculosis. Jean, more afraid of his illness than he was of the stupid world, gave the necessary orders and glumly watched the movers begin their work.

AJAX, a Greek warrior

ODYSSEUS, a Greek leader

TECMESSA, Ajax's female captive

TEUCER, Ajax's half-brother

EURYSACES, son of Ajax and Tecmessa

Critique:

The age-old problem of individual versus group prerogative is masterfully presented in this play. One finds it tempting to sympathize with Ajax for his devotion to his consort and his son, the love and admiration he commands from his followers, and the courage he displays before the walls of Troy. It is inevitable, however, that his ungovernable pride should bring about his ruin. His downfall, the tragic hero's dissolution as a man because of unbearable humiliation and shame, is one of the most touching and disturbing in literature. Sophocles achieved this terrible spectacle by unusual cogency of action, a remarkable delineation of character, and a judicious point of view.

The Story:

Odysseus, chosen by Greek leaders in the Trojan War to replace the dead Achilles as the chief warrior of the Greek forces, paced up and down before the tent of Ajax, who had been slighted by the selection of Odysseus. The goddess Athena, appearing above the tent, told Odysseus that Ajax, covered with blood, was in his tent. Her words confirmed Odysseus' suspicions that it had indeed been Ajax who had slaughtered all of the Greeks' livestock and their shepherd dogs. Athena explained that she had cast a spell over Ajax, who, in his hurt pride, had vowed to murder Menelaus and Agamemnon, the Greek commanders, as well as Odysseus. Under her spell Ajax had committed the horrible slaughter in the belief that the animals he slew were the hated leaders who had opposed his election to the place of the late Achilles.

When Tecmessa, Ajax's Phrygian captive, revealed to his followers what the great warrior had done, they lamented his downfall and questioned the dark purposes of the gods. Certain that Ajax would be condemned to die for his transgressions, his warriors prepared to retire to their ships and return to Salamis, their homeland.

Ajax, recovered from the spell, emerged from his tent and clearly revealed to his friends that he was a shamed and broken man. Sick in mind at the thought of the taunts of Odysseus, he wished only to die. Even in his abject misery, however, he was sure that had Achilles personally chosen his successor he would have named Ajax. The despairing man tried to find some means of escape from the consequences of his deed. The alternative to death was to return to Salamis and his noble father, Telamon; but he knew that he could never shame Telamon by facing him. His friends, alarmed at his deep gloom and sensing tragedy, advised him to reflect; Tecmessa urged him to live for her sake and for the sake of their little son, Eurysaces. At the mention of the name of his beloved son, Ajax called for the boy. Solemnly he gave Eurysaces his great shield and directed that the child be taken to Salamis, so that he might grow up to avenge his father's disgrace. After dismissing Tecmessa and his son, he remained in his tent alone to clear his troubled thoughts. His followers, meanwhile, resumed their lament over their disgraced leader.

Apparently reconciled to his fate, Ajax emerged at last from his tent and declared that he was ready to recognize authority, to revere the gods, and to bury his sword with which he had brought disgrace and dishonor upon himself. His decision, he said, had been dictated by his affection for Tecmessa and Eurysaces. This apparent change brought forth cheers of rejoicing from his countrymen; they thanked the gods for what appeared to be Ajax's salvation.

In the meantime the Greeks taunted Teucer, Ajax's half-brother, for his kinship with one demented. Calchas, the Greek prophet, warned Teucer that unless Ajax were kept in his tent a full day, no one would again see Ajax alive, since the proud warrior had twice offended the goddess Athena in the past. But Ajax had already left his tent in order to bury his sword. Teucer and the men of Salamis, in alarm, hastened in search of their leader.

Ajax planted his sword, a gift from Hector, the great Trojan warrior, hilt-down in the earth. After he had asked the gods to inform Teucer of his whereabouts so that he might receive a proper burial, he fell upon his sword. Heavy underbrush partly concealed his body where it lay.

Tecmessa was the first to discover her dead lord; in sorrow she covered him with her mantle. Teucer was summoned. Tecmessa and the men of Salamis could not refrain from mentioning the dire part played by Athena in the tragedy of Ajax and the pleasure Menelaus and Agamemnon would feel when they heard of Ajax's death. Fearing foul play, Teucer ordered Tecmessa to bring Eurysaces immediately. Teucer himself was in a dilemma. He knew that the Greeks detested him because of his kinship with Ajax. He feared also that Telamon would suspect him of being responsible for Ajax's death, so that he might be Telamon's heir.

While Teucer pondered his own fate, Menelaus appeared and told him that Ajax could not receive proper burial because he had been a rebel, offensive to the gods. Teucer maintained that Ajax had not been subject to Spartan Menelaus, nor to anyone else, for he had come to Troy voluntarily at the head of his own men from Salamis; therefore he deserved burial. Seeing that Teucer held firm, Menelaus went away. Teucer dug a grave while Tecmessa and Eurysaces stood vigil over the body. The men of Salamis sang a dirge over their dead leader.

Agamemnon, King of Mycenae, appeared and rebuked Teucer, the son of a slave, for his audacity in defying the will of Menelaus. Agamemnon insulted the memory of Ajax by saying that he had been stronger than he was wise. Teucer, bitterly recalling Ajax's many heroic deeds in behalf of the Greek cause, reminded Agamemnon of the many blots on the escutcheon of the Atridae, Agamemnon's royal house. Teucer defended his own blood by pointing out that although his mother, Hesione, was a captive, she was nevertheless of noble birth.

Odysseus resolved the dispute by declaring that no Greek warrior should be denied burial. He himself had hated Ajax, but he admitted that Ajax had been both noble and courageous. He shook hands with Teucer in friendship, but Teucer, lest the gods be offended, refused his offer to assist in the burial. Thus Ajax, whose pride had brought him to an early death, received proper burial and the death ceremonies of a warrior hero.

DOL COMMON, their partner
LOVEWIT, owner of the house and Face's master
SIR EPICURE MAMMON, a greedy knight
DAME PLIANT, a young widow

Critique:

The Alchemist marked the peak of Ben Jonson's artistic career. Despite a somewhat huddled denouement, the play is a masterpiece of construction. As far as is known, the plot—which Samuel Taylor Coleridge declared one of the three most perfect in existence, the other two being Sophocles' Oedipus the King and Fielding's Tom Jones—was original with Jonson. In this play, Jonson, the artist superseded Jonson the moralist: as a highly entertaining and dramatic satire on human greed, The Alchemist displays none of the sermonizing which marks, more or less, Jonson's other plays.

The Story:

Master Lovewit having left the city because of plague, his butler, Jeremy, known as Face to his friends of the underworld, invited Subtle, a swindler posing as an alchemist, and Dol Common, a prostitute, to join him in using the house as a base of operations for their rascally activities. Matters fared well for the three until a dispute arose between Face and Subtle over authority. Dol, seeing their moneymaking projects doomed if this strife continued, rebuked the two men and cajoled them back to their senses.

No sooner had Face and Subtle become reconciled than Dapper, a gullible lawyer's clerk given to gambling, called, by previous arrangement with Face, to learn from the eminent astrologer, Doctor Subtle, how to win at all games of chance. Dapper, in the hands of the two merciless rascals, was relieved of all his ready cash, in return for which Subtle predicted that Dapper would have good luck at the gaming tables. In order to gull Dapper further, Subtle told him to return later to confer with the Queen of Fairy, a mysterious benefactress who could promote Dapper's worldly success.

Abel Druggier, an ambitious young druggist who had been led on by Face, was the next victim to enter the house. To his delight, he learned from Subtle, who spoke in incomprehensible pharmaceutical and astrological jargon, that he would have a rich future.

Next arrived Sir Epicure Mammon, a greedy and lecherous knight, with his friend Pertinax Surly, a man versed in the ways of London confidence men. Having been promised the philosopher's stone by Subtle, Mammon had wild visions of transforming all of his possessions into gold and silver, but he was completely taken in by the duplicities of Subtle and Face. Subtle further aroused Mammon's greed by describing at length, in the pseudo-scientific gibberish of the alchemist-confidence man, the processes which led to his approximate achievement of the mythical philosopher's stone. Surly, quick to see what was afoot, scoffed at Subtle and at the folly of Mammon.

During the interview Mammon caught sight of Dol, who appeared inadvertently, and was fascinated. Thinking quickly, Face told Mammon that Dol was an aristocratic lady who, being mad, was under the care of Doctor Subtle but who in her moments of sanity was most affable. Before he left the house Mammon promised to send to the unprincipled Subtle certain of his household objects of base metal for the purpose of having them transmuted into gold.

The parade of victims continued. Elder Ananias of the Amsterdam community of extreme Protestants came to negotiate for his group with Subtle for the philosopher's stone. Subtle, with Face as his assistant, repeated his extravagant jargon to the impressionable Ananias, who, in his greed, declared that the brethren were impatient with the slowness of the experiment. Subtle, feigning professional indignation, frightened Ananias with a threat to put out forever his alchemist's fire.

Drugger reappeared to be duped further. Subtle and Face were delighted when he told them that a wealthy young widow had taken lodgings near his and that her brother, just come into an inheritance, had journeyed to London to learn how to quarrel in rakish fashion. The two knaves plotted eagerly to get brother and sister into their clutches.

Ananias returned with his pastor, Tribulation Wholesome. Both Puritans managed to wink at moral considerations as Subtle glowingly described the near completion of the philosopher's stone. Prepared to go to any ends to procure the stone, Ananias and Tribulation contracted to purchase Mammon's household articles, which, Subtle explained, he needed for the experiment; the proceeds of the sale would go toward the care of orphans for whom Subtle said he was responsible.

Subtle and Face also plotted to sell these same household articles to the young widow, who, having just moved to London, was probably in need of such items. In the meantime Face met in the streets a Spanish Don—Surly in clever disguise—who expressed a desire to confer with Subtle on matters of business and health.

Dapper returned to meet the Queen of Fairy. At the same time Drugger brought to the house Master Kastril, the angry young man who would learn to quarrel. Kastril was completely taken in. Subtle, promising to make him a perfect London gallant, arranged to have him instructed by Face, who posed as a city captain. Kastril was so pleased with his new acquaintances that he sent Drugger to bring his sister to the house.

Kastril having departed, Dol, Subtle, and Face relieved Dapper of all of his money in a ridiculous ritual in which Dapper was to see and talk to the Queen of Fairy. During the shameless proceedings Mammon knocked. Dapper, who had been blindfolded, was gagged and hastily put into a water closet at the rear of the house. Mammon entered and began to woo Dol, whom he believed to be a distracted aristocratic lady. Face and Subtle, in order to have the front part of the house clear for further swindles, shunted the amorous pair to another part of the house.

Young Kastril returned with his widowed sister, Dame Pliant; both were deeply impressed by Subtle's manner and by his rhetoric. When the Spanish Don arrived, Subtle escorted Kastril and Dame Pliant to inspect his laboratory. By that time both Subtle and Face were determined to wed Dame Pliant.

Face introduced the Spaniard to Dame Pliant, who, in spite of her objections to Spaniards in general, consented to walk in the garden with the Don.

Meanwhile, in another part of the house, Dol assumed madness. Subtle, discovering the distraught Mammon with her, declared that Mammon's moral laxity would surely delay completion of the philosopher's stone. Following a loud explosion, Face reported that the laboratory was a shambles. Mammon despondently left the house, and Subtle simulated a fainting spell.

In the garden Surly revealed his true identity to Dame Pliant and warned the young widow against the swindlers. When, as Surly, he confronted the two rogues, Face, in desperation, told Kastril that Surly was an impostor who was trying to steal Dame Pliant away. Drugger entered and, being Face's creature, insisted that he knew Surly to be a scoundrel. Then Ananias came to the house and all but wrecked Subtle's plot by talking indiscreetly of making counterfeit money. Unable to cope with the wily rascals, Surly departed, followed by Kastril.

Glad to be rid of his callers, Subtle placed Dame Pliant in Dol's care. But they were once more thrown into confusion when Lovewit, owner of the house, made an untimely appearance. Face, quickly reverting to his normal role of Jeremy, the butler, went to the door in an attempt to detain his master long enough to permit Subtle and Dol to escape.

Although warned by his butler that the house was infested, Lovewit suspected that something was amiss when Mammon and Surly returned to expose Subtle and Face. Kastril, Ananias, and Tribulation confirmed their account. Dapper, having managed to get rid of his gag, cried out inside the house. Deciding that honesty was the only policy, Face confessed everything to his master and promised to provide him with a wealthy young widow as his wife, if Lovewit would have mercy on his servant.

In the house, meanwhile, Subtle concluded the gulling of Dapper and sent the young clerk on his way, filled with the belief that he would win at all games of chance. Subtle and Dol then tried to abscond with the threesome's loot, but Face, back in Lovewit's good graces, thwarted them in their attempt. They were forced to escape empty-handed by the back gate.

Lovewit won the hand of Dame Pliant and in his good humor forgave his crafty butler. When those who had been swindled demanded retribution, they were finally convinced that they had been mulcted as a result of their own selfishness and greed.

ALL FOR LOVE

Type of work: Drama

MARK ANTONY, one of the Roman triumvirate

VENTIDIUS, his faithful general

DOLABELLA, Antony's friend

OCTAVIA, Antony's wife

CLEOPATRA, Queen of Egypt

ALEXAS, Cleopatra's eunuch

Critique.

Having written rhymed heroic dramatic verse with great success, Dryden turned to a study of Shakespeare and other great playwrights of the English Renaissance. He had only admiration for Shakespeare's great tragedies, but, influenced by the French neo-classicists, he felt that the Elizabethan playwrights had not shown sufficient discipline in construction or in the observance of the classical unities of time, place, and action. All for Love, Or, The World Well Lost, his answer as it were to these shortcomings, is an adaptation in the neo-classic manner—but not uncomfortably so—of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. Dryden's Antony occasionally slips into pompous rhetoric, however, and his Cleopatra never becomes the exciting personality of Shakespeare's Egyptian queen. Unity of action, unity of place, dignity of expression, and well-conceived characters especially mark this play as a great piece of dramatic literature. The difference between All for Love and Antony and Cleopatra is not simply the difference between Dryden and Shakespeare; Dryden excelled himself here.

The Story:

After his humiliating defeat at Actium, Mark Antony retired to Alexandria, Egypt, where he remained in seclusion for some time in the temple of Isis. He avoided meeting his mistress, Cleopatra, the Queen of Egypt, whose cowardice had largely caused the defeat. Meanwhile the Romans, under Octavius, Maecenas, and Agrippa, had invaded Egypt, where, having laid siege to Alexandria, they calmly awaited Antony's next move.

Serapion, a patriot and a priest of Isis, became alarmed at a sudden rising of the Nile and by prodigious disturbances among the royal tombs; these events seemed to presage disaster for Egypt.

Ventidius, Antony's trusted and highly successful general in the Middle East, came at this time to Alexandria to aid his commander. Serapion and Alexas, Cleopatra's loyal, scheming eunuch, tried to encourage citizens and troops with a splendid birthday festival in Antony's honor. Ventidius, in Roman fashion, scorned the celebration. He told Antony's Roman soldiers not to rejoice, but to prepare to defend Antony in his peril.

Antony, clearly a ruined man, at last came out of his seclusion. While he cursed his fate and lamented the day that he was born, Ventidius, in concealment, overheard the pitiful words of his emperor. Revealing his presence, he attempted to console Antony. Both men wept; Antony marveled that Ventidius could remain faithful to a leader who had brought a large part of the Roman Empire to ruin through his love for Cleopatra.

Ventidius offered to Antony his twelve legions, which were stationed in Lower Syria, but his stipulation that these legions would not fight for Cleopatra plunged doting Antony into renewed gloom. When Ventidius mentioned the name of Cleopatra lightly, Antony took offense and cursed the general as a traitor. After this insult Antony, his mind filled with misgivings, guilt, and indecision, hastened to assure Ventidius of his love for him. He promised to leave Cleopatra to join the legions in Syria.

The word that Antony was preparing to desert her left Cleopatra in a mood of anger and despair. Meanwhile Charmion, her maid, went to Antony and begged the Roman to say farewell to her mistress. Antony refused, saying that he did not dare trust himself in Cleopatra's presence.

Not daunted by Antony's refusal, Alexas then intercepted him as he marched out of Alexandria. The eunuch flattered the Romans and presented them with rich jewels from Cleopatra. As Antony was with difficulty clasping a bracelet around his arm, Cleopatra made her prepared appearance. Antony bitterly accused her of falseness and of being the cause of his downfall. The two argued. In desperation, Cleopatra told Antony that as her friend he must go to Syria, but that as her lover he must stay in Alexandria to share her fate. Antony wavered in his determination to leave when Cleopatra told him that she had spurned Octavius' offer of all Egypt and Syria if she would join his forces, and he elected to stay when she represented herself as a weak woman left to the mercy of the cruel invaders. Antony declared, in surrendering again to Cleopatra's charms, that Octavius could have the world as long as he had Cleopatra's love. Ventidius was overcome with shame and pity at Antony's submission.

Cleopatra was triumphant in her renewed power over Antony, and Antony himself seemed to have recovered some of his former magnificence when he was successful in minor engagements against the troops of Octavius. While Octavius, biding his time, held his main forces in check, Ventidius, still hopeful of saving Antony, suggested that a compromise might be arranged with Maecenas or with Agrippa.

Dolabella, the friend whom Antony had banished because he feared that Cleopatra might grow to love the young Roman, came from Octavius' camp to remind Antony that he had obligations toward his wife and two daughters. Then Octavia and her two young daughters were brought before Antony, Octavia, in spite of Antony's desertion, still hoping for reconciliation with her husband. When Antony accused her of bargaining with her brother Octavius, Octavia, undismayed, admitted that Octavius was prepared to withdraw from Egypt at the news that a reconciliation had been effected between his sister and Antony. Octavia's calm dignity affected Antony greatly, and when his two small daughters embraced him, he declared himself ready to submit to the will of Octavia. Cleopatra, entering upon this family reunion, exchanged insults with the momentarily triumphant Octavia.

Still afraid to face Cleopatra for the last time, Antony prevailed upon Dolabella to speak his farewell to Cleopatra. Dolabella, aspiring to Cleopatra's favors, accepted the mission with pleasure. But Alexas, knowing of Dolabella's weakness and ever solicitous of the welfare of Egypt, advised Cleopatra to excite Antony's jealousy by pretending to be interested in Dolabella. After Ventidius and Octavia had secretly overheard the conversation between Dolabella and Cleopatra, Ventidius, now unwittingly a tool of Alexas, reported to Antony Cleopatra's apparent interest in the young Dolabella. Octavia confirmed his report, and Alexas suggested to the raging Antony that Cleopatra was capable of perfidy. Antony's passionate reaction to this information convinced Octavia that her mission was a failure and she returned to the Roman camp. Antony, meanwhile, accused Cleopatra and Dolabella of treachery. Ignoring their earnest denials, he banished them from his presence.

Cleopatra, cursing the eunuch's ill advice, attempted unsuccessfully to take her own life with a dagger. Antony ascended a tower in Alexandria harbor to watch an impending naval engagement between the Egyptian and Roman fleets. To his horror he saw the two fleets join and the entire force advance to attack the city. Antony realized now that his end was near; furthermore, his heart was broken by the belief that Cleopatra was responsible for the treachery of the Egyptian fleet. When Alexas brought false word that Cleopatra had retired to her tomb and had taken her life, Antony, no longer desiring to live, fell on his own sword. The faithful Ventidius killed himself. Cleopatra came to the dying Antony and convinced him, before he died, that she had remained steadfast in her love for him. Then, to cheat Octavius of a final triumph, she dressed herself in her royal robes and permitted herself to be bitten by a poisonous asp. Her maids, Iras and Charmion, killed themselves in the same manner. Serapion entered to find that Cleopatra had joined her Antony in death.

tences, this outstanding book makes clear the common soldier's reactions to shell-fire, hunger, fear, sickness, and danger. There is no show of heroism in the story. Yet the hero, Paul Bäumer, engenders the essence of heroism. He is symbolic of any boy who must become a soldier.

The Story:

Just out of school, little more than nineteen years old, Paul Bäumer and his companions were in the front lines of the army. Albert Kropp, Müller, Leer, Tjaden, Haie Westhus, the farmer Deterring, and Stanislaus Kaczinsky, called Kat, the forty-year-old food plunderer, were part of the second company in the front lines, where Corporal Himmelstoss contrived cruel and inhuman assignments and punishments for his men. Tjaden hated him a little more than the others did. Kemmerich had his leg shot off. When he died, Müller got his boots.

The boys wanted to get back at Himmelstoss, but they knew that it would do them no good to complain about him. One night, when they caught Himmelstoss alone, they threw a sheet over his head and gave him a sound thrashing. Tjaden never forgot his own satisfaction in that accomplishment.

During the bombardments Paul saw men cry like babies or do other things for which they were later ashamed. When the trenches were quiet the men sat in groups talking about what they would do when the war ended. Paul always felt bewildered during such discussions because, having been drafted so young, he had no occupation to which he could return.

Himmelstoss was reprimanded for his treatment of the men, and they knew about it. They could not directly disobey him because that would be insubordination, but they could jeer at him and insult him. Tjaden was called before a court-martial for his insults, and given a three-day open confinement. He thought his punishment worth the pleasure of insulting the corporal.

The company moved closer to the front. At first the men sat in the trench and waited, fighting rats and playing cards. The recruits were frightened, and Paul and the old-timers kept an eye on them. One young recruit went mad and climbed out of the trench; he had to be tied down to keep him from committing suicide. There was a retreat and then another attack, with the trenches nearly flattened under the bombardment. After one attack a man lay dying somewhere on the field. They could hear his cries but could not find him. When the second company was relieved, there were only thirty-two men left from the original company of two hundred.

Relief came to Paul and the others. Good food and rest was all they needed. They met some friendly French girls. At night they took food with them for a bribe and sneaked across the river to the girls' house. The girls helped them to forget the war.

Paul was given a fourteen-day leave. He went home to see his sister Erna and his mother, who was sick in bed. His mother had saved from her own small rations his favorite food. He felt strange there in his home. Erna told him that their mother had cancer. One day he met in the street an officer who demanded a salute. Paul went home and took off his uniform. People asked too many questions about the war, questions which he could not answer.

At the end of his leave Paul went to a training camp for four weeks. On his last Sunday in the camp Paul's father and sister came to see him. They told him that his mother was in the hospital.

Finding his old company, Paul anxiously looked for his comrades. He found Kat, Tjaden, and Kropp. Haie had been killed. Paul shared with his friends the moldy cake he had brought from home. The men were given new uniforms. They had periods of extra drill. It was rumored that they were going to Russia. Then they heard that the kaiser was coming. After he inspected them and had watched a review, the new uniforms were taken from the men.

During an attack Paul found himself alone in a shell hole. Panicky and lonely, he crawled out of the hole to find his friends. Caught by machine-gun fire, he crawled into another hole. When a French soldier leaped into the hole, Paul stabbed him. After what seemed many hours Paul noticed that the man was still alive. He tried to relieve the dying man's pain. After the man died, Paul's conscience tormented him. When he was able to crawl from the shell hole, he found Müller and Kat, who fed him and comforted him by telling him that he had committed no crime.

Paul, Kat, Müller, Albert, and Tjaden were detailed to guard a heavily bombarded village where an important supply dump was located. They spent three weeks eating, drinking, and wandering about. Enemy fire continued to molest them. Albert and Paul were wounded. In the hospital they bribed a doctor to let them stay together. They were taken to a Catholic hospital, where the cleanliness almost made Paul sick. His broken leg refused to heal. Albert lost his leg. After a while Paul was able to hobble around on crutches, but he could not bear Albert's jealous gaze. Paul recovered and went home for a short while. His mother was still living. Soon he returned to his company.

The war dragged on. Müller was killed and Paul inherited Kemmerich's boots. Dysentery, typhus, influenza, and violent death dogged them constantly. Kat was wounded while he and Paul were in a trench together. Paul carried his friend through the lines. Just as he brought him to safety, Kat was killed when a piece of shrapnel struck him in the head.

The summer of 1918 passed. Paul was lonely and philosophical. He stayed in a convalescent ward after he had been slightly gassed. The meaning of the war loomed dismally before him. No one will ever know, he thought, what the war had done to him and the other soldiers.

In October, 1918, on a day when the army communiqué reported that all was quiet on the western front, a stray bullet hit Paul, and he died.

All the King's Men, after a sluggish beginning, races smoothly to its inevitable ending. Warren's literary style is excellent. It is so good that the reader is likely to regret reaching the final pages of the book. Although the rise of Willie Stark is ostensibly the theme of the novel, the real issue is the character of Jack Burden, a caustic-tongued, brilliant journalist, whose self-examination becomes a symbol of the era that is treated in the book. From the opening description of Sugar Boy's drive through the country highway until the last pages when Jack Burden realizes his self-destruction and, phoenix-like, rises from the ruins of his past to make a new life with Anne Stanton, the plot is gripping and real.

The Story:

When Governor Willie Stark tried to intimidate old Judge Irwin of Burden's Landing, the judge stood firm against the demagogue's threats. As a result, Willie ordered Jack Burden to find some scandal in the judge's past that could ruin the elderly man.

Jack had met Willie back in 1922, when Willie, the county treasurer, and Lucy Stark, his schoolteacher wife, were fighting against a corrupt building contractor who was constructing the new schoolhouse. Sent by his newspaper, the Chronicle, to investigate, Jack found Willie and Lucy both out of jobs but still fighting against graft. Two years later the fire escape of the school collapsed during a fire drill and Willie became a hero.

Willie then ran in the Democratic primary race for governor. There were two factions, those of Harrison and MacMurfee. Because it was to be a close election, someone proposed that Willie be used as a dummy candidate to split the rural MacMurfee followers. Tiny Duffy and some other men convinced Willie that he could save the state. By then Willie had become a lawyer and politically ambitious man. Jack covered the campaign.

Aiding Willie was Sadie Burke, a clever, energetic woman with political skill. Inadvertently she revealed Harrison's plan to Willie. Crushed and gloomy at this news, Willie rallied his spirits and offered to campaign for MacMurfee, who was elected.

Willie practiced law for a few years until 1930 when he ran for governor with the assistance of Sadie Burke, who became his mistress, and Tiny Duffy, who was Willie's political jackal.

Meanwhile Jack had quit his job on the Chronicle. Reared by a mother who had remarried since Ellis Burden had deserted her, Jack had become a faithless, homeless cynic whose journalism career meant nothing to him as an ideal. He had, in his youth, played with Anne and Adam Stanton. Adam was now a famous surgeon, and Anne, still unmarried, had become a welfare worker.

Jack was in love with Anne, but time had placed a barrier between him and the girl with whom he had fallen in love during the summer after he had come home to Burden's Landing from college. He had been twenty-one then, she seventeen. But Jack's youthful cynicism, which later took possession of him completely, spoiled him in Anne's eyes.

When Jack went to work for Governor Willie Stark, Jack's mother was deeply pained and Judge Irwin was disgusted, but Jack cared little for their opinions.

By 1933 Willie was on the verge of losing his wife, who could not stand her husband's political maneuvers and his treatment of their son Tom. Willie assured Jack that Lucy knew nothing about Sadie Burke. Lucy remained with Willie through his reelection in 1934 and then retired to her sister's farm. She appeared with Willie in public only for the sake of his reputation.

Jack began to dig into Judge Irwin's past. Delving into the judge's financial transactions during the time when he was attorney general under Governor Stanton, Jack learned that a power company had been sued by the government for a large sum. As a bribe to the attorney general the company fired one of its men to give a highly paid job to Irwin. Later this man, Littlepugh, committed suicide after writing the facts in a letter to his sister. Still living, Miss Littlepugh told Jack the story.

The issue of the Willie Stark six-million-dollar hospital demanded use of this scandal which Jack had uncovered. Willie told Jack that he wanted Adam Stanton to head the new hospital. It would, Jack knew, be a ridiculous offer to the aloof and unworldly young doctor, but he made an effort to convince Adam to take the post. Adam flatly refused. A few days later Anne sent for Jack. She wanted Adam to take the position. Jack showed Anne the documents proving Judge Irwin's acceptance of a bribe and Governor Stanton's attempt to cover up for his friend. Knowing that Adam would want to protect his father's good name, Anne showed the evidence to him. He then said he would head the hospital. Later Jack wondered how Anne had known about the plans for the hospital because neither he nor Adam had told her.

Jack's suspicions were confirmed when Sadie Burke, in a torrent of rage, told him that Willie had been betraying her. Jack knew then that Anne Stanton was the cause.

Disillusioned, he packed a suitcase and drove to California. This journey to the West and back completed, Jack, his torment under control, went back to work for Willie.

One of MacMurfee's men tried to bribe Adam to use influence in selecting a man named Larson as the builder of the medical center. When Adam, outraged, decided to resign, Anne phoned Jack for the first time since he had learned of her affair with Willie. Anne and Jack decided to get Adam to sign a warrant against the man who had tried to bribe him. Jack also warned Anne that as a witness she would be subject to public scrutiny of her relationship with Willie, but she said she did not care. Jack asked her why she was associating with Willie. She said that after what Jack had told her about Governor Stanton's dishonesty in the past she did not care what happened to her. Later, Jack persuaded Adam not to bring suit.

After Willie's political enemy, MacMurfee, tried to blackmail him because of a scandal concerning Tom Stark, Willie ordered Jack to use his knowledge to make Judge Irwin throw his weight against MacMurfee's blackmail attempt. When Jack went to Burden's Landing to confront Judge Irwin with the evidence that Jack had obtained from Miss Littlepough, the old man shot himself.

In the excitement following the suicide, Jack's mother told him that he had caused his father's death. Belatedly, Jack discovered the reason for Ellis Burden's desertion. In his will Judge Irwin left his estate to his son, Jack Burden.

Only one way seemed left to handle MacMurfee. Willie decided to give the building contract for the hospital to MacMurfee's man, Larson, who in turn would suppress the scandal about Tom. Duffy made the arrangements.

Tom Stark was a football hero. One Saturday during a game his neck was broken. Adam reported that Tom would remain paralyzed. This news had its effect on Willie. He told Duffy that the hospital deal was off. Turning to Lucy once more, he dismissed Sadie Burke and Anne Stanton.

Duffy, driven too far by Willie, phoned Adam and told him that Anne had been responsible for his appointment. Adam, having known nothing of his sister's relationship with the governor, went to her apartment to denounce her. Then, in the hall of the state building, Adam shot Willie and was killed immediately afterward by Willie's bodyguard.

Piece by piece the tangled mess of Jack's life began to take new meaning. He separated himself from every particle of his past with the exception of two people: his mother, whose devotion to Judge Irwin over all the years had given her a new personality in Jack's eyes, and Anne Stanton, whom he married.

THE KING OF FRANCE

BERTRAM, Count of Rousillon

THE COUNTESS OF ROUSILLON, his mother

HELENA, the Countess' ward

PAROLLES, a scoundrel, Bertram's follower

A WIDOW OF FLORENCE

DIANA, her daughter

Critique:

More serious and dramatic than most of the Shakespearian comedies, All's Well That Ends Well is thought to have been revised several times before its first publication in the Folio of 1623. It is not a smooth piece of work. Parts of it are farce-comedy; other parts are marked by a seriousness of insight that is not always compatible with the general tone. Shakespeare's purpose was to portray the blindness brought about by prejudices formed without reason. Yet he gave sound basis for Bertram's refusal to see the good in Helena. Twice she humiliated him and forced him into unwanted situations. It took all of Shakespeare's skill to bring about a happy ending in the face of such odds.

The Story:

Bertram, the Count of Rousillon, had been called to the court to serve the King of France, who was ill of a disease that all the royal physicians had failed to cure. In the entire country the only doctor who might have cured the king was now dead. On his deathbed he had bequeathed to his daughter Helena his books and papers describing cures for all common and rare diseases, among them the one suffered by the king.

Helena was now the ward of the Countess of Rousillon, who thought of her as a daughter. Helena loved young Count Bertram and wanted him for a husband, not a brother. Bertram considered Helena only slightly above a servant, however, and would not consider her for a wife. Through her knowledge of the king's illness, Helena at last hit upon a plot to gain the spoiled young man for her mate, in such fashion as to leave him no choice in the decision. She journeyed to the court and, offering her life as forfeit if she failed, gained the king's consent to try her father's cure on him. If she won, the young lord of her choice was to be given to her in marriage.

Her sincerity won the king's confidence. She cured him by means of her father's prescription and as her boon asked for Bertram for her husband. That young man protested to the king, but the ruler kept his promise, not only because he had given his word but also because Helena had won him over completely.

When the king ordered the marriage to be performed at once, Bertram, although bowing to the king's will, would not have Helena for a wife in any but a legal way. Pleading the excuse of urgent business elsewhere, he deserted her after the ceremony and sent messages to her and to his mother saying he would never belong to a wife forced upon him. He told Helena that she would not really be his wife until she wore on her finger a ring he now wore on his and carried in her body a child that was his. And these two things would never come to pass, for he would never see Helena again. He was encouraged in his hatred for Helena by his follower, Parolles, a scoundrel and a coward who would as soon betray one person as another. Helena had reproached him for his vulgar ways and he wanted vengeance on her.

Helena returned to the Countess of Rousillon, as Bertram had commanded. The countess heard of her son's actions with horror, and when she read the letter he had written her, restating his hatred for Helena, she disowned her son, for she loved Helena like her own child. When Helena learned that Bertram had said he would never return to France until he no longer had a wife there, she sadly decided to leave the home of her benefactress. Loving Bertram, she vowed that she would not keep him from his home.

Disguising herself as a religious pilgrim, Helena followed Bertram to Italy, where he had gone to fight for the Duke of Florence. While lodging with a widow and her daughter, a beautiful young girl named Diana, Helena learned that Bertram had seduced a number of young Florentine girls. Lately he had turned his attention to Diana, but she, a pure and virtuous girl, would not accept his attentions. Then Helena told the widow and Diana that she was Bertram's wife, and by bribery and a show of friendliness she persuaded them to join her in a plot against Bertram. Diana listened again to his vows of love for her and agreed to let him come to her rooms, provided he first gave her a ring from his finger to prove the constancy of his love. Bertram, overcome with passion, gave her the ring, and that night, as he kept the appointment in her room, the girl he thought Diana slipped a ring on his finger as they lay in bed together.

News came to the countess in France and to Bertram in Italy that Helena had died of grief and love for Bertram. Bertram returned to France to face his mother's and the king's displeasure, but first he discovered that Parolles was the knave everyone else knew him to be. When Bertram held him up to public ridicule, Parolles vowed he would be revenged on his former benefactor.

When the king visited the Countess of Rousillon, she begged him to restore her son to favor. Bertram protested that he really loved Helena, though he had not recognized that love until after he had lost her forever through death. His humility so pleased the king that his confession of love, coupled with his exploits in the Italian wars, won him a royal pardon for his offense against his wife. Then the king, about to betroth him to another wife, the lovely and wealthy daughter of a favorite lord, noticed the ring Bertram was wearing. It was the ring given to him the night he went to Diana's rooms; the king in turn recognized it as a jewel he had given to Helena. Bertram tried to pretend that it had been thrown to him in Florence by a high-born lady who loved him. He said that he had told the lady he was not free to wed, but that she had refused to take back her gift.

At that moment Diana appeared as a petitioner to the king and demanded that Bertram fulfill his pledge to recognize her as his wife. When Bertram tried to pretend that she was no more than a prostitute he had visited, she produced the ring he had given her. That ring convinced everyone present, especially his mother, that Diana was really Bertram's wife. Parolles added to the evidence against Bertram by testifying that he had heard his former master promise to marry the girl. Bertram persisted in his denials. Diana then asked for the ring she had given to him, the ring which the king thought to be Helena's. The king asked Diana where she had gotten the ring. When she refused to tell on penalty of her life, he ordered her taken to prison. Diana then declared that she would send for her bail. Her bail was Helena, now carrying Bertram's child within her, for it was she, of course, who had received him in Diana's rooms that fateful night. To her Diana gave the ring. The two requirements for becoming his real wife being now fulfilled, Bertram promised to love Helena as a true and faithful husband. Diana received from the king a promise to give her any young man of her choice for her husband, the king to provide the dowry. And so the bitter events of the past made sweeter the happiness of all.

ALMAYER'S FOLLY

Author: Joseph Conrad (Teodor Józef Konrad Korzeniowski, 1857-1924)

Type of plot: Romantic realism

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: Dutch East Indies

First published: 1895

Principal characters:

ALMAYER, an unsuccessful trader of Dutch ancestry

MRS. ALMAYER, his Malay wife

NINA, his half-caste daughter

DAIN MAROOLA, Nina's Malay lover

LAKAMBA, Rajah of Sambir, Almayer's enemy

Critique:

Almayer's Folly is a good example of Conrad's carefully constructed stories. Laid in the Far East, as many of his novels are, the story is played out against the inscrutable mystery of nature. The theme of the meeting of East and West has long found varied treatment in English literature.

The Story:

By marrying Lingard's adopted daughter, a Malay, Almayer had inherited that prosperous merchant's business and his plans for amassing a huge fortune in gold from rich mines up the Pantai River. Almayer and his wife had one daughter, Nina, a beautiful girl, who had been sent to Singapore, where for ten years she was educated as a European. She returned home to Sambir unexpectedly at the end of that time, for she could not bear to be treated as a half-caste in a white community. Unsuccessful in business, Almayer nursed dim hopes that he could find a gold mine and, his fortune made, take Nina to Amsterdam to spend his last days in prosperous retirement.

News that the English were to have control of the Pantai River caused Almayer to start building a new house in his compound, not far removed from the one in which he was living. He wanted a house fine enough to receive the British. When the project was abandoned and the Dutch were left in nominal power, Almayer stopped work on his new house. A company of Dutch seamen christened the structure "Almayer's Folly."

The native rajah, named Lakamba, had a compound across the river from Almayer's home. There he lived with his women and his slaves and his principal aide, Babalatchi. Lakamba kept close watch on Almayer when he would leave for several days at a time with a few of his men. But Almayer gave up his trips after a time and settled down to empty daydreams on his rotten wharf. His native wife despised him.

Nina's presence in Sambir offered another problem for Almayer, for the young men of the settlement were eyeing her with interest.

One day the handsome son of a Malayan rajah came sailing up the river in a brig and wanted to trade with Almayer. His name was Dain Maroola. At length, after conversations with Lakamba and long conferences with Almayer, Dain got what he was after, gunpowder. Meanwhile he had fallen passionately in love with Nina. One night she came into the women's room in her father's house and discovered her mother counting out the money Dain had been giving her in payment for Nina. Mrs. Almayer had been arranging meetings between Nina and Dain, and giving them warning at the approach of Almayer. Mrs. Almayer wished her daughter to remain native. She had a deep distrust of white men and their ways.

Dain went away, promising that he would return to help Almayer in locating the hidden gold mine. When he did return, he saw Almayer for just a moment and then hurried to see Lakamba. He told the rajah that his brig had fallen into the hands of the Dutch and that he had narrowly escaped with one slave. Most of his men had been killed. And in a day or two the Dutch would be up the Pantai looking for him.

After this interview Lakamba told Babalatchi he must poison Almayer before the Dutch arrived. Now that Dain knew where the gold treasure was, Almayer was no longer needed. If allowed to live, he might reveal his secret to the white men.

Next morning the body of a Malay was found floating in the river. The head was smashed beyond recognition, but it wore an anklet and a ring that had belonged to Dain. Almayer was overcome with grief, for Dain was his last hope of finding the gold. The Dutch officers who came looking for Dain told how he had escaped from his brig and how, as the Dutch approached it, the gunpowder it carried ignited and blew up the boat, killing two of the Dutch. Almayer promised his visitors that after they had dined he would deliver Dain into their hands.

Meanwhile Babalatchi was telling Lakamba the true story of Dain. Nina had been waiting for the young Malay on the night of his conference with Lakamba, and she had taken him to a secluded clearing farther up the river. There he was now hiding. The corpse that had floated down the river was that of his slave, who had died when the canoe overturned. Mrs. Almayer had suggested that Dain put his anklet and ring on the body and let it float down the river. Lakamba and Babalatchi planned Dain's escape from his Dutch enemies. Knowing that Dain would not leave without Nina, Babalatchi and Mrs. Almayer plotted to get her away from Almayer, who was drinking with the Dutch. After some persuasion Almayer did lead his guests to the grave of the man recovered from the river. The Dutch took the anklet and ring as proof that Dain was dead. Then they left for the night.

Nina, willing to go with Dain, felt an urge to see her father once more before she left, but her mother would not let her go into the house where her father lay in a drunken sleep. Nina went to the clearing where Dain was hiding. Soon afterward a slave girl awakened Almayer and told him where Nina was. Almayer was panic-stricken. He traced Nina to Dain's enclosure and begged her to come back to him, but she would not. She did not want to run the risk of insults from white people. With Dain she would be a ranee, and she would be married to a Malay, a brave warrior, not a lying, cowardly white man. Almayer threatened to send his servant to tell the Dutch where Dain was.

While they argued, Babalatchi came up and cried out that the slave girl had revealed Dain's hiding place to the Dutch, who were now on their way to capture the young Malay. Babalatchi, astounded when Dain announced that he would stay with Nina, left them to their fate. After he had gone, Almayer said he would never forgive Nina, but he offerred to take the two to the mouth of the river. So in heavy darkness the fugitive lovers escaped their pursuers.

On an island at the mouth of the river Dain, Nina, and Almayer awaited the canoe that would take the lovers to Lakamba's hidden boat. After the two had gone, Almayer covered up Nina's footprints and returned to his house up the river. His compound was deserted. Mrs. Almayer with her women had gone to Lakamba for protection, taking Dain's gift of money with her. Almayer found the old rusty key to his unused office. He went inside, broke up the furniture, and piled it in the middle of the room. When he came out he threw the key into the river and sat on his porch until the flames began to billow from his office. He was burning down his old house.

He lived out the rest of his days in "Almayer's Folly." Finally he began the practice of smoking opium in an effort to forget his daughter Nina. When he died, the opium had given his eyes the look of one who indeed had succeeded in forgetting.

THE AMBASSADORS

Author: Henry James (1843-1916)

MARIA GOSTREY, an acquaintance of Strether

COMTESSE DE VIONNET, in love with Chadwick Newsome

MRS. POCKOCK, Chadwick's married sister

MAMIE POCKOCK, Mrs. Pocock's husband's sister

Critique:

Henry James put great emphasis on the construction and form of his novels, and The Ambassadors is one of his best in point of construction. There are no loose ends; the entire story is neatly gathered together. The importance of this novel in Henry James' work is that in it he at last conquered his embarrassment over people from America. His earlier novels had displayed the people of his native land as rather barbaric in their appreciation of Europe. But in Lambert Strether and Chadwick Newsome, James portrayed two Americans who had the intelligence to realize in Paris what they had missed in the bleak and narrowed existence of their earlier lives in New England.

The Story:

Lambert Strether was engaged to marry Mrs. Newsome, a widow. Mrs. Newsome had a son Chadwick, whom she wanted to return home from Paris and take over the family business in Woollett, Massachusetts. She was especially concerned for his future after she had heard that he was seriously involved with a Frenchwoman. In her anxiety she asked Strether to go to Paris and persuade her son to return to the respectable life she had planned for him.

Strether did not look forward to his task, for the young man had ignored all his mother's written requests to return home. Nor did Strether know what hold Chadwick's mistress might have over him or what sort of woman she might be. He strongly suspected that she was a young girl of unsavory reputation. Strether realized, however, that his hopes of marrying Mrs. Newsome depended upon his success in bringing Chad back to America, where his mother could see him married to Mamie Pocock.

Leaving his ship at Liverpool, Strether journeyed across England to London. On the way he met Miss Gostrey, a young woman who was acquainted with some of Strether's American friends, and she promised to aid Strether in getting acquainted with Europe before he left for home again. Strether met another old friend, Mr. Waymarsh, an American lawyer living in England, whom he asked to go with him to Paris.

A few days after arriving in Paris, Strether went to Chad's house. The young man was not in Paris, and he had temporarily given the house over to a friend, Mr. Bilham. Through Bilham, Strether got in touch with Chad at Cannes. Strether was surprised to learn of his whereabouts, for he knew that Chad would not have dared to take an ordinary mistress to such a fashionable resort.

About a week later Strether, Miss Gostrey, and Waymarsh went to the theater. Between the acts of the play, the door of their box was opened and Chad entered. He was much changed from the adolescent college boy Strether remembered. He was slightly gray, although only twenty-eight.

Both Strether and Chad Newsome pleased each other on sight. Over coffee after the theater, the older man told Chad why he had come to Europe. Chad answered that all he asked was an opportunity to be convinced that he should return.

A few days later Chad took Strether and his friends to a tea where they met Mme. and Mlle. de Vionnet. The former, who had married a French count, turned out to be an old school friend of Miss Gostrey. Strether was at a loss to understand whether Chad was in love with the comtesse or with her daughter Jeanne. Since the older woman was only a few years the senior of the young man and as beautiful as her daughter, either was possibly the object of his affections.

As the days slipped by it became apparent to Strether that he himself wanted to stay in Paris. The French city and its life were much calmer and more beautiful than the provincial existence he had known in Woollett, and he began to understand why Chad was unwilling to go back to his mother and the New-some mills.

Strether learned that Chad was in love with Mme. de Vionnet, rather than with her daughter. The comtesse had been separated from her husband for many years, but their position and religion made divorce impossible. Strether, who was often in the company of the Frenchwoman, soon fell under her charm. Miss Gostrey, who had known Mme. de Vionnet for many years, had only praise for her and questioned Strether as to the advisability of removing Chad from the woman's continued influence.

One morning Chad announced to Strether that he was ready to return immediately to America. The young man was puzzled when Strether replied that he was not sure it was wise for either of them to return, that it would be wiser for them both to reconsider whether they would not be better off in Paris than in New England.

When Mrs. Newsome, back in America, received word of that decision on the part of her ambassador, she immediately sent the Pococks, her daughter and son-in-law, to Paris along with Mamie Pocock, the girl she hoped her son would marry. They were to bring back both Strether and her son.

Mrs. Newsome's daughter and her relatives did not come to Paris with an obvious ill-will. Their attitude seemed to be that Chad and Strether had somehow drifted astray, and it was their duty to set them right. At least that was the attitude of Mrs. Pocock. Her husband, however, was not at all interested in having Chad return, for in the young man's absence Mr. Pocock controlled the Newsome mills. Mr. Pocock further saw that his visit was probably the last opportunity he would have for a gay time in the European city, and so he was quite willing to spend his holiday going to theaters and cafés. His younger sister, Mamie, seemed to take little interest in the recall of her supposed fiancé, for she had become interested in Chad's friend, Mr. Bilham.

The more Strether saw of Mme. de Vionnet after the arrival of the Pococks, the more he was convinced that the Frenchwoman was both noble and sincere in her attempts to make friends with her lover's family. Mrs. Pocock found it difficult to reconcile Mme. de Vionnet's aristocratic background with the fact that she was Chad's mistress.

After several weeks of hints and gentle pleading, the Pococks and Mamie went to Switzerland, leaving Chad to make a decision whether to return to America. As for Mr. Strether, Mrs. Newsome had advised that he be left alone to make his own decision, for the widow wanted to avoid the appearance of having lost her dignity or her sense of propriety.

While the Pococks were gone, Strether and Chad discussed the course they should follow. Chad was uncertain of his attitude toward Mamie Pocock. Strether assured him that the girl was already happy with her new love, Mr. Bilham, who had told Strether that he intended to marry the American girl. His advice, contrary to what he had thought when he had sailed from America, was that Chadwick Newsome should remain in France with the comtesse, despite the fact that the young man could not marry her and would, by remaining in Europe, lose the opportunity to make himself an extremely rich man. Chad decided to take his older friend's counsel.

Waymarsh, who had promised his help in persuading Chad to return to America, was outraged at Strether's changed attitude. Miss Gostrey, however, remained loyal, for she had fallen deeply in love with Strether during their time together in Paris. But Strether, realizing her feelings, told her that he had to go back to America alone. His object in Europe had been to return Chad Newsome to his mother. Because he had failed in that mission and would never marry Mrs. Newsome, he could not justify himself by marrying another woman whom he had met on a journey financed by the woman he had at one time intended to marry. Only Mme. Vionnet, he felt, could truly appreciate the irony of his position.

AMPHITRYON

Author: Titus Maccius Plautus (c. 254-184 B.C.)

Type of plot: Farce

Time of plot: The Heroic Age

Locale: Thebes

First presented: c. 185 B.C.

Principal characters:

AMPHITRYON, a Theban general

ALCMENA, his wife

JUPITER, and
MERCURY, Roman gods
SOSIA, Amphitryon's slave

Critique:

Amphitryon is closely akin to many of the other Plautine plays in that it is a comedy of mistaken identity. It has long been believed that a lost Greek play was the original of Plautus' comedy, but no definite proof is available. Amphitryon has had a great influence on modern drama throughout the Western world, and there have been numerous translations, adaptations, and imitations. Such great dramatists as John Dryden, in England, and Molière, in France, made use of its theme and structure. Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, taken largely from Plautus' The Menaechmi, owes something also to Amphitryon. In very recent times a production of the story as adapted by Jean Giraudoux was successful as a stage play under the title Amphitryon 38.

The Story:

Amphitryon, a Theban, joined the army of Thebes to fight against the Teloboans. When he left for the wars, his wife Alcmena, daughter of Electryon, was pregnant. Nevertheless, in the absence of Amphitryon, Jupiter fell in love with Alcmena and decided that he must enjoy her favors. Disguising himself as Amphitryon, Jupiter appeared to Alcmena as her husband, just returned from a battle with the Teloboans. Alcmena was unable to penetrate the disguise of the impostor and welcomed Jupiter as her husband. Because Jupiter wished to enjoy Alcmena as long as possible, he had the sun, moon, and stars remain fixed, and so the night he spent with Alcmena was long enough for her to conceive and be ready to bring forth a child by Jupiter at the same time she gave birth to the child by her husband.

In the meantime Amphitryon's ship returned to Thebes. Because it was still night Amphitryon's slave, Sosia, fearfully walking the streets of the sleeping town, tried to console himself with the pleasantness of the news he was bringing to its citizens. He thought how well his master, Amphitryon, had handled the war with the Teloboans, how the enemy had refused to arbitrate the dispute over lands, how the battle had been joined, and how Amphitryon had been awarded the golden cup of Pterela as a token of the valor displayed in the battle.

While Sosia soliloquized, Mercury, disguised as Sosia, was listening to every word. Mercury had assumed the disguise to aid his father, Jupiter, in the latter's scheme to make love to Alcmena. As Sosia came through the streets to Amphitryon's house, Mercury, in the guise of Sosia, was guarding the house and the inmates against any disturbance. When Sosia saw Mercury he was afraid, but he went up to the door and tried to enter. Mercury, as Sosia, told him to be gone and beat him with his fists. When Sosia cried out that he was a slave named Sosia who belonged to the household, he received another drubbing.

Sosia, confused, then asked the stranger who he was. Mercury replied that he was Sosia, a slave of the household. Looking closely, Sosia saw that the person in front of him was dressed and looked exactly like himself. When Sosia went on to ask questions about the household, Mercury answered each one satisfactorily. Sosia asked about his own conduct during the battle; Mercury replied that he had been drinking. Knowing that the answer was correct and sure that someone had stolen his very identity, Sosia ran off to the ship, leaving Mercury to chuckle over the ruse which would prevent Amphitryon from spoiling Jupiter's night with Alcmena.

Eventually Jupiter took leave of Alcmena, after telling her that he had to return to his army, lest the men become bitter because their leader absented himself while they could not. When she grew sad at the thought of his departure, the god, to propitiate her, gave her the golden cup of Pterela which Amphitryon had received as a token of merit in the war. As he left, Jupiter ordered the night to move on in its regular course.

Amphitryon was furious when Sosia returned to the ship. He thought that the slave must be mad or, at the very least, drunk, and he refused to believe that anyone could have stolen the identity of Sosia, as the slave declared. Amphitryon, anxious to discover what was happening, set out for his home immediately, taking Sosia with him. By the time the real Amphitryon and Sosia arrived at the house Jupiter and Mercury had departed. Alcmena was surprised to see her husband return in so short a time. She feared that he was simply testing her fidelity.

Amphitryon, greeting his wife as a husband would after an absence of months, was unable to understand what Alcmena meant when she rebuked him for leaving her a short time before on a pretext of returning to his army. When she told Amphitryon that he had spent the night with her, Amphitryon became suddenly and decidedly angry. Then she mentioned the golden cup of Pterela, which she had received from Jupiter during his visit in disguise. Amphitryon declared she could not have the cup, for he had it under seal in his possession. But when he opened the chest in which he had put the cup, it was missing; the gods had stolen it to give to Alcmena.

In spite of the evidence produced to show that it was he who had been with his wife, Amphitryon was exceedingly angry and accused his wife of losing her honor by breaking her marriage vows. Alcmena, entirely innocent of any such intent and still believing that her husband had visited her earlier, was hurt and furious at the charges he made. Amphitryon, wishing to be fair but wanting to get to the bottom of the matter, went to get Alcmena's kinsman, Naucrates, who had been with him all night on board the ship. He also told Alcmena that he would divorce her unless she could prove her innocence.

Alcmena was upset at the charges heaped upon her by Amphitryon and made plans to leave the house. Jupiter, sorry for the trouble he had caused, prepared to help her. He appeared to Alcmena in disguise and softened somewhat her anger against Amphitryon. Speaking as Amphitryon, he apologized for the charges made against Alcmena's honesty and virtue.

Amphitryon was unable to find Naucrates and returned to his home. Warned by Mercury, Jupiter appeared as Amphitryon, and a riotous scene, with both men seeming to be Amphitryon, followed, an argument broken off when word came that Alcmena was about to give birth to a child. As Amphitryon prepared to leave, Jupiter struck him unconscious with a thunderbolt. With Jupiter's aid Alcmena painlessly gave birth to two sons, one by Amphitryon and the other by Jupiter. One child was so active that he could hardly be held on his cot to be bathed, and the waiting-women reported that within a few minutes of his birth the baby had strangled two large snakes that entered the room. The voice of Jupiter called out to Alcmena and told her that the lusty lad, Hercules, was his and the other child Amphitryon's.

After the waiting-women had gone, Jupiter himself appeared to Amphitryon and told the husband what had happened. When he warned Amphitryon not to be harsh toward his wife for producing a child by a god, Amphitryon, faced with no other choice, promised to obey all that the god commanded.

Critique:

Hans Christian was a dreamy little boy whose thoughts were very much like those of many of the characters in his fairy tales. When his father died and his mother remarried, he asked to go to Copenhagen to make his fortune. Because a soothsayer had told his mother that Hans would be Denmark's pride, she let him go. When he tried to enter the theater, he had little success. However, influential men realized he was a poet and befriended him until his publications began to attract attention. By the time Hans Christian Andersen died, he was Denmark's most beloved countryman. His tales may be fantastic, running through many moods, but they merely reflect his own character which was equally fantastic, though lovable.

The Stories:

THE RED SHOES

Karen was a little girl so poor that she had to go barefoot in winter. An old mother shoemaker felt sorry for her and made Karen a clumsy pair of shoes out of pieces of red felt. When Karen's mother died, the girl had to wear the red shoes to the funeral. An old lady, seeing

Karen walking forlornly behind her mother's coffin, pitied her and took the child home. The old lady thought the red shoes ugly and burned them.

One day Karen saw the queen and the little princess. The princess was dressed all in white, with beautiful red morocco shoes.

When the time came for Karen's confirmation, she needed new shoes. The old lady, almost blind, did not know that the shoes Karen picked out were red ones just like those the princess had worn. During the confirmation Karen could think of nothing but her red shoes.

The next Sunday, as Karen went to her first communion, she met an old soldier with a crutch. After admiring the red shoes, he struck them on the soles and told them to stick fast when Karen danced. During the service she could think only of her shoes. After church she started to dance. The footman had to pick her up and take off her shoes before the old lady could take her home.

At a ball in town Karen could not stop dancing. She danced out through the fields and up to the church. There an angel with a broad sword stopped her and told her she would dance until she became a skeleton, a warning to all other vain children.

She danced day and night until she came to the executioner's house. There she tapped on the window and begged him to come out and cut off her feet. When he chopped off the feet, they and the little red shoes danced off into the forest. The executioner made Karen wooden feet and crutches and taught her a psalm, and the parson gave her a home.

Karen thought she had suffered enough to go to church, but each time she tried she saw the red shoes dancing ahead of her and was afraid. One Sunday she stayed at home. As she heard the organ music, she read her prayer book humbly and begged help from God. Then she saw the angel again, not with a sword but with a green branch covered with roses. As the angel moved the branch, Karen felt that she was being carried off to the church. There she was so thankful that her heart broke and her soul flew up to heaven.

THE UGLY DUCKLING

A mother duck was sitting on a clutch of eggs. When the largest egg did not crack with the rest, an old matriarchal duck warned the setting fowl that she might as well let that egg alone; it would probably turn out to be a turkey. But the egg finally cracked, and out of it came the biggest, ugliest duckling ever seen in the barnyard. The other ducklings pecked it and chased it and made it so unhappy that it felt comfortable only when it was paddling in the pond. The mother duck was proud only of the very fine paddling the ugly duckling did.

The scorn heaped on his head was so bitter that the duckling ran away from home. He spent a miserable winter in the marsh.

When spring came he saw some beautiful white swans settle down on the water. He moved out to admire them as they came toward him with ruffled feathers. He bent down to await their attack, but as he looked in the water he saw that he was no longer a gray ugly duckling but another graceful swan. He was so glad then that he never thought to be proud, but smiled when he heard some children say that he was the handsomest swan they had ever seen.

THE SNOW QUEEN

A very wicked hobgoblin once invented a mirror that reflected everything good as trivial and everything bad as monstrous; a good thought turned into a grin in the mirror. His cohorts carried it all over the earth and finally up to heaven to test the angels. There many good thoughts made the mirror grin so much that it fell out of their hands and splintered as it hit the earth. Each tiny piece could distort as the whole mirror had done.

A tiny piece pierced Kay through the heart and a tiny grain lodged in his eye. Kay had been a happy little boy before that. He used to play with Gerda in their rooms high above the street, and they both admired some rose bushes their parents had planted in boxes spanning the space between their houses. With the glass in his eye and heart, however, Kay saw nothing beautiful and nothing pleased him.

One night he went sledding in the town square. When a lady all in white drove by, he thought her so beautiful that he hitched his sled behind her sleigh as she drove slowly around the square. Suddenly her horses galloped out of the town. The lady looked back at Kay and smiled each time he tried to loosen his sled. Then she stopped the sleigh and told Kay to get in with her. There she wrapped him in her fur coat. She was the Snow Queen. He was nearly frozen, but he did not feel cold after she kissed him, nor did he remember Gerda.

Gerda did not forget Kay, and at last she ran away from home to look for him. She went to the garden of a woman learned in magic and asked all the flowers if they had seen Kay, but the flowers knew only their own stories.

She met a crow who led her to the prince and princess, but they had not heard of Kay. They gave her boots and a muff, and a golden coach to ride in when they sent her on her way.

Robbers stopped the golden coach. At the insistence of a little robber girl, Gerda was left alive, a prisoner in the robber's house. Some wood pigeons in the loft told Gerda that Kay had gone with the Snow Queen to Lapland. Since the reindeer tethered inside the house knew the way to Lapland, the robber girl unloosed him to take Gerda on her way.

The Lapp and the Finn women gave Gerda directions to the Snow Queen's palace and told her that it was only through the goodness of her heart that Kay could be released. When Gerda found Kay, she wept so hard that she melted the piece of mirror out of his heart. Then he wept the splinter from his eye and realized what a vast and empty place he had been in. With thankfulness in her heart, Gerda led Kay out of the snow palace and home.

THE SHEPHERDESS AND THE SWEEP

In the middle of the door of an old wooden parlor cupboard was carved a ridiculous little man with goat's legs, horns on his head, and a beard. The children called him Major-general-field-sergeant-commander-Billy-goat's-legs. He always looked at the china figure of a Shepherdess. Finally he asked the china figure of a Chinaman, who claimed to be her grandfather, if he could marry the Shepherdess. The Chinaman, who could nod his head when he chose, nodded his consent.

The Shepherdess had been engaged to the china figure of a Chimneysweep. She begged him to take her away. That night he used his ladder to help her get off the table. The Chinaman saw them leave and started after them.

Through the stove and up the chimney went the Shepherdess and the Chimneysweep. When she saw how big the world was, the Shepherdess began to cry, and the Chimneysweep had to take her back to the parlor. There they saw the Chinaman broken on the floor. The Shepherdess was distressed, but the Chimneysweep said the Chinaman could be mended and riveted.

The family had the Chinaman riveted so that he was whole again, but he could no longer nod his head. When the Major-general-field-sergeant-commander-Billy-goat's-legs asked again for the Shepherdess, the Chinaman could not nod, and so the Shepherdess and the Chimneysweep stayed together and loved each other until they were broken to pieces.

THE EMPEROR'S NEW CLOTHES

Once there was a foolish Emperor who loved clothes so well that he spent all of the kingdom's money to buy new ones. Two swindlers, who knew the Emperor's weakness, came to town with big looms. They told the people they wove the most beautiful cloth in the world but that it had a magical property. If someone unworthy of his post looked at it, the cloth became invisible.

The Emperor gave them much gold and thread to make him a new outfit. The swindlers set up their looms and worked far into the night. Becoming curious about the materials, the Emperor sent his most trusted minister to see them. When the minister looked at the looms, he saw nothing; but, thinking of the magical property of the cloth, he decided that he was unworthy of his post. Saying nothing to the swindlers, he reported to the Emperor, praising the colors and pattern of the cloth as the swindlers had described it.

Others, looking at the looms, saw nothing and said nothing. Even the Emperor saw nothing when the material was finished and made into clothes, but he also kept silent. He wore his new clothes in a fine procession. All the people called out that his new clothes were beautiful, all except one little boy who said that the Emperor did not have on any clothes at all.

Then there was a buzzing along the line of march. Soon everyone was saying that the Emperor wore no clothes. The Emperor, realizing the truth, held himself stiffer than ever until the procession ended.

THE STEADFAST TIN SOLDIER

A little boy had a set of twenty-five tin soldiers made out of the same tin spoon. Since there was not quite enough tin, one soldier had only one leg, but he stood as solidly as those with two legs.

The one-legged soldier stood on a table and looked longingly at a paper castle, at the door of which stood a paper dancer who wore a gauze dress. A ribbon over her shoulder was held in position by a spangle as big as her face.

One morning the little boy put the one-legged soldier on a window sill. When the window opened, the soldier fell three stories to the ground. There he stuck, head down between two stones, until some boys found him. They made a paper boat for the soldier and sailed it down the gutter. After a time the boat entered a sewer. Beginning to get limp, it settled deeper into the water. Just as the soldier thought he would fall into the water, a fish swallowed him.

When the fish was opened, the soldier found himself in the same house out of which he had fallen. Soon he was back on his table looking at the dancer. For no reason the boy threw him into a roaring fire. Suddenly a draft in the room whisked the dancer off the table and straight to the soldier in the fire. When the fire burned down, the soldier had melted to a small tin heart. All that was left of the dancer was her spangle, burned black.

THE TINDER BOX

A soldier was walking along the high-road one day when a witch stopped him and told him that he could have a lot of money if he would climb down a hollow tree and bring her up a tinder box. Thinking that was an easy way to get money, he tied a rope around his waist and the witch helped him to climb down inside the tree.

He took along the witch's apron, for on it he had to place the dogs that guarded the chests of money. The first dog, with eyes as big as saucers, guarded a chest full of coppers. The soldier placed the dog on the apron, filled his pockets with coppers, and walked on.

The next dog, with eyes as big as mill-stones, guarded silver. The soldier placed the dog on the apron, emptied his pockets of coppers, and filled them with silver.

The third dog had eyes as big as the Round Tower. He guarded gold. When the soldier had placed the dog on the apron, he emptied his pockets of silver and filled them, his knapsack, his cap and his boots with gold. Then he called to the witch to pull him up.

When she refused to tell him why she wanted the tinder box, he cut off her head and started for town. There he lived in splendor and gave alms to the poor, for he was good-hearted.

He heard of a beautiful princess who was kept locked up because of a prophecy that she would marry a common soldier. Idly he thought of ways to see her.

When his money ran out, and he had no candle, he remembered that there was a piece of candle in the tinder box. As he struck the box to light the candle, the door flew open and the dog with eyes like saucers burst in, asking what the soldier wanted. When he asked for money, the dog brought it back immediately. Then he found that he could call the second dog by striking the box twice, and the third dog by striking it three times. When he asked the dogs to bring the princess, she was brought to his room.

The king and queen had him thrown into prison when they caught him. There he was helpless until a little boy to whom he called brought the tinder box to him.

When the soldier was about to be hanged, he asked permission to smoke a last pipe. Then he pulled out his tinder box and hit once, twice, three times. All three dogs came to rout the king's men and free the soldier. The people were so impressed that they made the soldier king and the princess his queen.

ANDRIA

Author: Terence (Publius Terentius Afer, c. 190-159 B.C.)

Type of plot: Comedy

Time of plot: Second century B.C.

Locale: Athens

First presented: 166 B.C.

Principal characters:

SIMO, a wealthy Athenian

PAMPHILUS, Simo's son

GLYCERIUM, beloved of Pamphilus

DAVUS, slave of Pamphilus

CHREMES, another wealthy Athenian, friend of Simo

CRITO, a traveler from Andros

CHARINUS, a suitor for the daughter of Chremes

Critique:

Although Andria was Terence's first play, it shows those characteristics for which this dramatist was noted throughout his career. As in all his plays, the action is closely knit, with no digressions, and the comedy is of a more serious turn than the popular slapstick humor. The language is natural. Actually, the plot was not new. Terence admitted that he had adapted his drama from two plays by Menander, the Greek dramatist who wrote The Lady of Andros and The Lady of Perinthos. The whole story turns, like so many Greek and Latin comedies, on the theme of mistaken identity. The modern reader will undoubtedly compare it to Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, which in turn was freely adapted from The Menaechmi of Plautus. Nor have modern authors ceased to adapt from Terence's Andria. It was the basis of Baron's L'Andrienne, Sir Richard Steele's The Conscious Lovers, and Thornton Wilder's novel, The Woman of Andros.

The Story:

One day Simo confided in a servant that he had been pleased with his son Pamphilus until that very afternoon, when he had discovered that his son was in love with Glycerium, the sister of a courtesan who had recently died. Simo, who wished to marry his son to the daughter of his friend Chremes, saw in his son's love for Glycerium a threat to his plans.

Later Simo encountered his son's slave, Davus, and threatened him with severe punishment. Simo was afraid that Davus, a clever fellow, would help Pamphilus thwart his father's plans for his future. Davus immediately saw that some scheme would have to be put into action quickly if the love between Pamphilus and Glycerium were to end in marriage, even though Glycerium was already pregnant by Pamphilus.

Pamphilus' own scheme was to acknowledge the expected infant and then claim that Glycerium was actually an Athenian whose father had been shipwrecked on Andros and who had been reared by the family of the courtesan as a foster child. But Davus laughed at the story and felt that no one would believe it.

Pamphilus, warned that his father wanted him to marry that very day, was greatly troubled. He was put at ease, however, when Davus heard that the approaching marriage to Chremes' daughter had been refused by the girl's father, for Chremes had also learned of the affair between Pamphilus and the courtesan's sister. Davus told Pamphilus to agree to the marriage for the time being. Before long, he added, some way out of the predicament might be found.

Charinus met Davus and Pamphilus and told them that he was in love with Chremes' daughter. Pamphilus said he had no desire to marry the girl and that Charinus was welcome to her. Not knowing the true reason for Pamphilus' assent, Charinus was thrown into despair within the hour, when he heard Pamphilus agree to marry Chremes' daughter.

Later, while Simo, the father, and Davus stood before the door of Glycerium's residence, they heard the servants send for a midwife. Simo was angry, thinking that Davus was trying to trick him into believing that Glycerium was having a child by his son. A short time later Glycerium was delivered of a baby boy. When Simo heard the news, he still thought Davus was trying to trick him and refused to believe what he heard.

Meanwhile Pamphilus waited patiently, believing that no marriage with Chremes' daughter had been arranged. While he waited, however, his father met Chremes on the street, and they agreed once more to marry their children to one another.

When Davus reported the latest development to Pamphilus, the young man was furious, for it now seemed certain he would never be able to marry the woman he loved. Glycerium, from her confinement bed, sent for Pamphilus to learn what progress he was making in his plans to marry her.

Davus, to prevent the marriage between Pamphilus and Chremes' daughter, had Glycerium's maidservant lay the infant on a bed of verbenas in front of Simo's door. Chremes came up the street and saw the child. Davus, pretending that he did not see Chremes, began to argue with Glycerium's servant. During the argument the fact that the child was the son of Pamphilus and Glycerium was shouted aloud. Chremes stormed into Simo's house to withdraw again his offer of marriage between Pamphilus and his daughter.

Soon afterward Crito, a cousin of the dead courtesan, came looking for the house of his dead cousin. As soon as he found it, he asked the maidservant if Glycerium had found her parents in Athens. Davus, looking after Pamphilus' interests, overheard the conversation and entered the house after them.

When Davus left the house a few minutes later, he met Simo, who ordered the slave chained and thrown into a dungeon. While Chremes and Simo were talking over the delayed wedding, Pamphilus also left the house. After some argument the young man convinced his father that Crito had proof that Glycerium was an Athenian and Pamphilus would have to marry her because they had had a child. Pamphilus re-entered the house where Glycerium was lodged and emerged presently with Crito.

Chremes immediately recognized Crito as an acquaintance from Andros. Simo was finally convinced that Crito was an honorable man from that island. Crito then told how Phania, a citizen of Athens, had been shipwrecked on Andros and had died there. With the man had been a little girl, whom the dying man said was his brother's daughter. Chremes then broke into the story to exclaim that Glycerium must be his own daughter, because Phania had been his brother. When Chremes asked what the girl's name had been, Crito said that her name had been changed to Glycerium from Pasibula, the name of Chremes' daughter.

Everyone congratulated Chremes on finding his long-lost child. Pamphilus reminded his father that there could be no barrier to the marriage since Glycerium, too, was a daughter of Chremes and, according to the law, Pamphilus would have to marry her as her seducer. Chremes, overjoyed, declared that he would give a dowry of ten talents to the bride.

Davus was freed from the dungeon, and Pamphilus told him all that had occurred. While they spoke, Charinus entered, happy that the other daughter of Chremes was now free to be his bride. The father gave ready consent to Charinus' suit and said that his only objection had been a desire to have his family united with Simo's. In addition, he promised that Charinus would receive a large dowry as well as a wife.

ANDROMACHE

Author: Jean Baptiste Racine (1639-1699)

Type of plot: Neo-classical tragedy

Time of plot: Shortly after the close of the Trojan War

Locale: Epirus

First presented: 1667

Principal characters:

ANDROMACHE, widow of Hector and captive of Pyrrhus

PYRRHUS, King of Epirus and son of Achilles

ORESTES, son of Agamemnon and spurned suitor of Hermione

HERMIONE, daughter of Helen and affianced bride of Pyrrhus

PYLADES, Orestes' friend and companion

Critique:

The appearance of Andromache on the stage was one of the great events of the French theater for 1667 and for all time. This play has been acted more times than any other drama by Racine. Its dramatic simplicity is outstanding. Each of the four leading characters is dominated by a single emotion. Orestes loves Hermione to distraction; Hermione is overwhelmed by Pyrrhus; Pyrrhus is madly in love with Andromache; Andromache can think only of the dead Hector and their child, Astyanax. Suffering of an emotional kind drives the four characters into a maze of spite, love, hate, and vengeance. At the end only Andromache is left—Pyrrhus and Hermione are dead, and Orestes has gone mad. The distinction is important, for Racine killed off the three who were led by their personal passions, but he saved the sole character whose unselfish grief was for others.

The Story:

Orestes, son of the Greek leader, Agamemnon, journeyed to Epirus to tell Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, that the Greeks were fearful of Astyanax, the young son of Hector and Andromache, who might someday try to avenge the fall of Troy. Because of their fear, they had sent Orestes to request that Pyrrhus put Astyanax to death.

Pyrrhus had fallen in love with Andromache, however, and at first, afraid of losing her love, he refused to grant the request. To Orestes, who had long loved Hermione, betrothed of Pyrrhus, the news of Pyrrhus' love for Andromache was welcome. Orestes thought he saw in the situation a chance for him to win Hermione for his wife. Orestes' friend Pylades was amazed, for Orestes had previously sworn that his love for Hermione had degenerated into hate because she spurned him.

When Pyrrhus refused to kill Astyanax or turn the child over to the Greeks, Orestes threatened him. Pyrrhus swore that he would make Epirus a second Troy before he permitted the death of Astyanax. Pyrrhus, hoping that his decision would lead her to forget her dead husband, told Andromache what he had done, but she made no response to his overtures. Angered, Pyrrhus told her that unless she married him the child would die.

Meanwhile Hermione, spurned by Pyrrhus, was trying to decide whether she loved or hated the king, and whether she wanted to flee with Orestes. When Pyrrhus, rebuffed by Andromache, went to her, they decided that they were still in love. Reconciled to Hermione, Pyrrhus promised to love only her and to give Astyanax to the Greeks.

But Hermione, changing her mind, prepared to flee with Orestes to inflict punishment on Pyrrhus, after Orestes told her that Pyrrhus had renewed his suit of Andromache. Pyrrhus returned while they spoke and announced that he was ready to give over the boy to the Greeks because Andromache had again spurned his love and aid.

Convinced that Pyrrhus had decided to marry Hermione only to keep her from her Greek lover, Orestes plotted to carry off the girl. Pylades, his friend, agreed to help in the abduction. When Hermione met Orestes, she spoke only of her approaching marriage to Pyrrhus, whom she still loved. While they talked, Andromache entered the room and begged Hermione to protect Astyanax, whom Pyrrhus had determined to kill. Andromache reminded Hermione that Hector had championed Helen, Hermione's mother, when the Trojans had wished to murder her. Hermione refused to listen and scorned Andromache's request.

Andromache then pleaded with Pyrrhus, but he told her that her plea came too late. At last, when Andromache vowed to kill herself, her vow and tears moved the vacillating Pyrrhus, who once again told her that he would marry her instead of Hermione and champion the boy against the Greeks. But Andromache refused to save her son by marrying her captor and former enemy. After a conference with her waiting-woman, she decided to consult her husband's ghost. The result of that conference was a decision to marry Pyrrhus, thus bringing Astyanax under Pyrrhus' protection, and then to kill herself.

Hermione, furious when she learned that on the following day Pyrrhus intended to marry Andromache, sent for Orestes and told him that she wanted his help in avenging herself on the king. Without promising herself to Orestes, she asked him to kill Pyrrhus during the wedding ceremony.

At first Orestes demurred. Not wishing to become an assassin, he wanted to declare war on Pyrrhus and earn glory on the battlefield. But at Hermione's urging he finally agreed to the murder. She told him that it would be easy to commit the crime, because the king's guards had been sent to watch over Astyanax and none had been ordered to guard the nuptial ceremonies. She finally added that after the murder she would become Orestes' bride.

After Orestes left, Pyrrhus came once more to Hermione. Hoping that the king had changed his mind again, she sent her serving-woman to tell Orestes not to act until he had further word from her. But Pyrrhus had come to tell her only that he intended to marry Andromache, come what would. Hermione vowed she would have revenge.

This was her message to Orestes. Finally Orestes arrived to inform her that the deed was done; Pyrrhus had died at the hands of Orestes' soldiers.

Hermione, turning on Orestes, declared that she disowned such savagery and would have no more to do with him because he had killed the man she loved. When Orestes argued with her that she had persuaded him to commit the murder for her sake, her only defense was that she had been distraught at having her love spurned by Pyrrhus and that Orestes should not have listened to her. When she rushed out of the room, Pylades came with the Greek warriors to warn Orestes that if they were to escape the wrath of Pyrrhus' subjects they must take ship and sail away from Epirus at once. The people, they said, were obeying Andromache as their queen. And Hermione was dead; she had run into the temple and thrown herself on Pyrrhus' body, after stabbing herself with mortal wounds.

Hearing that news, Orestes turned mad and fainted in his agony. His men quickly took him away and made their escape from Epirus.

Type of plot: Social realism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Johnny the Priest's saloon, New York City, and Provincetown harbor

First presented: 1921

Principal characters:

CHRIS CHRISTOPHERSON, captain of the barge, Simeon Winthrop

ANNA, his daughter

MAT BURKE, a stoker

MARTHY OWEN, a prostitute

Critique:

O'Neill claims rightfully that the ending of his play was not intended to be a happy one. The play illustrates O'Neill's idea that the forces which control our destinies and which seemingly lie outside ourselves are really within. O'Neill agrees with Galsworthy in maintaining that man's character is his fate and in Anna Christie he proves it.

The Story:

Old Chris Christopherson looked upon the sea as the symbol of a malignant fate. True, he was now skipper of the coal barge, Simeon Winthrop, but in his younger days he had been an able seaman and bosun on the old windjammers and had visited every port in the world. As far back as he knew, the men of his family in Sweden had followed the sea. His father died aboard ship in the Indian Ocean, and two of his brothers were drowned. Nor was the curse of the sea confined to the men in the family. After the news of her husband's and her sons' deaths, Chris' mother had died of a broken heart. Unable to bear the loneliness of being a sailor's wife, his own wife had brought their young daughter, Anna, to America to live with some cousins on a farm in Minnesota. Here Anna's mother had died, and the girl was brought up by her relatives.

Chris had not seen his daughter for almost twenty years. One day while he was having a drink at Johnny the Priest's saloon near South Street in New York City, he received a postcard from St. Louis telling him that Anna was on her way to New York.

This news threw Chris into something of a panic, for living on the barge with him was an ancient prostitute named Marthy. Chris decided to get rid of the woman. Being a kind-hearted soul and genuinely fond of Marthy, he disliked the idea of turning her out. But Marthy said that Chris had always treated her decently, and she would move on to someone else.

When Marthy caught a glimpse of Chris's daughter, she was shocked. Anna was twenty years old and pretty in a buxom sort of way. But her painted face and cheap showy clothes were tell tale evidence of what she was—a prostitute. Marthy wondered what Chris' reaction was going to be.

In his eyes, however, Anna was the innocent child he had always imagined her to be, and he was even hesitant about ordering wine to celebrate their reunion. Life on the barge was an entirely new experience for Anna Christopherson. She came to love the sea and to respond to its beauty with the same intensity with which her father responded to its malignance. With the soothing effect of her new environment, and the presence of her father's gentleness and simplicity, Anna began to lose some of her hardness and to build up some faith in men.

One night, while the Simeon Winthrop was anchored in the outer harbor of Provincetown, Massachusetts, Chris heard cries for help. He pulled aboard the barge four men from a boat which had been drifting for five days after the wreck of their ship. One of the men, an Irishman named Mat Burke, took an immediate fancy to Anna, and even in his weakened condition he made it clear that he intended to have Anna for his own.

Mat Burke represented everything in life that Chris hated. In the first place, he was a stoker on a steamship, an occupation the old windjammer sailor regarded as beneath contempt. Secondly, Burke followed the sea and so was connected in the old Swede's mind with inevitable tragedy. But lastly, and most important from Chris' viewpoint, Mat was obviously in love with Anna and wanted to take her away from him. But to Anna Mat represented all that she had always wanted in life. At first she was naturally suspicious of his Irish glibness, but she soon began to see that underneath his voluble exterior there were some genuine convictions, a basic core of integrity which gave her as a woman a sense of security, as well as, in the light of her own past, a gnawing fear.

Her father and Mat were mortal enemies from the start. This conflict reached its climax one day in the cabin when Chris, goaded on by the Irishman's taunts, came at Mat with a knife, intending to kill him. Anna came in as Mat overpowered the old man. She realized that they were fighting over her as if she were a piece of property which must belong to one or the other.

This situation was so close to her previous experience with men that she made them both listen to a confession of the truth about herself, of which apparently neither of them had been aware. She informed her father that his romantic picture of her idyllic life on the Minnesota farm was untrue from beginning to end, that she had been worked relentlessly by her relatives, and that at sixteen she had been seduced by one of her cousins. At last she had gone to St. Louis and entered a bawdy house, where her experience with men did not differ greatly from what she had known on the farm. She informed Mat that for the first time in her life she had realized what love might be. But Mat, having neither intelligence nor imagination enough to appreciate Anna's sincerity, angrily called her names and left the barge in disgust. Chris followed him, and the two men proceeded to get drunk. Anna waited on the Simeon Winthrop for two days, hoping that Mat would return. Finally she prepared to go to New York and resume her old profession.

Her father was the first to return with the news that to save her from going back to the old life he had signed on the Londonderry, a steamer to Capetown, Africa, and had made arrangements for his pay to be turned over to Anna. When Mat returned, Anna felt sure he had come back merely to kill her. He was bruised and bloody from waterfront fights. He too had signed on the Londonderry, and the irony of her father and Mat on the same boat struck Anna as funny. Finally she made Mat see that she had hated the men who had bought her and that all she wanted was the assurance of one man's love.

Chris was glad that Anna and Mat were reconciled, were going to be married and be happy, for he now realized that much of Anna's past misery was his own fault. But at the same time he wondered what tricks the malignant sea would play on Anna and Mat in the future.

ANNA OF THE FIVE TOWNS

Author: Arnold Bennett (1867-1931)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: Rural England

First published: 1902

Principal characters:

EPHRAIM TELLWRIGHT, a miser

ANNA, his older daughter

AGNES, his younger daughter

HENRY MYNORS, Anna's suitor

WILLIE PRICE, in love with Anna

BEATRICE SUTTON, Anna's friend

Critique:

Anna of the Five Towns was the first of Bennett's novels dealing with the pottery region of the Five Towns. It is primarily a novel of character, but Anna changes so slightly that the reader is hardly aware of any development in her attitudes or actions. In fact, her tragedy occurs because she cannot change her original nature. But in spite of certain weaknesses, the story has touches of Bennett's great writing skill and human insight and is worth the time of all Bennett lovers. The novel is also Bennett's most detailed study of the repressive effects of Wesleyanism, which affects all his characters in one degree or another.

The Story:

Ephraim Tellwright was a miser, one of the wealthiest men in any of the Five Towns, a group of separate villages joined by a single road. He was a former preacher, concerned more with getting congregations in good financial shape, however, than with the souls of his parishioners. Although he had made money from rentals and foreclosures, in addition to marrying money, he lived in the most frugal way possible and gave his two daughters nothing but the barest essentials. Both of his wives had died, the first giving him his daughter Anna and the second producing Agnes before her death. Mr. Tellwright was usually amiable. As long as his meals were on time, no money was wasted, and the house was never left alone and unguarded, he paid little attention to his daughters.

Anna loved her father even though she could never feel close to him. Agnes, much younger, followed her sister's lead. The two girls were especially close, since their father ignored them most of the time.

On Anna's twenty-first birthday her father called her into his office and told her that she would that day inherit almost fifty thousand pounds from her mother's estate. He had invested the original sum wisely until it had grown to a fortune. Anna, who had never owned one pound to call her own, could not comprehend an amount so large. Accustomed to letting her father handle all business affairs, she willingly gave him control of her fortune. The income from the stocks and rentals was deposited in the bank in her name, but she gave her father her checkbook and signed only when he told her to. The money made little difference in Anna's life; it simply lay in the bank until her father told her to invest it.

One result of the money, however, was unhappy for Anna. Among her properties was a run-down factory owned by Titus Price. Because Price was continually behind in his rent, Mr. Tellwright forced Anna to keep demanding something on account. Knowing that the property would never rent to anyone else, the old miser never put Price out but kept hounding him for as much as the man could pay. Anna usually had to deal with Willie Price, the son, and she always left the interview with a feeling of guilt. Although the sight of Willie's embarrassment left her unhappy, she always demanded his money because she was afraid to face her father without it.

A teacher in the Sunday School in which Anna taught was Henry Mynors, a pillar in the church and a successful man in the community. Anna, attracted to him, tried to join in his religious fervor, but she could not quite bring herself to repent and to accept God publicly. She felt repentance to be a private matter, not one to be dragged out in meeting. Henry was patient with her, however. When the townspeople said that he was interested mainly in her money, Anna refused to believe the gossip. Henry began to call on her occasionally, combining his courtship with business with Mr. Tellwright. The miser persuaded Anna to invest some of her money in Henry's business, after arranging first for a large share of the profits and a high interest. Anna, caring little for the money, liked to be associated with Henry and spent much time with him.

After Anna had received her fortune, she was invited for the first time to the house of Mrs. Sutton, the social leader of the town. Mrs. Sutton's daughter Beatrice and Anna became friends. There was talk that Beatrice and Henry Mynors had once been engaged. The Suttons took Anna and Henry to the Isle of Man on a vacation, and Anna thought there could never again be such luxurious living. She had had to take ten pounds of her own money without her father's knowledge in order to get clothes for the trip, and the miser had berated her viciously when she told him what she had done. Being with Henry and the Suttons, however, helped her forget his anger. When the vacation was marred by Beatrice's serious illness, Anna won a permanent place in the Suttons' affection by her unselfish and competent nursing.

After Beatrice had recovered, Anna and Henry returned home. Before they left the island Henry proposed to Anna and she accepted. Later her father gave his consent because Henry knew the value of money. Young Agnes was enchanted by the romantic aspects of the courtship, and Anna was happy in her quiet love for Henry. But her joy at being engaged was soon clouded by the news that old Mr. Price, Willie's father, had hanged himself. Anna felt that she and her father were to blame because they had hounded him for his rent. Henry assured her that Mr. Price was in debt to many people and that she need not feel guilty. Nevertheless, Anna worried a great deal about the suicide and about Willie.

Later Willie confessed to her that a bank note he had given in payment had been forged. The confession seemed to reduce Willie to nothing. Anna, realizing that he and his father had been driven to desperation, tried to protect Willie and his father's reputation by taking the forged note from her father's office. When she told Mr. Tellwright that she had burned the note, he was so furious with her that he never forgave her.

Because Willie was planning to make a fresh start in Australia, Henry arranged to buy the Price house for them to live in after he and Anna were married. Although Anna was sure she could never be happy in a house the miserable Prices had owned, she was docile and let Henry make all the arrangements.

When Anna told her father that she needed one hundred pounds to pay for her linens and her wedding clothes, Mr. Tell-wright denounced her for a spendthrift. Handing over the checkbook, he told her not to bother him again about her money. Henry, pleased at the turn of events, was full of plans for the use of Anna's fortune. Then there was more bad news about Mr. Price. Before his death he had defrauded the church of fifty pounds. Anna tried to cover up for him so that Willie would never know, but someone told the secret. Willie, ready to leave for Australia, heard of the theft. When he told Anna goodbye, he was like a whipped child. As Anna looked into his eyes for the last time, she knew suddenly that he loved her and that she loved him. She let him go, however, because she felt bound by her promise to Henry. She had been dutiful all her life; it was too late for her to change.

Willie was never heard from again. Had anyone in Five Towns happened to look into an abandoned pitshaft, the mystery of Willie would have been solved. The meek lad had found his only way to peace.

ANNALS OF THE PARISH

Author: John Galt (1779-1839)

Type of plot: Social chronicle

Time of plot: 1760-1810

Locale: Scotland

First published: 1821

Principal characters:

THE REVEREND MICAH BALWHIDDER, minister at Dalmailing

LORD EAGLESHAM, the minister's friend and patron

BETTY LANSHAW, the first Mrs. Balwhidder

LIZY KIBBOCK, the second Mrs. Balwhidder

MRS. NUGENT, a widow, the third Mrs. Balwhidder

MR. CAYENNE, an industrialist

LADY MACADAM, a high-spirited old lady in the parish

Critique:

John Galt was important to his own time both as a settler in Canada and as a novelist who presented Scottish life in fiction. As both a novelist and a leader in the Canada Company, he has, however, been largely forgotten. In the field of fiction Galt was so far overshadowed by Sir Walter Scott in his own time that he never became widely known outside of Britain, and the neglect has continued, unfortunately, to this time. A Scot himself, Galt wrote in the Annals of the Parish about the Scotland he and his parents had known, and he wrote lovingly. His humane feeling and the love he gave to his own country can be marked on almost every page he wrote. In this novel the strongest and most sympathetically portrayed character is of the Scottish Presbyterian clergyman of strict Calvinist persuasion. Hardly less important are the descriptions of the new class of industrialists.

The Story:

As a young man just out of divinity school at the University of Glasgow, and but recently accepted for the ministry, the Reverend Micah Balwhidder was appointed to the charge of the established Presbyterian church in the village of Dalmailing, in western Scotland. Because he had been appointed by a great landowner, without their approval, the people of Dalmailing tried to prevent Mr. Balwhidder from taking his post. On the Sunday Mr. Balwhidder was installed, the ministers officiating had to enter the church through a window, because the door had been nailed fast. Nor did they try to go to the church without a guard of soldiers.

Immediately after being installed, Mr.

Balwhidder began a series of visits to his parishioners, as he believed a good Calvinistic clergyman should do. He was rebuffed at door after door, until Thomas Thorl, the minister's most outspoken opponent, relented and accepted him. The rest of the parish followed within a matter of weeks. Soon after the excitement died down, Mr. Balwhidder married his first wife, Betty Lanshaw, a cousin with whom he had grown up; he believed strongly that a minister should be married to accomplish his best work.

During the first few years of his ministry, during the 1760's, Mr. Balwhidder fought earnestly against two habits among his parishioners, smuggling and drinking. He felt that both were sinful. In the end, however, he became reconciled to tea as a beverage, for he thought it better for his people to drink that instead of spirituous liquors. His main objection to smuggling was that it encouraged lawlessness among his people and resulted in the appearance of illegitimate children.

One of the chief problems in Dalmailing, so far as the minister was concerned, was the Malcolm family, composed of Mrs. Malcolm, a widow, and her five children. The minister always tried to help them succeed, for they were hard-working folk who had known better days. The first ray of success for them came when Charles Malcolm was made an officer in the merchant marine, an event which gladdened Mr. Balwhidder's heart. In that same year the first Mrs. Balwhidder died. Her death saddened the whole parish, for everyone had come to love her.

In the following year, 1764, Mr. Balwhidder tried to write a doctrinal book. He found, however, that he had too much to do to keep his house and servants in order and so he decided to look about for another wife, and none too soon, for one of his maidservants was with child. Some of the village gossips blamed the minister, although the actual father admitted his part in the affair. As soon as a year and a day had passed after his first wife's death, Mr. Balwhidder married

Lizy Kibbock, the daughter of a very successful farmer in the parish.

The second Mrs. Balwhidder immediately set out to augment her husband's stipend. She purchased cattle and hogs and set up a regular dairy. Within a year she had sufficient income from her projects so that the minister's pay could be put into the bank. Her husband approved heartily of her industry, not only because he himself was made comfortable but because the industry of his wife encouraged greater efforts on the part of other women in the parish. In that year three coal mines were opened in the parish, bringing new prosperity to the people.

In 1767 a great event occurred in the village's history. Lord Eaglesham, after being thrown in a muddy road which ran through the village, resolved to have a fine highway built to prevent a second occurrence. The new road made transportation much easier for the villagers. The event also caused the lord and Mr. Balwhidder to become friends, for at the time of the accident the clergyman had lent Lord Eaglesham some dry clothes. Through the nobleman's influence Mr. Balwhidder was on many occasions able to help the people of his village.

Scandal threatened the pulpit in 1772, when a visitor from another parish, Mr. Heckletext, was invited to speak. Shortly after his sermon the church session learned that he was the father of an illegitimate child by one of the village girls. It was a bitter lesson for Mr. Balwhidder, who resolved never again to permit a man to speak from his pulpit until he had thoroughly investigated the stranger's habits and character.

The 1770's were disturbing times for the minister of Dalmailing. Mr. Balwhidder was a peace-loving man who hated to see his young parishioners enlist to fight against the rebellious colonists in America. More especially, he hated to hear of the battles in which some of them were killed. The greatest blow given him by the war was the death of the widow Malcolm's son, who died a hero in a naval battle with the French. Mr. Balwhidder, who looked upon the fatherless Malcolm family as his particular charge, grieved as much as if the boy had been his own son.

He was also in difficulties with Lady MacAdam, an older woman who had been at court in England and France in her youth. A spirited woman who wanted to have a good time in life and to dictate to other people, she was beside herself when she learned that her son, an officer in the Royal Scots regiment, was in love with the oldest Malcolm girl. She mistreated the girl shamefully, refusing even to listen to the minister's remonstrations. Using his own judgment, he finally had to marry the young people against her wishes. She soon became reconciled, however, after the marriage had taken place.

After the close of the American Revolution, a loyal American who had returned to Britain settled in Dalmailing. This man, Mr. Cayenne, had a temper as fiery as his name. The weaving mill he set up near the village brought prosperity to the parish, but it also brought troubles. During the 1790's the weavers who settled there were in favor of the French Revolution, while Mr. Balwhidder and his more conservative parishioners were all against it. Aside from their political differences, the weavers also belonged to different faiths, a fact which gave the minister grave concern, for he disliked any other church to set itself up as long as the Presbyterian Church was the official church of the land. He fought a lengthy but losing battle against churches which preached other doctrines than his own. It was the one problem which he felt he could not solve, for the tide of history was against him.

In 1796, Mr. Balwhidder again became a widower. Still of the opinion that to serve his people best he ought to be a married man, he took another wife a year later. His third wife was Mrs. Nugent, a widow of good reputation.

As the years passed the minister's two children, a son and a daughter, grew up and were married. Finally, in 1810, the church authorities decided that Mr. Balwhidder who had served his parish for fifty years, should have some help. But he had become so deaf and so forgetful that he himself decided to retire. He preached a farewell sermon to his crowded church and then set himself to write into a book the annals of the parish he had served so long.

THE ANTIQUARY

Author: Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Late eighteenth century

Locale: Scotland

First published: 1816

Principal characters:

JONATHAN OLDBUCK OF MONKBARNs, the antiquary

LOVEL, an illegitimate son of unknown parents

SIR ARTHUR WARDOUR, a baronet, Oldbuck's friend

MISS ISABELLA WARDOUR, his daughter

EDIE OCHILTREE, a beggar

HECTOR M'INTYRE, Oldbuck's nephew

THE EARL OF GLENALLAN, present head of a powerful family

DOUSTERSWIVEL, a magician

Critique:

Not one of the most popular of Scott's novels, The Antiquary is nevertheless a respected member of the Waverley group and the novel most nearly contemporary to Scott's own time. Although it is a romance, it is also a novel of manners. Scott admitted that when necessary he sacrificed the plot in order to describe more clearly the manners of the characters, particularly those of the lower social classes. His characterizations of the Scottish peasants are much more vivid than are those of the upper classes. But the touch of magic that was Scott's is evident everywhere in this novel, as it is in all he wrote.

The Story:

When old Jonathan Oldbuck of Monkbnarns first met young Lovel, he was impressed by the young man's good manners and conduct; but he was also mystified by the little he could learn of Lovel's past. It was obvious that Lovel was not the boy's real name and that there was something in his history of which he was ashamed.

From his good friend Sir Arthur Wardour, Oldbuck at last learned something of Lovel's history. The young man was the illegitimate son of unknown parents. Although a benefactor had settled a large estate on him, he lived in solitude and disgrace because of his questionable ancestry. To make matters worse, he was in love with Sir Arthur's daughter, Isabella. Though the girl loved him, she would not accept him because she knew her father would not permit an alliance with a man of unknown and illegitimate origins. Even after Lovel had saved her life and that of her father, when they were trapped by the tides, she gave him no more than the thanks due him for his bravery.

Sir Arthur was in serious financial straits, in debt to dozens of tradesmen and friends, among them Oldbuck. In order to restore his fortune, he had fallen into a plot prepared by one Dousterswivel, an evil magician who had promised his aid in finding valuable minerals on Sir Arthur's property. Sir Arthur, forced to put up money before Dousterswivel would work his magic, had already borrowed one hundred pounds from Oldbuck, who suspected that Dousterswivel was the crook that he was.

Before the magician could attempt to work his magic, Oldbuck's nephew, Captain Hector M'Intyre, came home for a visit. A hot-headed young man, he accused Lovel of lying about the little he told of his past. Hector challenged Lovel to a duel, and although Lovel did everything he could to prevent it the duel was fought. Lovel wounded Hector fatally, or so it appeared, and was forced to flee the country on a boat provided by a friend. Hector did recover, but Lovel did not hear the news until much later. He had been aided in his flight by Edie Ochiltree, a beggar who knew all the secrets of the countryside. While Edie hid Lovel in a cave, they overheard Dousterswivel trying to convince Sir Arthur that he could find buried treasure in that cave, if Sir Arthur would put up the necessary money. Edie used that knowledge to good account.

When Sir Arthur asked Oldbuck for another hundred pounds to give to Dousterswivel so that he would get the treasure from the cave, Oldbuck insisted that they go to the cave and dig for the treasure. Although the magician tried to prevent the excursion, Oldbuck would not be denied. Everyone present was completely surprised when, after much digging, old Edie the beggar stuck a pick into the ground and hit a chest. When the chest was opened, the bewildered spectators found a fortune in coin; Sir Arthur was saved from disaster. Edie, in an attempt to pay back Dousterswivel, tricked him into digging for hours for more treasure that Edie said was also buried in the cave. He also arranged with a friend to have a specter appear and frighten the magician half to death.

About the same time there occurred another event which was to have great influence upon Oldbuck, Sir Arthur, and their friends. An old woman in the neighborhood sent for the Earl of Glen-allan, head of a wealthy and powerful family. Before she died, the old woman wanted to clear her conscience of a terrible wrong she had done the earl when he was a young man. The earl had been in love with a girl whom his mother hated, primarily because of her family. The earl had secretly married the girl before his mother, in a spiteful attempt to break up the romance, told her son that the girl was his own sister. Because of certain letters and the perjured testimony of servants, including the old woman telling the story, the earl had believed his mother's story. His wife had taken her own life, but before she died she had given birth to a male child. A servant had whisked the child away, and the old woman did not know whether he had lived or died. The earl, who had lived a life of misery because of the horrible crime he thought he had committed in marrying his own sister, was joyful at the news given him by the old crone, even though he grieved at the useless death of the girl he loved. He told the story to Oldbuck and asked his help in determining whether the child had lived.

While Oldbuck and the Earl of Glenallan were conducting their investigation, news came that the French were about to raid the Scottish coast. Hector, who was now fully recovered from the wound suffered at Lovel's hands, prepared to gather troops and meet Major Neville, an officer in charge of local defense. Lovel had not been heard from since the duel, and there were rumors that he had died at sea. Then old Edie brought the joyful news that the ship carrying Lovel had put in to shore and that all aboard were safe. From his remarks to Oldbuck, the old gentlemen learned that the money found in the cave on Sir Arthur's land had been buried there by Lovel and Edie after they had overheard the conversation between Dousterswivel and Sir Arthur. Lovel, hearing of Sir Arthur's financial difficulties, had taken that way of helping Isabella's father without embarrassing the old gentleman by offering him money outright.

When Major Neville appeared to take charge of the garrison, everyone was amazed to see that he was in reality Lovel. Lovel, or rather Major Neville, brought word that there would be no battle. A watchman had mistaken a bonfire for a signal that the French were coming. As they all stood talking, the Earl of Glenallan noted the young man's marked resemblance to his dead wife. Then the mystery was solved. Through old papers and the words of old servants of the Glenallan family, the earl learned that without doubt Lovel was his son. While a baby, the boy had been cared for by the earl's brother and, unknown to the earl, had inherited his uncle's fortune.

Lovel was restored to his rightful place, and within a month he and Isabella Wardour were married. From that time on all the friends lived in peace and prosperity and joy.

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA

Critique:

In his tragedies Shakespeare rose to dramatic heights seldom equaled. Although critics may argue to determine the greatest of his tragedies, surely Antony and Cleopatra is among the top few. Its scope is staggering; it covers the whole Roman Empire and the men who ruled it. Only a genius could match the greatness of the scenes with such beauty of poetry and philosophy. Here a man born to rule the world is brought to ruin by his weaknesses and lusts. Deserted by friends and subjects, he is denied even a noble death, but must attempt suicide. Even that he bungles. The tragedy is grimly played out; honor and nobility die, as well as the man.

The Story:

After the murder of Julius Caesar, the Roman Empire was ruled by three men, the noble triumvirs, Mark Antony, Lepidus, and Octavius, Caesar's nephew. Antony, having been given the Eastern sphere to rule, had gone to Alexandria and there he had seen and fallen passionately in love with Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt. She was the flower of the Nile, but a wanton who had been the mistress of Julius Caesar and of many others. Antony was so filled with lust for her that he ignored his own counsel and the warnings of his friends, and as long as possible he ignored also a request from Octavius Caesar that he return to Rome. Sextus Pompeius, son of Pompey the Great, and a powerful leader, was gathering troops to seize Rome from the rule of the triumvirs, and Octavius Caesar wished to confer with the other two, Antony and Lepidus. At last the danger of a victory by Sextus Pompeius, coupled with the news that his wife Fulvia was dead, forced Antony to leave Egypt and Cleopatra and journey to Rome.

Pompeius was confident of victory so long as Antony stayed in Egypt, for Antony was a better general than either Lepidus or Octavius. When Pompeius heard that Antony was headed toward Rome, his hope was that Octavius and Antony would not mend their quarrels but would continue to fight each other as they had in the past. Lepidus did not matter; he sided with neither of the other two, and cared little for conquest and glory. Pompeius faced disappointment, however, for Antony and Octavius mended their quarrels in the face of common danger. To seal their renewed friendship, Antony married Octavia, the sister of Octavius; through her, each general would be bound to the other. Thus it seemed that Pompeius' scheme to separate Antony and Octavius would fail. His last hope was that Antony's lust would send him back to Cleopatra; then he and Octavius would battle each other and Pompeius would conquer Rome. To stall for time, he sealed a treaty with the triumvirs. Antony, with his wife, went to Athens on business for the Empire. There word reached him that Lepidus and Octavius had waged war in spite of the treaty they had signed, and Pompeius had been killed. Octavius' next move was to seize Lepidus on the pretext that he had aided Pompeius. Now the Roman world had but two rulers, Octavius and Antony.

But Antony could not resist the lure of Cleopatra. Sending Octavia, his wife, home from Athens, he hurried back to Egypt. His return ended all pretense of friendship between him and Octavius.

Each man prepared for battle, the winner to be the sole ruler of the world. Cleopatra joined her forces with those of Antony. At first Antony was supreme on the land, but Octavius ruled the sea and lured Antony to fight him there. Antony's friends and captains, particularly loyal Enobarbus, begged him not to risk his forces on the sea, but Antony, confident of victory, prepared to match his ships with those of Octavius at Actium. But in the decisive hour of the great sea fight Cleopatra ordered her fleet to leave the battle, and sail for home. Antony, leaving the battle and his honor and his glory, followed her. Because he had set the example for desertion, many of his men left his forces and joined the standard of Octavius.

Antony was sunk in gloom at the folly of his own actions, but his lust had made him drunk with desire, and everything, even honor, must bow to Cleopatra. She protested that she did not know that Antony would follow her when she sailed away. Antony had reason enough to know she lied, but he still wanted the fickle wanton at any cost.

Octavius sent word to Cleopatra that she might have all her wishes granted if she would surrender Antony to Octavius. Knowing that Octavius was likely to be the victor in the struggle, she sent him a message of loyalty and of admiration for his greatness. Although Antony had seen her receive the addresses of Octavius' messenger, and even though he ranted and stormed at her for her faithlessness, she was easily able to dispel his fears and jealousy and make him hers again. After a failure to sue for peace, Antony decided to march again against his enemy. At this decision even the faithful Enobarbus left him and went over to Octavius, for he thought Antony had lost his reason as well as his honor. But Enobarbus too was an honorable man who shortly afterward died of shame for deserting his general.

On the day of the battle victory was in sight for Antony, in spite of overwhelming odds. But once more the flight of the Egyptian fleet betrayed him. His defeat left Octavius master of the world. Antony was like a madman, seeking nothing but revenge on treacherous Cleopatra. When the queen heard of his rage, she had word sent to him that she was dead, killed by her own hand out of love for him. Convinced once more that Cleopatra had been true to him, Antony called on Eros, his one remaining follower, to kill him so that he could join Cleopatra in death. But faithful Eros killed himself rather than stab his beloved general. Determined to die, Antony fell on his own sword. Even that desperate act was without dignity or honor, for he did not die immediately and he could find no one who loved him enough to end his pain and misery. While he lay there, a messenger brought word that Cleopatra still lived. He ordered his servants to carry him to her. There he died in her arms, each proclaiming eternal love for the other.

When Octavius Caesar heard the news of Antony's death, he grieved. Although he had fought and conquered Antony, he lamented the sorry fate of a great man turned weakling, ruined by his own lust. He sent a messenger to assure Cleopatra that she would be treated royally, that she should be ruler of her own fate. But the queen learned, as Antony had warned her, that Octavius would take her to Rome to march behind him in his triumphant procession, where she, a queen and mistress to two former rulers of the world, would be pinched and spat upon by rabble and slaves. To cheat him of his triumph, she put on her crown and all her royal garb, placed a poisonous asp on her breast, and lay down to die. Charmian and Iras, her loyal attendants, died the same death. Octavius Caesar, entering her chamber, saw her dead, but as beautiful and desirable as in life. There was only one thing he could do for his one-time friend and the dead queen: he ordered their burial in a common grave, together in death as they had wished to be in life.

Critique:

This novel is in the tradition of the roaring twenties; it deals with prohibition, bootleggers, easy morals. In style it recalls F. Scott Fitzgerald, who is mentioned in the book. The character analysis is somewhat in the manner of Lewis' Babbitt. Appointment in Samarra goes beyond mere pandering to sensationalism, however, in that it sustains a theme of moral judgment, as implied by the title. The lives led by these people can have no fruitful or important end.

The Story:

Julian English was thirty, a congenial seller of cars, popular with the country club set. He had the right connections with Ed Charney, the local bootlegger, and consequently was always well supplied with liquor. He and Caroline had been married four years. They were both natives of Gibbsville and had an assured social position. They had no children.

Just before Christmas they went to a party at the country club. As usual, Julian had had too much to drink. He sat idly twirling his highball and listening to Harry Reilly's stories. Harry was a rich Irish Catholic and definitely a social climber. Actually, Julian hated Harry, although Harry had lent him twenty thousand dollars the previous summer to bolster his Cadillac agency. But that loan did not give Harry the right to make passes at Caroline, Julian thought darkly.

Harry told stories in paragraphs. He always paused at the right time. Julian kept thinking how fitting it would be if he stopped the stories by throwing his drink in Harry's face. Julian grew bored. On impulse he did throw his drink in Harry's face. A big lump of ice hit Harry in the eye.

On the way home Julian and Caroline quarreled furiously. Julian accused his wife of infidelity with Harry, among other people. Caroline said that Julian always drank too much and chased women as well. More important, Harry had a mortgage on the car agency and a good deal of influence with the Catholics, and he was a man who could hold a grudge.

Al Grecco was a little man who as Ed Charney's handyman had a certain standing in the town. He liked Julian because Julian was the only one of the social set who was really friendly. Al grew up on the wrong side of the tracks. Before he was finally sentenced to a year in prison he had been arrested several times. When he got out he worked in a poolroom for a while until his boss died. The widow wanted Al to stay on as manager, but he went to work for Charney. Now he delivered bootleg booze, ran errands, and kept an eye on the torch singer at the Stage Coach, a country inn owned by Charney. Helene Holman, the singer, was Charney's girl, and if she were not carefully watched, she might out of sheer good-heartedness extend her favors to other men.

On Christmas Day Julian woke up with a hangover. As was his custom, he quarreled with the cook. At Caroline's suggestion he went to Harry Reilly's house to apologize. Although Reilly's sister was sympathetic, she brought down word that Harry would not see him; he had a black eye and still nursed a grouch.

Julian's father and mother came for Christmas dinner. The father, a staid, successful surgeon, was suspicious of his son. He always looked for evidence of moral weakness in Julian, for his own father had committed suicide after embezzling a fortune. He was afraid that the English inheritance was stained. Dinner was a trying time.

Caroline and Julian had supper at the club. The usual crowd was there. Julian was unmercifully ribbed in the locker room. In a dismal mood he sat drinking by himself while he waited for a chance to see Father Creedon and ask him to patch up his affair with Harry. The old priest was sympathetic and made light of the incident. After agreeing that Harry was a bore, he promised to send Julian some good Irish whiskey.

Ed Charney was a good family man who spent Christmas Day with his wife and son. He intended to go out to the Stage Coach only in the evening. Then his son became suddenly ill. It looked as if he would have to stay home. Mindful of Helene's weaknesses, he telephoned Al Grecco to go out to the inn and keep watch on her. It was Christmas night and she would be drinking too much. Al did not care for the assignment, but he dutifully went out to the inn and sat down with Helene.

The country club set began to drift in. Froggy Ogden, who was Caroline's one-armed cousin, was the oldest man there; he seemed to feel a responsibility for Julian, who was still drinking. In a spirit of bravado Julian danced several times with Helene, even though Al warned him of Charney's anger. Finally, carried away by the music and too many drinks, Julian and Helene left the dance floor. Caroline and Froggy found Julian in a stupor in the back of a sedan and took him home.

The day after Christmas Caroline went to her mother and announced her intention to divorce Julian. Her mother found it difficult to listen to her daughter; she believed herself above the foibles of the younger generation. Caroline thought herself a heroine in an old-fashioned melodrama. But she was determined not to go back to Julian. After meeting him on the street and quarreling again, she canceled the big party they were to have given that evening.

Al Grecco, as he backed out of the garage with a case of Scotch, had decided to kill Ed Charney. When Charney had phoned him, he had tried to excuse his lack of vigilance: he protested that he had only let Helene dance. But Ed in a rage had said some things that Al could not accept.

Determined to look businesslike, Julian went to his office at the auto agency. He sat importantly at his desk and wrote figures on a piece of scratch paper. The only conclusion he could reach was that he needed more money. One of his salesmen came in to try to lay down the law. He asserted that Julian's difficulties were gossiped about strenuously in the little town of Gibbville. The offense to Charney was particularly grave: he had been a good friend to the agency and had helped them sell cars to other bootleggers.

Julian left the office in no cheerful mood. He wandered into his club for lunch. Since it was the day after Christmas, the dining-room was deserted except for some elderly lawyers and Froggy. Avoiding his wife's cousin, Julian sat down in a far corner of the room. After picking up his plate, Froggy followed him and began to reproach him for his conduct with the torch singer. He told Julian he had always distrusted him and had warned Caroline about his conduct many times. When Froggy invited him outside to fight, Julian refused because he could not hit a one-armed man. Froggy became more insulting, so that the lawyers came to their table to interfere. Julian was intensely angered when they seemed to side with Froggy. Turning quickly, he hit one of the lawyers full in the mouth and dislodged his false teeth.

Julian went home and fell asleep. About ten o'clock a society reporter awoke him when she came to get a story about the canceled party. After several drinks, he tried to seduce her but with no success. As soon as she left, Julian went to the garage, closed the door, and started the motor. He was pronounced a suicide by the coroner.

Critique:

The Arabian Nights' Entertainments is the title usually used in English to designate a group of tales more properly called The Thousand and One Nights. These stories, adapted and formalized by bazaar storytellers, had their origins in many lands throughout the East and were handed down by word of mouth for hundreds of years. Some present interesting parallels. In the story of "The Three Sisters" a baby is put in a basket to float down a river, a circumstance reminiscent of the Biblical account of

Moses in the bulrushes. In Sindbad's various journeys by sea there are similarities to the wanderings of Ulysses as related by Homer, in one instance a close parallel to the Cyclops story. Some of the characters have been drawn from history. But whether the source is folklore, religious tradition, or history, the tales have a timeless quality appealing, from legendary times to the present, to authors of every sort. Stories of Robin Hood have the same flavor. More recently, Gilbert and Sullivan used the "sisters and the cousins and the aunts" grouping such as Aladdin employed to impress the sultan that he had plenty of followers to back his cause as suitor for the hand of the princess. Most scholars believe that the collection took its present form in Cairo in the fifteenth century; it was introduced to the Western World in a translation by Antoine Galland, published in Paris in 1704. Traditionally there were a thousand and one stories told by Scheherazade to her emperor-husband, but in extant manuscripts the tales are not always the same. Practically all modern editions contain only a small portion of the complete collection. Those most frequently reprinted have become minor classics of the world's literature.

The Stories:

Convinced by the treachery of his brother's wife and his own that all women were unfaithful, Shahriar, Emperor of Persia and India, vowed that he would marry a new wife every day and have her executed the next morning. Only Scheherazade, wise as well as beautiful, had the courage to try to save the young women of Persia. On the night of her marriage to Shahriar, she began to tell him a tale which fascinated him so much that he stayed her death for one more night so that he could learn the end of the story. Scheherazade told him stories for one thousand and one nights. At that time, convinced of her worthiness and goodness, he bade her live and made her his consort.

One tale Scheherazade told was "The History of the Fisherman and the Genie": A poor Mussulman fisherman drew from the sea in his nets a strange box with a seal on top. When he pried off the top, a huge genie appeared and threatened him with death, offering the poor man no more than his choice in the manner of his death. The fisherman begged for his life because he had done the genie a favor by releasing him, but the genie declared that he had vowed death to the man who opened the box. Finally the fisherman exclaimed that he could not believe anything as huge and terrible as the genie could ever have been in a space so small. Dissolving into a cloud of smoke, the genie shrank until he could slip back into the box, whereupon the fisherman clamped on the lid. Throwing the box back into the sea, he warned all other fishermen to beware if it should ever fall into their nets.

Another story was "The History of the Young King of the Black Isles": A fisherman caught four beautiful fish, one white, one red, one blue, and one yellow. They were so choice that he took them to the sultan's palace. While the fish were being cooked, a beautiful girl suddenly appeared and talked to the fish, after which they were too charred to take to the sultan. When the same thing happened two days in a row, the sultan was called. After asking where the fish came from, he decided to visit the lake. Nearby he found a beautiful, apparently deserted palace. As he walked through the beautiful halls, he found one in which a king was sitting on a throne. The king apologized for not rising, explaining that his lower half was marble.

He was the King of the Black Isles. When he had learned that his queen was unfaithful to him, he had nearly killed her blackamoor lover. In revenge the queen had cast a spell over her husband, making him half marble. Daily she whipped him, then had him dressed in coarse goat's hair over which his royal robes were placed. In the meantime, while she had kept her lover barely alive, she had changed her husband's town and all its inhabitants into the lake full of fish.

The king told the sultan where the queen's lover was kept. There the sultan went, killed the lover, and put himself in the blackamoor's place. The queen, overjoyed to hear speaking the one she had kept from the edge of death so long, hastened to do all the voice commanded. She restored the king to his human form and the lake to its pre-vicious state as a populous town. The four colors of fish indicated the four different religions of the inhabitants.

When the queen returned to the sultan, whom she mistook for her lover, he killed her for her treachery. Thereafter he took home with him the King of the Black Isles, and rewarded the fisherman who had led him to the magic lake.

Shahriar was vastly entertained by "The History of Sindbad the Sailor": A poor porter in Baghdad, resting before the house of Sindbad, bewailed the fact that his lot was harder than that of Sindbad. Overhearing him, Sindbad invited the porter to dine with him. During the meal he told of the hardships he had suffered in order to make his fortune.

On his first voyage, to India by way of the Persian Gulf, Sindbad's ship was becalmed near a small green island. The sailors climbed upon the island, only to find that it was really a sea monster which heaved itself up and swam away. Sindbad was the only man who did not get back to the ship. After days of clinging to a piece of driftwood, he landed on an island where some men were gathered. They led him to a maharajah who treated Sindbad graciously. When he had been there some time his own ship came into port, and he claimed his bales of goods, to the astonishment of the captain, who thought he had seen Sindbad killed at sea. Then Sindbad sailed home in the ship in which he had set out.

The porter was so impressed with the first tale that he came again to hear a second. On his second voyage Sindbad was left asleep on an island where the sailors had rested. There he found a huge roc's egg. Knowing that the parent bird would return to the nest at dusk, he waited. When it came, he used his turban to tie himself to the bird's leg. In the morning the bird flew to a place surrounded by mountains. There Sindbad freed himself when the bird descended to pick up a serpent. The place seemed deserted, except for large serpents. Diamonds of great size were scattered throughout the valley.

Sindbad remembered that merchants were said to throw joints of meat into the diamond valley, from which big eagles carried the joints to their nests close to shore. At the nests the merchants frightened away the birds and recovered diamonds which had stuck to the meat. Sindbad collected some large diamonds. Then with his turban he fastened a piece of meat to his back and lay down. An eagle picked him up and carried him to its nest. When he was dropped into a nest, the merchant who claimed the nest was indignant and accused Sindbad of stealing his property. Sindbad offered him some choice diamonds. In return the merchant was glad to take the adventurer back to civilization.

On his third voyage Sindbad was wrecked on an island inhabited by cannibal dwarfs and huge black creatures with only one eye in the middle of their foreheads. Sindbad and his friends blinded one black giant, but two others helped the blind one to chase the sailors. By the time the giants and a large serpent had overtaken them, only Sindbad was lucky enough to escape.

Sindbad sailed from a port in Persia on his fourth voyage. He and his friends were shipwrecked on an island inhabited by black cannibals who fattened the sailors before killing them. Sindbad refused the food, grew too thin to interest the black men, and finally found his way to the shore. There he met white men who took him to their kingdom. To please the king, Sindbad made a fine saddle. In appreciation the king married Sindbad to a beautiful girl. In that country a man or woman was buried alive if the spouse died. When Sindbad's wife died, he was put in a tomb with a small amount of bread and water. As he ate the last of his food he heard an animal snuffling, then running away. Following the sound, he found himself on the shore and hailed a ship which carried him home.

Sindbad used his own ship on his fifth voyage. After his sailors had broken open a roc's egg, the parent rocs hurled tremendous stones on the ship and broke it to pieces. Sindbad came under the power of the Old Man of the Sea and escaped only after making the old man so intoxicated that he loosed his death grip on Sindbad. Again Sindbad found a ship to take him home; he did much profitable trading on the way.

All his companions on the sixth voyage succumbed on a beautiful but lifeless coast. Sindbad, expecting to die, built a raft which he put in an underground river to drift where it would. When he reached the kingdom of Serendib, he had to be revived. He found the country exceedingly rich and the people kind. When he asked to be allowed to go home, the king sent him there with rich presents for Sindbad's ruler, the Caliph Harun-al-Rashid of Baghdad.

Sindbad made his seventh and final voyage to take gifts from the caliph to the King of Serendib. He carried them safely, but his return trip was delayed when corsairs seized his ship and sold the sailors into slavery. Sindbad, sold to an ivory merchant, was ordered to shoot an elephant a day. Annoyed at Sindbad's persistence, an elephant picked him up and took him to an elephant burial ground, to which Sindbad and his owner returned many times to gather ivory. As a reward, the merchant sent Sindbad home with rich goods.

Another diverting tale was "The History of Prince Ahmed": Houssain, Ali, and Ahmed, sons of the Sultan of India, were all in love with the Princess Nouronihar, their father's ward. To determine who should be the bridegroom, the sultan sent them out to find the most extraordinary things they could. Whoever brought back the rarest object would win the hand of the princess.

Houssain found a magic carpet which would transport him wherever he wished. Ali found an ivory tube containing a glass which would show any object he wished to see. Ahmed found an artificial apple, the odor of which would cure any illness.

The three princes met before they journeyed home. As they displayed their gifts, Houssain, looking through the tube, saw the princess apparently at the point of death. They all jumped on his magic carpet and were whisked to her bedroom, where Ahmed used his magic apple to revive her. The sultan could not determine which article was the most unusual, for all had been of use to effect the princess' recovery. He suggested an archery contest. Prince Ali shot farther than Houssain, but Ahmed's arrow could not be found. The sultan decided in favor of Ali. Houssain retired to become a dervish. Ahmed, instead of attending the wedding, went in search of his arrow, which he found at the foot of a mountain, much farther away than he could have shot. Looking around, he found a door into the mountain. When he passed through the door, he found a fairy called Periebanou, who pleased him so much that he married her.

When Ahmed went to visit his father, he refused to discuss where or how he lived, but he appeared to be so rich that the courtiers grew jealous and persuaded the sultan that it was dangerous to have his son so powerful a neighbor. The sultan asked Ahmed to perform unreasonable tasks, made possible only by Periebanou's help; but while fulfilling one request her brother became so annoyed with the sultan that he killed him. Ahmed became sultan and afterward dealt kindly with his brothers.

Scheherazade pleased her lord also with "The History of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves": Ali Baba was a Persian woodcutter. One day, to hide from a band of strange horsemen, he climbed a tree under which they halted. When the leader cried, "Open, Sesame!" to a rock nearby, a door opened through which the men carried their heavy packs. After the men left, Ali Baba used the secret word to in-investigate the cave. He found such riches there that the gold he took could never be missed.

He and his wife were content with that amount, but his brother Cassim, to whom he had told his story, was greedy for more wealth. Without telling Ali Baba, Cassim went to the cave. He was so excited by the gold that he forgot the password and could not get out. The robbers found and murdered him.

The robbers tried to find Ali Baba in order to kill him and so keep the secret of their hoard. The leader brought his men, hidden in oil jars, to Ali Baba's house, but a beautiful slave, Morgiana, went in search of oil, discovered the ruse, and killed the bandits. Again the captain, disguised as a merchant, entered the house, but Morgiana saw through his disguise and killed him.

To reward Morgiana, Ali Baba not only made her a free woman, but he also gave her to his son in marriage. Ali Baba was then the only one who knew the secret of the cave. He used the hidden wealth in moderation and passed the secret on to his posterity.

No less pleasing was "The History of Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp": Aladdin was a youthful vagabond who lived in China. An African magician, sensing that Aladdin would suit his plans, and pretending to be the boy's rich uncle, took him to a secret place to get a magic lamp. Passing through halls stored with treasures, Aladdin filled his gown with so many things that he could not give the magician the lamp at the moment he wanted it, and the magician sealed him up in the earth. By chance Aladdin rubbed a ring which the magician had given him. A genie appeared and escorted him home.

When Aladdin showed his mother the lamp, she tried to clean it to sell. As she rubbed, another genie appeared from whom Aladdin asked food. The food appeared on silver trays that Aladdin sold one by one to a Jewish chapman. When an honest jeweler stopped Aladdin one day and asked to buy the silver, Aladdin began to realize the great riches he had at his finger tips, enough to win him the sultan's daughter as his wife.

Because the grand vizier wanted his own son to marry the princess, he suggested many outrageous demands which the sultan made upon Aladdin before he could be considered a suitor. The genies produced slaves, costumes, jewelry, gold, and chargers in such profusion that the sultan gladly accepted Aladdin's suit. Overnight Aladdin had the genie build a magnificent palace next to the sultan's.

Life went smoothly until the African magician, while Aladdin was away, persuaded the princess to trade the old lamp for a new one. Then the magician transported the great palace to Africa. When Aladdin came home, the sultan threatened him with arrest, but allowed him forty days in which to find the palace with the princess therein. Rubbing his ring by chance and summoning its genie, Aladdin asked to be carried wherever his palace was. The princess was overjoyed to see him. After he had killed the magician by a ruse, he ordered the genie of the lamp to transport the palace back to China. There, after disposing of the magician's brother, who had followed them, Aladdin and the princess lived happily ever after.

CASH,
DARL,
JEWEL, and
VARDAMAN, their sons
DEWEY DELL, their daughter

Critique:

Centered around the effect of Addie Bundren's death and burial on the members of her family, this novel has a powerful unity not always found in Faulkner's longer works. The author tells the simple story through the eyes and minds of each of his characters. This method of shifting the multiple points of view binds the Bundrens into a homogeneous group beset by the tragedy of Addie's death and the frustrations connected with her burial, yet each character emerges clearly with his own secrets, his own emotional abnormality.

The Story:

Addie Bundren was dying. She lay propped up in a bed in the Bundren farmhouse, looking out the window at her son Cash as he built the coffin in which she was to be buried. Obsessed with perfection in carpentry, Cash held up each board for her approval before he nailed it in place. Dewey Dell, Addie's daughter, stood beside the bed, fanning her mother as she lay there in the summer heat. In another room Anse Bundren, Addie's husband, and two sons, Darl and Jewel, discussed the possibility of the boys' making a trip with a wagonload of lumber to earn three dollars for the family. Because Addie's wish was that she be buried in Jefferson, the town where her relatives lay, Anse was afraid the boys might not get back in time to carry her body to the Jefferson graveyard. He finally approved the trip and Jewel and Darl set out.

Addie died while the two brothers were gone and before Cash could finish the coffin. When it was obvious that she was dying, a Dr. Peabody was summoned, but he came too late to help the sick woman. While Dr. Peabody was at the house, Vardaman, the youngest boy, arrived home with a fish he had caught in the river; his mother's death somehow became entangled in his mind with the death of the fish and, because Dr. Peabody was there when she died, Vardaman thought the doctor had killed her.

Meanwhile a great rainstorm came up. Jewel and Darl, with their load of lumber, were delayed on the road by a broken wagon wheel. Cash kept working through the rain, trying to finish the coffin. At last it was complete and Addie was placed in it, but the crazed Vardaman, who once had almost smothered in his crib, tried to let his mother out by boring holes through the top of the coffin.

After Jewel and Darl finally got back with the wagon, neighbors gathered at the Bundren house for the funeral service, which was conducted by Whitfield, the minister. Whitfield had once been a lover of Addie's after her marriage, and Jewel, the son whom she seemed to favor, had been fathered by the minister.

Following the service, Anse, his family, and the dead Addie started out for Jefferson, normally one hard day's ride away. The rainstorm, however, had so swollen the river that the bridge had been broken up and could not be crossed by wagon. After trying another bridge, which had also been washed out, they drove back to an old ford near the first bridge. Three of the family—Anse, Dewey Dell, and Vardaman, with the assistance of Vernon Tull, a neighboring farmer—got across the river on the ruins of the bridge. Then Darl and Cash attempted to drive the wagon across at the obliterated ford, with Jewel leading the way on his spotted horse. This horse was Jewel's one great possession; he had earned the money to purchase it by working all day at the Bundren farm and then by working all night clearing ground for a neighbor. When the wagon was nearly across, a big log floating downstream upset the wagon. As a result, Cash broke his leg and nearly died; the mules were drowned; the coffin fell out, but was dragged to the bank by Jewel; and Cash's carpenter's tools were scattered in the water and had to be recovered one by one.

Anse refused the loan of anyone's mules, insisting that he must own the team that carried Addie to the grave. He went off to bargain for mules and made a trade in which he offered, without Jewel's consent, to give the spotted horse as part payment. When Jewel found out what his father had done, he rode off, apparently abandoning the group. Later it turned out that he had put the spotted horse in the barn of Snopes, who was dickering with Anse. And so they got their new mules and the trip continued.

By the time they arrived in Mottson, a town on the way to Jefferson, Addie had been dead so long that buzzards followed the wagon. In Mottson they stopped to buy cement to strengthen Cash's broken leg. The police and citizens, whose noses were offended, insisted that the wagon move on, but they bought the cement and treated the leg before they would budge. While they were in the town, Dewey Dell left the wagon, went to a drugstore, and tried to buy medicine which would abort the illegitimate child she carried, for she had become pregnant by a man named Lefe, with whom she had worked on the farm. The druggist refused to sell her the medicine.

Addie Bundren had been dead nine days and was still not buried. The family spent the last night before their arrival in Jefferson at the house of a Mr. Gillespie, who allowed them to put the odorous coffin in his barn. During the night Darl, whom the neighbors had always thought to be the least sane of the Bundrens, set fire to the barn. Jewel rescued the coffin by carrying it out on his back. Anse later turned Darl over to the authorities at Jefferson; they sent him to the asylum in Jackson.

Lacking a spade and shovel to dig Addie's grave, Anse stopped at a house in Jefferson and borrowed these tools. The burial finally took place. Afterward Dewey Dell again tried to buy her medicine at a drugstore. One of the clerks pretended to be a doctor, gave her some innocuous fluid, and told her to come back that night for further treatment. The further treatment took the form of a seduction in the basement of the drugstore.

Cash's broken leg, encased in cement, had by now become so infected that Anse took him to Dr. Peabody, who said that Cash might not walk for a year. Before starting on the trip home, Anse bought himself a set of false teeth that he had long needed. He then returned the borrowed tools. When he got back to the wagon he had acquired not only the new teeth but also a new Mrs. Bundren, the woman who lent him the tools.

NARDZEWSKI, Raphael's uncle

Critique:

Much of this work is in the German romantic tradition. Żeromski describes nature in great detail and devotes long sections to philosophical speculations engendered by contemplation of nature. The tragic love affair of Helen and Raphael and the frequent unconnected sequences of action are reminiscent of Goethe. In contrast, the scenes descriptive of some of the Napoleonic campaigns are precise and realistic. As a historical novel, Ashes ranks high, and as an author Żeromski was acknowledged a master by Conrad.

The Story:

When he was very young, Raphael Olbromski paid a short visit to his uncle's secluded estate. Nardzewski, fond of his nephew, initiated him into the art of hunting. The fierce old man was a firm adherent to feudal times and treated his peasants as serfs. Casper, his huntsman, was his only intimate. Raphael's visit came to a sudden end with the arrival of an Austrian official.

The Austrian lectured Nardzewski severely on the necessity of paying the new taxes and modifying his treatment of his peasants, but the old man had no intention of truckling to the Austrians. To emphasize his attitude, he practiced his pistol marksmanship in the dining hall. Defiantly Nardzewski ordered his steward to summon all the peasants in the morning and to arrange for a public flogging of a miscreant. Raphael never learned what happened afterward because early in the morning he was bundled into a sleigh and sent home.

attracted all the gentry. Raphael, mounted on a spirited horse, followed Helen's sleigh closely. The party stopped to dance at Raphael's poor house, and his aristocratic father staged a big celebration. During the affair Raphael managed to tell Helen that he would come to her window some midnight. The party lasted for two days, but Raphael missed much of it because he slept in a drunken stupor.

At school Raphael was no student, but he was a leader. One evening he and Christopher stole a rowboat and went out into the ice-packed Vistula. When they tried to land, the thin shore ice broke and the boys were soaked. As they went on toward school, they sank into a bog. They were nearly frozen before Raphael took vigorous measures. He tore off his clothes and those of the weakened Christopher, and the boys pummeled each other to get warm. Then, quite naked, they ran back to school, to be caught as they tried to slip inside. Christopher fell ill with fever, and Raphael as the leader was sentenced to be chastised. When the beadle tried to carry out the punishment, Raphael drew a knife, wounded the beadle, and escaped.

His father, when he arrived home in disgrace, imprisoned him in a small room and forbade the family to speak to him. Later he had to spend months working with the peasants. One night Raphael took a fine mare from the barn and rode through a storm to Helen's house. When a watchman came upon them in an outbuilding, Helen got back to her bedroom safely, but Raphael barely escaped ahead of the fierce watchdogs.

A storm came up. Raphael was followed by four wolves. When his horse stumbled, the wolves were on him. Three brought down the horse; Raphael killed the fourth with his hands. Gravely wounded, he was found by an old peasant and taken home. When he recovered, he was cast out of the family and sent to live with his older brother Peter, who had been cast out years before.

Peter, in poor health from war wounds, lived quietly. Raphael spent delightful months in idleness until the arrival of Prince Gintult, an old comrade of Peter's. Peter and the prince had angry words on the treatment of peasants, and as the result of the quarrel Peter had a hemorrhage and died. With no home and melancholy with memories of Helen, who had been taken out of the country, Raphael went to stay with the prince.

In the noble household Raphael was half family, half guest. The prince gave him money for clothes and others gave him errands to run. Raphael was particularly attracted to the prince's sister Elizabeth, a haughty young girl. One day, while they were riding in a group, Elizabeth's horse ran away. Raphael rescued her and made the mistake of kissing her as he held her in his arms. She slashed his face with her whip.

The prince suddenly departed on a voyage to Venice and Paris, after paying Raphael's lodging in a school for a year. Raphael studied fairly well and spent his time profitably. When he was forced to return home, his stern father outfitted him in work clothes and for four years he worked on the farm. His release came with an offer of a position from Prince Gintult.

In Warsaw, Raphael served as secretary to the prince, who was writing a vague philosophical treatise on Freemasonry. In order to continue the work on the secret lodge, Raphael was taken into the Masons; soon afterward he was accepted in society. Through the lodge, he met Helen again.

Abruptly Raphael and Helen fled to the country to enjoy their love. One night they slept in a cave in the mountains. Although Raphael was armed, brigands overpowered him as he slept and bound him while they had their sport with Helen. She escaped their clutches at last and jumped over a cliff.

While he was searching for Helen's body and tracking the brigands, Raphael was arrested by a patrol. He did not dare give his right name or mention Helen for fear of defiling her memory, and while in prison he had a long siege of fever. More than a year passed before he was released.

Penniless and tramping aimlessly about the country, Raphael fell in with his old friend Christopher. The reunited friends spent happy months on Christopher's estate. Then a soldier who had been with Napoleon for twelve years fired their imagination, and they decided to leave that Austrian-dominated part of Poland and join the emperor. Aided by Elizabeth, who was now married and living near the border, they made a daring escape across the frontier.

Christopher, as an enlisted man, crossed Europe with Napoleon and took part in the Spanish campaign. His most vivid impressions were those of the siege of Saragossa, where he distinguished himself for valor and saved a young girl from soldiers who sacked a convent and raped the nuns. He was thrilled when Napoleon abolished the Inquisition. After he had been wounded, he saw the emperor at close hand.

Raphael saw action in Poland, where the Austrian legions were too strong for Napoleon's forces. Once the Poles were preparing to demolish a church, held by the enemy. Prince Gintult, fighting as a civilian, attempted to save the church by interfering with the cannoneers, and Raphael helped him. For his deed the prince was cut down by an officer's sword. In the confusion Raphael carried the wounded nobleman away to his father's house.

When the fighting died down, Raphael was discharged. He went to live at his uncle's old estate, and for a time he was happy there. He rebuilt the barns demolished by the soldiers and cleared land. Then he began building a house. Just as he was finishing, Christopher arrived. Invalided out of the army, but well again, he was impatient for action. Reluctant to leave his home, Raphael objected at first; but finally he agreed to accompany his friend. In the middle of August, 1812, the Polish Corps was united with the Grand Army, and Raphael returned to serve the emperor. At Orsha, Napoleon reviewed his hordes of Polish, Dutch, Italian, and German soldiers.

JACQUES MÉNÉTRIER, a young scholar

MAÎTRE JÉRÔME COIGNARD, an abbot

CATHERINE, a temptress

JAEL, a Jewess

MONSIEUR D'ASTARAC, a philosopher

Critique:

At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque (La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque) was the first of France's many works to exhibit in full his peculiar talents. This tale is gusty in outline and overlaid with vast erudition in philosophy and in ancient history. In plot the novel is reminiscent of Tom Jones but the treatment is pure Gallic. France's humor is always subtle and at times wicked. In the Abbé Jérôme he has created a memorable character, the fluent, scoundrelly cleric who becomes a sympathetic creation.

The Story:

Jacques Ménétrier's father was a merry cook and his mother a long-suffering, plain woman. The father spent several hours each night at a nearby tavern in the company of Jeannette, the hurdy-gurdy woman, and Catherine, the lace maker. Both ladies helped him relive his lusty youth.

When Jacques was six, he was stationed all day long in the chimney corner to turn the spitted roasts. His time was not altogether wasted, however, for he learned his letters at the same time from a beggar Capuchin, Brother Ange. The good Brother Ange ate well at the common table in return for his services, and in secret he sighed for Catherine.

After a drunken brawl, Brother Ange was imprisoned, and Maître Jérôme Coignard, a Greek and Latin scholar, became Jacques' tutor. As he grew to young manhood he progressed rapidly under the scholar's teachings.

Jeannette, complaisant with all, initiated Jacques into the mysteries of love, but, perversely, Jacques was attracted to Catherine, who made fun of Jacques' beardless chin and refused to take him seriously. Jacques and his father were greatly discomfited when she ran away with Brother Ange.

One evening a tall, gaunt philosopher entered abruptly, crying that he saw a salamander in the fireplace. Vigorously stirring the ashes, he asked the company

if they saw anything. Only Jacques thought he saw the outlines of a beautiful woman in the smoke. The philosopher was much pleased with Jacques' discernment.

When Monsieur d'Astarac, their strange visitor, learned that the Maître Jérôme could read Greek easily, he arranged to have the abbot and Jacques come live with him.

At the ruined estate of the philosopher, the two friends were astonished by the rich library. In spite of crumbling walls and overgrown grounds, d'Astarac was evidently wealthy as well as learned. Maître Jérôme was set to work translating the ancient works of Zosimus the Panopolitan, with Jacques as his helper. According to d'Astarac, the only other inhabitant of the estate was Mosaïde, a learned Jew over a hundred years old. The Jew lived mysteriously withdrawn in a separate cottage, where he worked on old Hebrew manuscripts.

After several tranquil months Jacques went for an evening walk into Paris. Brother Ange came up and whispered that a lady was eagerly awaiting him in her carriage. At the rendezvous Jacques found Catherine seated in an elegant coach. Astonished at her magnificence, Jacques learned that she was now the mistress of de la Guéritaude, a tax collector. Then they kissed fervently and made an appointment for later that night.

On Jacques' arrival, the house where Catherine lived was in disturbance. She, half-dressed, was shrieking at the door and lackeys were pursuing Brother Ange with spears. De la Guéritaude had surprised her with her monk. Jacques comforted Catherine ardently, but when de la Guéritaude returned he rudely shoved Jacques into the street and slammed the door.

Soon afterward d'Astarac summoned Jacques to a private conference in a secret laboratory, where he told the young man that he would reveal some of the mysteries of philosophy. The spirit world consisted of sylphs, males who helped philosophers, and salamanders, beautiful females in search of human lovers. Since Jacques was well on his way to being a philosopher and since he had little to do with carnal women, d'Astarac would show him how to summon a salamander. Guiltily thinking of Catherine, Jacques agreed to try.

D'Astarac helped him open a crystal ball filled with stardust. Feeling overwhelmed, Jacques sank down and d'Astarac left him. After a few minutes Jacques looked up to see in front of him a voluptuous, dark-haired woman. Although she resisted his advances for a time, she accepted him as her lover, and they spent the night together.

Jacques soon learned that she was no salamander; she was Jael, niece of Mosaïde. The fierce old Jew kept her secluded, hiding her from Christian eyes, but Jael came frequently to his room despite the uncle's vigilance. One early morning Maître Jérôme saw her leaving and traced her to Mosaïde's cottage. Although Jael slipped inside unseen, Mosaïde saw the abbot from his window and cursed him in Hebrew and Spanish. Not to be outdone, Maître Jérôme cursed the Jew in French and Latin.

That evening, as Maître Jérôme and Jacques passed Catherine's house, she greeted Jacques with great affection from her doorway. Someone inside slapped her sharply and pulled her inside. It was the noble d'Anquetil, Catherine's new lover. He invited them in, pleased that he had Jacques for a rival instead of the begging Capuchin.

The four spent an agreeable evening at the card table. Maître Jérôme always won. Catherine sat snuggled close to d'Anquetil, and while vowing eternal fidelity to him pressed Jacques' foot under the table. Suddenly there was a thunderous rapping outside. De la Guéritaude had returned, furious at being locked out of the house he rented for Catherine.

The four revelers brawled with the tax collector, injuring him gravely and killing one of his lackeys. Jacques, Maître

Jérôme, and d'Anquetil fled to d'Astarac's estate for safety. Jacques put the nobleman in his own room and went to talk with the philosopher, although it was almost morning. Unfortunately, Jael came visiting, and before she could flee d'Anquetil was smitten with her charms.

D'Anquetil, who had hired carriages so that they could flee the police, wanted to take Jael with him. To Jacques' horror, Jael agreed after being promised a set of silver plate and a monthly income. In the morning d'Anquetil and Jael set off in a closed coupé, followed by Maître Jérôme and a morose Jacques.

During the journey Jacques reproached Jael for her easy switch of lovers, but she took a practical view of the matter. A set of silver plate could not be ignored. One night at an inn Jael left d'Anquetil's room to visit Jacques, who was thereafter somewhat more content.

From Jael, Jacques learned that Mosaïde was not a hundred years old, but barely sixty; and instead of being a famous scholar, he was a banker who had fled Spain after killing a Christian. Furthermore, Mosaïde was Jael's lover.

Shocked by these disclosures, Jacques was uneasy at the sight of a mysterious carriage which followed them closely. His apprehensions were justified one night when they ran into a bridge and broke a wheel. Jacques, d'Anquetil, and Jael waited for repairs in a nearby dell, while Maître Jérôme searched the wreckage for bottles of wine.

In the darkness Mosaïde, who had been following the runaways, fell upon the abbot and wounded him mortally, for the jealous Jew thought that Maître Jérôme had stolen Jael. The monk died in a neighboring village, where he had been carried for medical aid. Jacques, mourning his tutor and friend, returned to his parents in Paris.

Later Jacques went to pay a visit to d'Astarac. When he arrived at the estate, he saw the big house blazing fiercely. The philosopher was burned to death in the fire, and Mosaïde drowned in a swamp as he tried to run away. Gradually, the memory of Jael becoming less poignant, Jacques found his true vocation. He became a bookseller and supported his father and mother in dignity in their old age.

ATALA

Type of work: Novel

Time of plot: Early eighteenth century

Locale: Louisiana

First published: 1801

Principal characters:

ATALA, an Indian maiden

CHACTAS, beloved of Atala

FATHER AUBRY, a missionary

Critique:

A tale of passionate but pure love, Atala is another of the stories of the Noble Savage which began to find such favor in the early nineteenth century. Against a background of the primitive American wilderness, the two lovers and the gentle priest wage a winning battle against sin and paganism. Simplicity and complexity of character are vividly contrasted, the two meeting in Christian faith in the goodness of God. Atala was the first of Chateaubriand's romances to be published, and the book had a tremendous vogue in its own day. The novel was originally planned as part of a much longer work, The Natchez, based on Chateaubriand's travels on the American frontier and influenced by his romantic philosophy.

The Story:

Chactas was an old, blind, and wise Indian of the tribe of Natchez, whose hunting ground was in the territory of Louisiana. Because of his great age and deep wisdom gained through countless years of tragic misfortune, Chactas was the patriarch of the tribe. Thus it was that when a young Frenchman named René presented himself for membership in the tribe in the year 1725, it was Chactas who questioned him to determine his fitness to join the Natchez nation. Finding René fixed in his determination to become a savage, Chactas accepted him. As the Indians prepared for a beaver hunt, Chactas—even though he was blind—was made the leader of the party. One night as they lay in their canoes Chactas recited to René the story of his adventures.

When Chactas had lived but seventeen summers, his father was killed in battle and he himself was taken prisoner by the enemy and led away by the Spaniards to St. Augustine. There he was befriended by an old Castilian named Lopez and his sister. The two white people cared for the young savage and tried to educate him as their son. But after thirty moons had passed, Chactas tired of this civilized life and begged Lopez to allow him to return to his people. Lopez, knowing the dangers awaiting a lonely youth in the forests, tried to dissuade Chactas at first. At last, seeing that the youth was firm in his resolve, the old man sent him away with his blessing.

The warning given by the good Lopez soon proved right. Chactas, having lost his way in the woods, was captured by an enemy tribe and taken to their village to await death by burning. Because of his youth and bravery, the women of the tribe took pity on him. One night, as he sat by the campfire, he heard a rustling and then felt the presence of a woman beside him. In low tones she told him that she was Atala, daughter of the chief and his dead wife. She asked Chactas if he were a Christian, and when he told her that he had not forsaken the gods of his father, she departed.

For many days the tribe marched, taking Chactas with them, and each night Atala visited him by the fire. One night, after Chactas had been tied to a tree, Atala appeared and told his guard that she would watch the prisoner for a time. Since she was the daughter of the chief, the guard gladly gave her his place. Quickly she untied the cords and gave Chactas his freedom. But he as quickly placed the cords in her hand, telling her that he wanted to be chained to her forever. She cried out in anguish that their religions separated them. She also seemed to have some other terrible secret that she feared he would learn. Atala begged him to flee without her, but Chactas said that he would rather die by fire than leave her. Neither would change, and so Atala tied Chactas again, hoping that soon he would change his mind. Each night they slipped off into the woods together, but Chactas did not possess her, for her God helped her to deny her passion for her beloved. She prayed that the savage boy might give himself to her God so that one barrier to their love would be broken.

One night her father's warriors discovered them together. Chactas was returned to the camp and placed under heavy guard. The tribe marched on and came at last to the place where Chactas was to be burned at the stake. From far and near Indians gathered to witness his torture and death at a Feast of the Dead. Chactas was prepared for his ordeal in the manner of savages, his body being painted and then laid on the ground, with guards lying across the ropes so that they might feel the slightest movement of the prisoner's body. But in spite of the great precautions, Atala again freed him by a ruse, and they made their escape into the forest. Although they were pursued, the Indians were so drunk from celebrating the Feast of the Dead that the pursuit was only half-hearted, and the lovers had little trouble in eluding them.

But the wilderness almost conquered the fugitives, who were ill-prepared for the hardships they now had to endure. Their fates joined, Atala proclaimed her love for Chactas but said that they could never marry. Although she gave their differences in religion as the only reason, Chactas felt that there was more she feared to tell him. At last, upon his urging, she told him her secret. She was not the daughter of the chief, but the illegitimate child of a white man and the chief's wife. When Chactas learned that the white man was his old friend Lopez, he loved her as a sister as well as a lover. It was through Lopez that she had gained her Christian faith, transmitted to her by her mother.

A terrible storm drove them to the shelter of a tree, and while in that refuge they saw approaching a dog and an old hermit. The hermit was a missionary, Father Aubry, who took them to his grotto and gave them food and shelter. Chactas feared to go, for he was not a Christian, but Father Aubry said that he was one of God's children and made him welcome. When he promised to instruct Chactas in Christianity so that he and Atala could be married, the girl paled at his words.

They learned that Father Aubry had spent almost his entire life among the savages, even though he could have had a more comfortable life in Europe. A good man, he considered it a privilege and not a sacrifice to endure the hardships and dangers of the wilderness. Atala and Chactas became a part of the little community of Christian savages over whom the good priest presided. After a time Chactas began to feel the spirit of God in his heart.

One day, returning from a pilgrimage with Father Aubry, Chactas found Atala apparently dying from a mysterious fever. Then they learned what her true secret had been. On her deathbed Atala's mother had taken the girl's vow that she would always remain a virgin. Her own sin had made her want to protect her daughter, and Atala, knowing nothing of real love, had given her vow which could never be broken. When Father Aubry told the lovers that the bishop in Quebec could release her from her vow, Chactas' heart grew light. In real anguish Atala then told them that she had taken poison because she had believed Chactas forever denied to her. There were no remedies for the poison, and so, after receiving the blessing of the priest and the promise of Chactas that he would embrace the Christian religion so that they could be joined in heaven, the poor virgin expired.

With the priest's aid Chactas buried his beloved. Then he said goodbye to Father Aubry and once more began his wanderings. Many years passed before he received baptism in the faith of his beloved Atala.

And many years more were to pass before the daughter of René, whom Chactas had adopted, took the bones of Atala and Father Aubry and Chactas to the land of the Natchez for burial. Chactas and Father Aubry had been killed by savage enemies. The daughter of René told a curious traveler that he should not grieve. The three friends were together with God.

ATALANTA IN CALYDON

Type of work: Poem

CENEUS, King of Calydon

ALTHÆA, his wife

MELEAGER, their son

ATALANTA, a virgin huntress

CHORUS

Critique:

Atalanta in Calydon, typical of the Victorian treatment of Greek tragedy, was the first of Swinburne's longer works to attract marked critical notice. As in the case of Swinburne's other poetic dramas, it was not written for stage presentation, but for reading. One of the Pre-Raphaelites, Swinburne was criticized for using too much intensity and too violent colors in his poetry. In this poem his intensity and violence are very much the essence of the passionate and soul-stirring description of the characters' fateful existence.

The Story:

Ceneus, father of Meleager, had offended Artemis, goddess of the hunt, by offering sacrifices to all the gods except her. As a punishment for his negligence Artemis had sent into Calydon a wild boar that ravaged the land and the crops.

Althæa, embittered by the curse, refused to pay homage to Artemis and raged against the gods. Althæa was a woman of strong will and determination. Years before, when her son Meleager was born, she had had a strange dream concerning his birth. In the dream three spinning women, the Fates, had visited Althæa and had promised for Meleager strength, good fortune, and a bounteous life until the brand on the hearth burned out. On hearing the last part of the prophecy, Althæa had sprung from her bed, grasped the burning brand, and beaten and trampled the heat from it with her bare hands and feet. Then, to guard Meleager's life, she had hidden the brand.

Again she had dreamed that the heatless brand burst into flame as a bud bursts into flower; and with this strange phenomenon Death had come to blow charred ash from the brand into her breast, but there Love had quenched the flame. The omen presaged for Althæa the security of her family; but in spite of her great pride she was not unmindful of the lots which the gods might cast for mortals. These thoughts were in her mind as she went to arm Meleager for the boar hunt. Never had there been born so strong a man of royal birth as Meleager.

The Chorus, reviewing the life span of man, summed up this existence as a passing between a sleep and a sleep.

The warriors of Arcadia were to join the Calydonians in the hunt, and Meleager and Althæa discussed the qualities and characteristics of these men, among them the valiant sons of Leda, Althæa's sister. Meleager described Toxæus and Plexippus, Althæa's brothers, as undoing their deeds with too much talk. Althæa counseled her son against too great pride in earthly accomplishments and advised him to submit his soul to fate. The Chorus admonished Meleager to follow his mother's counsel.

Meleager, recounting the many tumultuous battles he had experienced, pointed out to his mother that in all these frays he had never seen evidence of the infallible gods to whom she and the Chorus would have him submit.

Ceneus reported the coming of the Arcadians and said that among them was a woman armed for the hunt. Although Ceneus wished to have this woman shown great respect because of her favor from the gods, he warned Meleager against becoming infatuated with her beauty. Althæa, recalling the prophecies of the Fates regarding Meleager's career, added to her husband's warning against earthly love. Again imploring her son to give himself to fate, she told him that he would not die as ordinary men die and that his death would be her death as well. Meleager declared his boundless love for his mother and expressed respect for her teaching. Ever faithful to Zeus, the sole determiner of things, he prepared for the hunt.

The Chorus, philosophizing on Love, saw her blind as a flame, covered by earth for hiding, and fronted by laughter to conceal the tears of desire. According to the portent of the Chorus, man and maid would go forth; the maid's name, Fate; the man's, Death. The Chorus lamented also the meagerness of life's span. This futility, an evil blossom born of sea foam and blood froth, had come into existence with Aphrodite, goddess of love. Before, there had been joy upon the earth, but Aphrodite's influence had resulted in suffering, evil, and devastation.

In the hunt, as predicted, Meleager met the Arcadian maiden. She was Atalanta, the virgin priestess of Artemis, whom Ceneus had neglected in his sacrifices and who had sent the wild boar to ravage Calydon. Atalanta invoked Artemis to favor Meleager that he might be victorious in the hunt. Meleager, confessing his love for Atalanta, was taunted by his uncles, Toxeus and Plexippus, for his woman-tonguedness. Althæa pleaded for peace among her kinsmen lest words become snakes and poison them against each other.

The hunt proceeded. According to a message sent by Ceneus to Althæa, the expedition demanded energy, courage, and hunting strategy. The boar, crazed by the chase and by the numerous wounds inflicted, charged Meleager, who with all daring and skill slew the animal, thereby ridding Calydon of its curse. Althæa offered praise to the gods. A messenger who had brought the message to Althæa added that pride in earthly accomplishments would bring about destruction.

The Chorus, chanting a song of thanksgiving to the gods, was hushed by the messenger, who ordered them to change their songs to wails of pity because Toxeus and Plexippus had been slain.

Althæa, lamenting the death of her brothers, found comfort in the thought that Meleager would avenge them. The messenger questioned whether her son should slay himself. When Althæa threatened him for his ambiguity, the messenger bluntly informed her that Meleager had slain his uncles.

After the boar had been killed, Toxeus and Plexippus requested that the head and the hide be kept as a monument in Calydon; but Meleager, enamoured of Atalanta, gave her the spoils of the hunt. Pleased with this token of his devotion, Atalanta laughed. The Calydonians construed her reaction as a taunt and sought to destroy her. In furious fighting to protect the maiden, Meleager killed his uncles. Althæa recalled her brothers' kindnesses in their childhood, anticipated her sister's scorn for Meleager's crime, and accepted her fate as a victim of many curses.

The Chorus, endeavoring to comfort Althæa in the loss of her brothers, was rebuked. Had Toxeus and Plexippus died in sacrifice or battle, Althæa maintained, their lives would not have been in vain; but knowing that they had been slain by her son, she could never become reconciled to their deaths or to his crime.

In Meleager's deed, caused by excessive earthly pride and undue desire for attainment, Althæa sensed her error in taking the burning brand from the fire at the time of his birth. Stoically she thrust the brand into the fire that it might be consumed at last. Althæa suffered with torment and anguish as the Chorus described the burning, which resulted in Meleager's death after his return from the hunt.

Meleager reviewed his existence without remorse and besought Ceneus and Althæa not to let his name die among men. He described his passing as an empty night harvest in which no man gathers fruit. Althæa died of sorrow. Atalanta, hailing Meleager's greatness, returned to Arcadia. Ceneus ruled alone in Calydon.

Critique:

The Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini, written 1558-1562 and circulated in manuscript form until printed in 1730, is perhaps the finest document left to moderns from the period of the Italian Renaissance. In its pages we view intimately, through the eyes of an artistic and adventurous contemporary, the men, women, princes, dukes, and popes of the sixteenth century. In addition, we see the artists who produced some of the great pictures and sculpture which we take more or less for granted. In Cellini's backward glances we can feel some measure of the pangs and troubles and joys that went into those art works and the climate of culture which produced them. To judge Cellini and his contemporaries by twentieth-century standards is common enough to bear comment. It suffices to say that no one can appreciate Cellini as a man and as an artist who does judge by current standards. He was a product of his time, and on that basis he must be judged as an author, a man, and an artist.

The Story:

At the age of fifty-eight Benvenuto Cellini began to set down his memoirs. He related first a fictional version of the founding of Florence by his ancestors and then began the story of his life.

Benvenuto, destined by his father to be a musician, was as a lad taught to play the flute and sing by note. But lessons in music from his father failed to interest him, and at the age of fifteen Cellini apprenticed himself to a goldsmith. Cellini said of himself that he had a natural bent for the work and in a few months he had surpassed men long in the trade.

As an apprentice and, later, as a journeyman goldsmith, Cellini on his travels through Italy did fine work and acted the part of a bravo. He became an excellent swordsman and handler of the poniard, as he proved when he killed an enemy in a street brawl.

In 1527 the Constable of Bourbon marched on Rome and besieged Pope Clement VII in his fortress. Cellini, then in Rome and in sympathy with the pope, served the pontiff valiantly as an artilleryman and as a goldsmith, having been commissioned by the besieged prelate to melt down much jewelry and turn it into a more transportable form. Later he boasted that during the siege he had killed the Constable of Bourbon and wounded the Prince of Orange.

After the siege was lifted and a truce declared, Cellini returned to Florence and killed his brother's murderer. He later went to Mantua. Ill with fever in that city, he returned to Florence. When Pope Clement declared war on that city, however, Cellini left his shop and trade to enter the papal service. While in Rome he made a medallion of tremendous size for the papal coat, a work which was the beginning of his fortunes. It was a splendid button, pleasing greatly the pontiff for whom it was made. From then on, during Clement's life, Cellini did much work for the papacy.

Cellini's career under Pope Clement was a stormy one. His fiery temper often caused him no end of trouble; for example, he received the commission of the papal mint and then lost it because of his foolhardy and unmannerly actions. He killed another enemy in a quarrel but was lucky enough to be pardoned by his patron.

Cellini's great commission from Pope Clement was for a gold chalice. The chalice was never finished, for Clement died too soon. During the last years of his life, however, the chalice was a matter of contention between the pope and his goldsmith. Cellini, an independent and temperamental workman, often got into trouble because of the slowness with which he worked. And the pope, according to Cellini's account, often forgot that gold was needed to make the vessel.

Upon the accession of Cardinal Farnese as Pope Paul III, Cellini went into his service for a time. But Cellini was away from Rome a great deal, at one time taking service with Cosimo de' Medici, Duke of Florence. Upon his return Cellini was imprisoned on a charge of homicide. The pope granted him a safe-conduct for a time, but eventually he was imprisoned. Only after many difficulties did he receive a pardon for the slaying.

Cellini came to the notice of Emperor Charles V when that monarch visited Rome and was presented by the pope with a Book of Hours bound into a gold cover encrusted with jewels, the work of Cellini. A short time later Cellini was sent for by Francis I, King of France, but before he could leave Rome he was accused of theft and thrown into prison by the pope's bargello, or police force. Cellini cleared himself of the charge, but he had made so many enemies that he was kept in prison for many months and suffered, at times, cruel punishment.

Action on Cellini's behalf by King Francis only served to make his lot harder. At last Cellini managed to escape by using bed sheets to lower himself from the prison tower and to get himself over the prison walls. Having broken his leg in his flight, he was recaptured. Released after a long period of confinement, he found asylum with a French cardinal and finally with the aid of Cardinal d'Este of Ferrara made his way to France.

In France, with King Francis as his patron, the goldsmith and artist turned to sculpture. He executed an amazing statue of Jupiter for the king and also constructed the large statue of the nymph of Fontainebleau. But Cellini made an enemy of Madame d'Etampes, the king's mistress, who made his career difficult and his life dangerous, and the Cardinal of Ferrara did not fulfill the promises he had made. Cellini's amorous adventures also got him into many difficulties.

In desperation, and with some hopes of a better future, Cellini left France and returned to his native Florence in 1545, there to find protection under the patronage of Cosimo de' Medici.

In Florence he made an enemy of the Duchess of Florence and a famous sculptor, Bandinello, whose work Cellini reviled in public and to the sculptor's face. As in France, a woman's enmity, the dislike of fellow artists, the pettifoggery of minor officials, and small commissions used up Cellini's valuable time in Florence. Nevertheless, while there, in the years after 1545, Cellini did his greatest work, a bronze Perseus of which he was extremely proud.

Following the completion of that statue, Cellini went to work on other pieces, including a tremendous crucifix with a mausoleum at its base, to hold his body when he had died.

While working in Florence for the duke, Cellini bought some farm land which, failing to bring him the revenues he had been promised, embroiled him in a long and upsetting litigation. That trouble, plus the enmity of the duchess, finally drove him from Florence. In 1562, while the duke and his family were away on a journey, Cellini left Florence and headed for Pisa. With that final entry, the departure for Pisa, Cellini ended his memoirs, though he lived for eight more years.

The Axe is the first volume of a tetralogy—the others are The Snake Pit, In the Wilderness, and The Son Avenger—published under one title, The Master of Hestviken. These four books together make up a great historical chronicle, a great religious novel, and a novel of character. In this story of thirteenth-century Norway, Sigrid Undset presents a massive picture of human conflicts which are universal and timeless. As a study of man's faith, the novel shows a world poised between the old pagan spirit and Christian belief and practice. Olav Audunsson, her chief character, is the medieval man, virile yet innocent and meek in his simple goodness. The Axe tells the story of a murder which he never dared confess without the certainty of harming others, a crime which was to burden his conscience and influence his actions for the rest of his days.

The Story:

The troubles of the Steinfinnssons began when Tore Toresson sent his youngest son to the royal bodyguard at Bergen. There Steinfinn Toresson saw Ingebjörg Jonsdatter, who had come from Denmark with young Queen Ingebjörg, and he fell in love with her. But King Magnus had already promised the girl to his friend, Mattias Haraldsson. Steinfinn was in the Orkneys that winter. The next summer he went to Bergen and stole Ingebjörg out of the king's court.

Although Tore was displeased with his son, he gave the couple the manor at Frettestein, where they lived as if in lawful wedlock. After a time the queen reconciled all concerned, and Steinfinn and Ingebjörg held their wedding at the royal court in Oslo. Ingunn, their first child, was three when her parents were wed.

Meanwhile Mattias Haraldsson had gone into foreign lands, so that Steinfinn had little thought of his ill will. When Steinfinn and Ingebjörg had been married about seven years, however, Mattias came one night with his men, bound Steinfinn, and shamed him before his household. After Mattias rode home to his own manor, young Olav Audunsson cut his foster father's bonds. Steinninn swore that he would not sleep with his wife until he could show the world that she was his without Mattias' leave.

But Steinninn had no revenge at that time, for Mattias sailed again to foreign lands. Meanwhile life grew slack and somber at Frettestein. Steinninn was much in the company of Kolbein, his grim half-brother, and Ingebjörg lived in a house apart with her women and her two small sons, Hallvard and Jon. Ingunn and Tora, the older daughters, would have been left to themselves if it had not been for Olav Audunsson, Steinninn's foster son.

Olav's father had been Audun Ingolfsson of Hestviken; his mother had died at his birth. One summer, when Steinninn met Auden at the Thing, the man from Vik said that he was soon to die. There was much drinking that night, and it seemed good sport to betroth little Ingunn to Olav. Next morning Steinninn would have cried quits on the agreement, but Audun held him to his word. So Olav grew up at Frettestein. An aged kinsman managed his estate at Hestviken.

All his life Olav remembered a day just past his sixteenth year. The edge of his ancient Viking ax, Kin-fetch, being blunted, he took it to an armorer in Hamar. Ingunn stole away from the house to go with him, and the two rowed up the fjord under sunny skies. Later he never knew whether his deep feeling of pleasure came from a sudden, disturbing sense of Ingunn's loveliness, the summer light over the town, or the vesper service he and Ingunn went to before they started home through the dark; but he always thought that day the happiest of his life.

Arnvid Finnsson, Ingunn's cousin, brought word that Mattias was at Birid, and two days later Steinninn and his kinsmen, Olav among them, rode away. There was great merriment at Frettestein when they returned. Mattias and his housecarls had been taken by surprise, and Steinninn had killed his enemy in fair fight. Steinninn, badly wounded, laughed at his own hurts. After he and Ingebjörg went to their loft-room, the dancing and drinking continued, and some became wanton. Half-tipsy, Olav went with Ingunn to her loft.

That night Ingebjörg died suddenly in her sleep and Steinninn's wounds reopened. From that time on he grew steadily weaker. While he lay dying, Arnvid asked him to declare the marriage of Ingunn and Olav but he refused, saying the settlement had never been clearly drawn. After Steinninn's death Olav found among his own gear the betrothal ring he had given Ingunn many years before. He suspected Kolbein of that sly attempt to repudiate the betrothal.

Arnvid stayed on at Frettestein for a time. That fall Olav spent many nights with Ingunn in her loft. When Arnvid finally learned how matters stood, he advised Olav to lay the case before Bishop Thorfinn in Hamar and to claim that he had only fulfilled a marriage contract which Ingunn's kinsmen had broken. Bishop Thorfinn was a stern man but just, and he saw that Olav had some right in the wrong he had done. All might have gone well for the lovers if the Kolbeinssons had not quarreled with Arnvid and Olav in the convent guest house at Hamar. At last, unable to endure their taunts, Olav raised Kin-fetch and struck down Einar Kolbeinsson.

Proclaimed an outlaw, Olav fled to Sweden, and Ingunn went to stay with Arnvid at Micklebö. There she was taken with an illness so strange that Arnvid's mother accused the Kolbeinssons of witchcraft. After her recovery the girl went to live with her aunt, the Lady Magnhild of Berg. Olav, meanwhile, had gone to his mother's kinsmen in Denmark. Tora married Haakon Gautsson and came to visit at Berg, where her first child was born. Ingunn wished for a husband and child of her own, but she grew stubborn when her relatives talked of marrying her to any of the young men who came wooing.

Four years later Olav returned in the tain of Earl Alf Erlingsson, Queen Ingebjörg's liegeman. On promise of penance and payment of blood-atonement to Kolbein for Einar's slaying, the Steinfinnssons acknowledged him as Ingunn's betrothed. Then the queen died and her son proclaimed Alf and all his men outlaws. Word came that Olav had followed Alf to Sweden. Once more Ingunn was left to wait at Berg.

One summer Teit, an Icclander, came on business to the manor. Mistaking Ingunn for a servant, he was not abashed when he learned that she was a daughter of the house. Ingunn liked the clerk's pert speech and merry ways. At last, out of weakness and pity, she let him stay with her in the house she shared with her aged grandmother. When Olav, no longer an outlaw, came home in the spring, she was carrying Teit's child.

Olav was dismayed when he learned how things were with Ingunn, but he felt bound to her by every tie between them in the past. Bitter because he could not part from her, he offered to claim that he had gone secretly to Berg during his outlawry and that the child was his. Shamed, Ingunn refused so unseemly an offer.

Olav was staying with the Preaching Friars in Hamar. Teit, believing that Olav no longer wanted Ingunn, proposed to Olav that he accompany the Icclander when he went to Arnvid to plead for Ingunn's hand. As Olav prepared for the journey, Kin-fetch, hanging on the wall, rang—old superstition said that when the ax sang, death would follow. That night, at the sæter where they stopped to rest, Olav killed Teit and burned the hut. Although he knew he could never confess his deed without shaming Ingunn, he felt that her secret was safe.

When Ingunn's child, a boy, was born, Lady Magnhild gave it to a foster mother, a forester's wife. A short time later Olav went to claim his bride. After years of waiting it was a sorry bridal ale they drank at their wedding feast.

THE BACCHAE

Author: Euripides (480-406 B.C.)

Type of plot: Classical tragedy

Time of plot: Remote antiquity

Locale: Thebes, in Boeotia

First presented: c. 405 B.C.

Principal characters:

DIONYSUS, god of the vine

PENTHEUS, King of Thebes

CADMUS, grandfather of Pentheus and former king

TIRESIAS, a Theban seer

AGAVE, Pentheus' mother

Critique:

In this sinister drama, Euripides would seem to have attempted the impossible; that is, to condemn religious excess and at the same time to accept the myth of a man who died for disapproving of religious excess. It has been said that The Bacchae, posthumously staged, was a recantation, marking Euripides' acceptance of the nature-worship aspects of the Dionysiac cult. If so, the play can still be interpreted as a warning against excess. In this drama Euripides was also an accurate observer of Nature. As half-man, half-god, Dionysus is exasperating in his divine self-sufficiency; as a symbol of certain aspects of brute Nature, he is terrifying.

The Story:

Visited by Zeus, Semele, daughter of Cadmus, the King of Thebes, conceived

a child. While she was still carrying her unborn child, she prayed to see Zeus in all his regal splendor. Zeus accordingly appeared to her in the form of a bolt of lightning; Semele was killed instantly. Zeus took the prematurely born child he had fathered and placed him within himself.

In its proper time the child was born again and was named Dionysus. When he grew up and became the god of revelry and wine, men established a cult for his worship. The cult of Dionysus spread throughout western Asia, but it had not yet gained a real foothold in Europe. Dionysus, the god-man whom his devotees associated with the vine and with the ecstasies derived from the juice of the grape, decided that Thebes, home of his ancestors, would be the logical place for the beginning of his cult in the West. At first Theban resistance to Dionysiac behavior balked his efforts, and many Thebans refused to believe that he was a son of Zeus. Pentheus, grandson of Cadmus and cousin of Dionysus, ruled as King of Thebes. Dreading the disorders and madness induced by the new cult, he stubbornly opposed its mysteries, which hinged largely upon orgiastic and frenzied Nature-rites.

A group of Eastern women, devotees of Dionysus, called upon the Theban women to join them in the worship of their beloved god. During the ceremonies blind Tiresias, an ancient Theban prophet, summoned old Cadmus, now withdrawn from public life, to the worship of Dionysus. Performing the frenzied rites, the two old men miraculously regained youthful vigor.

Pentheus, enraged because some of his people had turned to the new religion, imprisoned all women who were caught carrying any of the Bacchic symbols, wine, an ivy crown, or a staff. He rebuked his aged grandfather and accused Tiresias of responsibility for the spread of the cult in Thebes. Tiresias championed Dionysus, declaring that wine provided men with a temporary release from the harshness and miseries of life. The Theban maidens, he said, were exalted and purified by the Bacchic ecstasies. Old Cadmus seconded the words of Tiresias and offered to place an ivy wreath on Pentheus' brow. Pentheus brushed it aside and ordered some of his soldiers to destroy Tiresias' house; others he directed to seize a mysterious stranger, a priest of Dionysus, who had a remarkable influence over Theban women.

When the stranger, Dionysus in disguise, was brought before the king, all the Theban women who had been jailed suddenly and mysteriously found themselves free in a forest where they were engaged in worship of Dionysus. Meanwhile, in the city, Pentheus asked the prisoner his name and his country. Dionysus answered that he was from Lydia, in Asia Minor, and that he and his followers had received their religion from Dionysus. He refused, however, to tell his name. When Pentheus asked to know more about the strange religion, Dionysus said that this knowledge was reserved for the virtuous only. Pentheus impatiently ordered a soldier to cut off Dionysus' curls, which the prisoner had said were dedicated to his god. Then Pentheus seized Dionysus' staff and ordered him to be imprisoned. Dionysus, calm in spite of these humiliations, expressed confidence in his own welfare and pity at the blindness of Pentheus. Before the guards took Dionysus to be imprisoned in the royal stables, he predicted catastrophe for Pentheus. The king, unmindful of this prophecy, directed that the female followers of Dionysus be put to practical womanly labors.

From his place of imprisonment Dionysus called out encouragement to his devotees. Then he invoked an earthquake which shook the foundations of Pentheus' fortress. Flames danced on Semele's tomb. Dionysus appeared, mysteriously freed from his prison, and rebuked his followers for any doubts and fears they had expressed. He had cast a spell on Pentheus, who in his mad frenzy mistook a bull for Dionysus and chained the animal in its stall while the god-man looked on. Another earth tremor tumbled the royal fortress in ruins.

Pentheus, enraged at seeing Dionysus free, ordered his guards to shut the gates of the city. At the same time a messenger reported that many Theban women, among them Agave, mother of Pentheus, were on nearby Mount Cithaeron observing Dionysiac rites that were partly a dignified and beautiful Nature-worship, partly the cruel slaughter of cattle. A battle had taken place between the women and Boeotian peasants, but the frenzied women, although victorious over the peasants, did not harm them. Pentheus ordered the immediate suppression of the cult. Dionysus offered to lead the women back to the city, but he declared that if he did so the women would only grow more devoted to the man-god.

When Pentheus imperiously demanded that his orders be obeyed, Dionysus cast over him a spell which made the king express a desire to see the women at their worship. In a trance, he resisted only feebly when Dionysus dressed him in woman's clothes in order that he might not be detected by the women, who were jealous of the secrecy of their cult. Pentheus, in fact, was almost overcome by Dionysus' charms as the god led him to Mount Cithaeron.

On the mountain Pentheus complained that he could not see the rites because of the thick pine forest. Dionysus immediately bent a large pine tree to the ground, set Pentheus in its topmost branches, and gently let the tree return to its upright position. At that moment the man-god disappeared, but his voice boomed out to his ecstatic devotees that a great enemy of the cult was hidden in the tall tree. The women, wild with fury, felled the tree, Pentheus with it. Agave, in a Dionysiac frenzy, stood over her son. He frantically threw off his feminine dress and pleaded with her to recognize him, but in her Bacchic trance she imagined him to be a lion. With prodigious strength she tore off his left arm at the shoulder. Her sisters, Ino and Autonoe, joined her and together the three women broke Pentheus' body to pieces. Agave placed his severed head on her wand and called upon the revelers to behold the desert-whelped lion's head that she had taken.

Cadmus and his attendants carried the maimed body of his grandson back to the city. When Agave displayed her bloody trophy, the old man could only feel the deepest pity for his daughter in her blind excess. When Agave awoke from her trance and recognized the head of her beloved son on her wand, she was bewildered and grief-stricken. Cadmus, mourning the violence that had occurred, urged all men to comply with the wishes of the Olympian deities.

Dionysus returned in his divine form and prophesied that Cadmus and his wife, Harmonia, transformed into dragons, would overcome many Grecian lands before they died. He showed no sympathy for Agave, who cried out that she had been guilty of sinning against him. He doomed her and her sisters to wander without respite until death overtook them.

THE BARBER OF SEVILLE

Author: Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais (1732-1799)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Seville, Spain

First presented: 1775

Principal characters:

FIGARO, the barber of Seville

COUNT ALMAVIVA, a Grandee of Spain

BARTHOLO, a doctor
ROSINE, his ward
DON BAZILE, Rosine's singing-master

Critique:

Although the plot of The Barber of Seville has been used many times by dramatists and composers, Beaumarchais seems to have a fresh approach to the story. It is on this gentle comedy that Rossini's famous opera is based. The play is fast-moving and brisk. It has all the necessary ingredients for a romantic comedy: intrigue, wit, clear-cut characterizations, satire, and a well-defined plot. Indeed, the plot is more important than the actors themselves, even though Figaro, the barber, has become famous in the literature of all countries. Beaumarchais' style served as a model for many dramatists who followed him.

The Story:

Count Almaviva was so much in love with Rosine, the ward of Dr. Bartholo, that even though he had never spoken to her he had left Madrid and the pleasure of the court in order to be near her in Seville. Because her guardian desired to marry her, he kept the young girl locked in her room. To help him in his suit the count enlisted the aid of Figaro, the barber and apothecary of Bartholo.

A note Rosine threw from her window convinced the count that she returned his love. At Figaro's suggestion, the count then disguised himself as a soldier seeking quarters for the night. He called himself Lindor, the name Figaro had used in telling Rosine of her unknown lover. When Bartholo, suspicious of everyone who might come near Rosine, refused to give the disguised count lodging, the count managed to slip a note to Rosine before Bartholo ordered him from the house. Bartholo forced Rosine to show him the note, but she cleverly tricked him into reading another letter which she had received from her cousin. Still his suspicions were not allayed.

His first plan having failed, the count, with the help of Figaro, disguised himself as a student. Calling himself Alonzo, he told Bartholo that he had been sent by Don Bazile, Rosine's music teacher. His story was that Don Bazile was ill and had asked Alonzo to take his place. Bazile was a party to Bartholo's plot to force Rosine to marry him the next day. Figaro, having learned of this plot, had given the count the information so that he could pretend to help Bartholo. The count gave Bartholo a letter which he claimed would help Bartholo in his suit. They would tell her that another woman had given it to Bartholo, a woman with whom the count was supposed to be in love.

The count thought that by pretending to help Bartholo he could be alone with Rosine and tell her his plans to rescue her from the old man. But again Bartholo would not leave them alone together until Figaro managed to trick him into leaving the room. Then Figaro stole the key to Rosine's room from the old man's key ring. When Bartholo returned to the room, the music lesson seemed to be in progress. Then Don Bazile himself was announced. It took all of Figaro's ingenuity to keep him from revealing Alonzo as an impostor. Figaro and the count at last managed to get Don Bazile out of the house before Bartholo began to suspect the truth. But Bartholo, suspicious of everyone, sneaked behind the count and Rosine and overheard enough to make him decide to investigate Don Bazile's strange behavior and apparent bewilderment.

Don Bazile confessed that he knew nothing of his supposed illness and had never before seen the so-called Alonzo. This confirmation of his suspicions made Bartholo uneasy. Although he feared that Alonzo was the count's friend, he did not suspect that Alonzo was the count himself. He told Don Bazile to arrange to have the notary come at once to perform his marriage with Rosine.

Immediately afterward he went to the young girl's room and showed her the letter the count had given him. Instead of the help the count expected from the letter, however, it worked against him. Bartholo told Rosine also that her young lover would pretend to rescue her, but in reality he planned to sell her to the count. Since Rosine too did not know the real identity of the man she called Lindor, she believed Bartholo and promised to marry him at once. She also told him of Alonzo's plan to steal into her room that night and carry her off. Bartholo left her to arrange for the police to come and apprehend the kidnaper.

While Bartholo was gone, the count and Figaro climbed up a ladder and entered Rosine's room. Thinking him to be Lindor, she scorned the count and accused him of a plot to sell her to the count. The count then threw aside his disguise. He told her he was the Count Almaviva, that in his love for her he had followed her hopelessly for the past six months. Rosine was so overcome that she fainted. When she was revived, she told them of her loss of faith and of her promise to marry Bartholo. She told them also of Bartholo's knowledge of the plan to carry her away. Already the ladder had been removed from her window and the police were on the way.

When all looked blackest, Don Bazile appeared with a notary, as Bartholo had instructed him to do. The notary knew only that he was to perform a marriage here and another marriage at the home of Figaro. Here he was to marry Bartholo and a young lady named Rosine. At Figaro's he was to marry Count Almaviva and a young lady named Rosine. By some clever and rapid talking, the count and Figaro were able to convince the notary that he was merely confused. Don Bazile was more difficult, but he finally decided the money the count slipped into his hand was more important than his loyalty to Bartholo. He signed the marriage contract as a witness just before Bartholo burst into the room with many policemen and a justice of the peace.

Bartholo ordered the justice of the peace to arrest the count, but that civil servant was too much impressed with Count Almaviva's high position to risk offending him. Bartholo, anxious to marry his ward, then ordered the count out of the house. When he learned that the count and Rosine had just been married, and that the contract was legally signed, he was infuriated and tried in vain to keep Rosine from leaving with her husband. By threatening Bartholo with a demand for an exact accounting of his ward's property, an exposé which Bartholo dared not allow, the justice of the peace was able to persuade the old man to sign the marriage certificate, thus giving his consent to the marriage of Rosine. Bartholo could not understand how his plans had failed. Figaro told him that youth and love could always defeat an old man's schemes.

Critique:

Barnaby Rudge was Dickens' first venture into the field of historical fiction. A novel filled with violence and melodrama, it undoubtedly owes much to Scott's The Heart of Midlothian, particularly in those scenes dealing with the historic Gordon riots and the burning of Newgate prison by the infuriated mob. Barnaby Rudge and his talking raven forecast at the beginning of the book the development of a nightmarish plot in which Dickens tried to combine two themes of interest and suspense: private crime and public disorder. As in many of his novels, the book lives chiefly in the lively and original minor characters whom he created. Lord George Gordon, drawn from history, is presented in a more sympathetic light than that in which he was viewed by Parliament and responsible citizens of that nobleman's own day.

The Story:

At twilight of a wild, windy day in March, 1775, a small group of men sat in the bar parlor of the Maypole Inn, an ancient hostelry situated in Chigwell parish on the borders of Epping Forest. Two guests in particular engaged the attention of John Willet, the proprietor. One was a well-dressed young gentleman preoccupied in manner. The other was a traveler who sat huddled in an old riding-coat, his hat pulled forward to hide his face from the landlord's curious gaze.

After the young gentleman had left the inn, Joe Willet, the landlord's son, announced that Mr. Edward Chester, his horse having gone lame, was walking the twelve miles to London. Miss Emma Haredale, he added, was attending a masquerade in town, and Edward, hoping to see her there, was willing to foot it in spite of the stormy weather.

The name Haredale seeming to interest the stranger, Solomon Daisy, the parish clerk, told the story of a murder which had shocked the neighborhood twenty-two years before to the day. Mr. Reuben Haredale, Emma's father, was at that time owner of The Warren, a great house near the village. One morning he was found murdered in his bedroom. His steward, a man named Rudge, and a gardener were missing. Several months later Rudge's body, identified by the clothing he had been wearing, was recovered from a pond on the estate. Of the gardener there had been no trace, and the mystery was still unsolved. Ever since her father's violent death Emma Haredale had lived at The Warren with Mr. Geoffrey Haredale, her bachelor uncle.

The stranger called abruptly for his horse and galloped away, almost crashing into a chaise driven by Gabriel Varden, the Clerkenwell locksmith. By the light of a lantern Varden saw the traveler's scarred, scowling face. The rider warned the locksmith against interfering in his affairs.

On his way back to London that same night, Varden, alarmed by cries for help, found Edward Chester lying wounded on the highway. About the fallen man cowered the grotesque figure of Barnaby Rudge, son of that Rudge who had been Reuben Haredale's steward. The boy had been born half-witted on the day the murder was discovered. Helpless, loved, pitied, he lived in a shabby street nearby with his mother and his tame, talking raven, Grip. Aided by Barnaby, Varden took the wounded man to the Rudge house and put him to bed.

The next morning Varden told the story of his night's adventures to Dolly, his daughter, and thin-shanked Simon Tappertit, his apprentice. Dolly, who knew of Emma's affection for Edward Chester, was deeply concerned.

That night Varden went to the Rudge house to inquire about Edward, whom he found greatly improved. While he sat talking with Mrs. Rudge, whose face clearly revealed the troubles and sorrows of her life, a soft knocking sounded at the closed shutter. When she opened the door, Varden saw over her shoulder the livid face and fierce eyes of the horseman he had encountered the night before. The man fled, leaving the locksmith convinced that he was also the highwayman who had attacked young Chester. Mrs. Rudge, visibly upset by the man's appearance on her doorstep, begged Varden to say nothing about the strange visitor.

John Chester, Edward's father, was a vain, selfish man with great ambitions for his son. Shortly after the mysterious attack, he and Geoffrey Haredale met by appointment in a private room at the Maypole. Although the two families had been enemies for many years, Chester felt that at last they had a common interest; both should oppose a match between Emma and Edward. Chester confessed frankly that he wished his son to marry a Protestant heiress, not the niece of a Catholic country squire. Haredale, resenting Chester's superior airs, promised that he would do his best to change his niece's feelings toward Edward. The meeting of the two men caused great interest among the villagers gathered in the bar parlor of the inn.

Haredale, true to his promise, refused to admit Edward to The Warren. When the young man confronted his father to demand an explanation for the agreement between him and Haredale, the older Chester sneered at his son for his sentimental folly and advised him not to let his heart rule his head.

The mysterious stranger came again to Mrs. Rudge's house. Admitted, he demanded food and money. Frightened by the threats of the sinister blackmailer, she and her son moved secretly to a remote country village.

Edward, refusing to obey his father's commands, asked Dolly Varden to carry a letter to Emma, her foster sister. In turn, Emma gave her a message intended for Edward. Hugh, the brutish hostler at the Maypole, took the letter from her and delivered it to John Chester, who was using every means to keep the lovers apart. Before long he had involved Mrs. Varden, Simon Tappertit, and John Willet in his schemes.

Joe Willet became resentful when his father, trying to keep Joe from acting as a go-between for the lovers, began to interfere with his son's liberties. Meanwhile Joe had troubles of his own. He had apprenticed himself to the locksmith in order to be near Dolly, but Mrs. Varden favored Tappertit's suit. Joe, annoyed by what he considered Dolly's fickleness, trounced his rival and declared that he would go off to fight the rebels in America. Dolly forgot that she was a coquette and wept bitterly when she heard of his enlistment.

Five years later John Willet again presided over his bar parlor on a tempestuous nineteenth of March, the anniversary of Reuben Haredale's murder. Only Solomon Daisy was needed to make the gathering of cronies complete. When he appeared, he had a strange story to tell. In the village churchyard he had seen a man believed murdered years before. Willet, disturbed by the clerk's story, carried it that same night to Geoffrey Haredale, who asked that the report be kept from his niece.

On the way home Willet and the hostler, who had accompanied him on his errand, were stopped by three horsemen. The travelers were Lord George Gordon, leader of an anti-Catholic crusade; Gashford, his secretary, and John Grueby, a servant. They stayed overnight at the Maypole.

Lord Gordon was a fanatic, his mind a muddle of Queen Besses and Bloody Marys. Gashford, his sly, malevolent helper, was the true organizer of the No-Popery rioters, a rabble of the disaffected and lawless from the London slums. Haredale gained the enmity of Gashford when he revealed in public the past of Lord Gordon's hypocritical secretary. Sir John Chester, now a baronet, was interested in the Gordon cause. Among Gashford's followers were Tappertit, Hugh from the Maypole, and Dennis, the public hangman.

Barnaby Rudge and his mother journeyed by chance to London on the day the Gordon riots began. Separated from her by a yelling, roaming horde, Barnaby found himself pushed along in a mob led by Hugh and Tappertit. Catholic churches, public buildings, and the homes of prominent Papists were sacked and burned. Later, Barnaby was among those arrested and thrown into Newgate prison.

Gashford, wishing to be revenged on Haredale, sent part of the mob to destroy The Warren. On the way the rioters, led by Tappertit, Dennis, and Hugh, plundered the Maypole and left the landlord bound and gagged. Haredale himself was not at home; he had gone to London in an attempt to learn the whereabouts of Barnaby and his mother. Fearing the destination of the mob headed toward Chigwell, and alarmed for the safety of his niece and Dolly, her companion, he rode home as fast as he could. With Solomon Daisy, who joined him on the way, he arrived at the Maypole, where they unbound Willet and heard his account of a strange face which had peered through the window a short time before. Haredale and Daisy rode on to The Warren, a heap of smoking ruins. While they stirred among the ashes, they spied a man lurking in the old watchtower. Haredale threw himself upon the skulking figure. His prisoner was Rudge, the double murderer.

Haredale had Rudge locked in Newgate. A few hours later rioters fired the prison and released the inmates. The mob was led by Hugh, who had learned of Barnaby's imprisonment from a one-armed stranger. The same armless man saved Varden from injury after the locksmith had refused to open the door of the prison. Tappertit and Dennis, meanwhile, had taken Emma and Dolly to a wretched cottage in a London suburb.

When Haredale, taking refuge from the mob, went to the home of a vintner whom he knew, rioters attacked the house. Escaping through a secret passage, they encountered Edward Chester, just returned from abroad. With him was Joe Willet, who had lost an arm in the American war. Edward and Joe succeeded in taking Haredale and the vintner to a place of safety.

Barnaby, his father, and Hugh, betrayed by Dennis, were captured and sentenced to death. Having learned where the girls were being held, Edward and Joe led a party to rescue them. In the city the riots had been quelled, and Gashford, hoping to save himself, had betrayed Lord Gordon. Dennis was also under arrest. Tappertit, wounded, and with his legs crushed, was discovered in the house where Emma and Dolly had been held.

Mrs. Rudge vainly tried to get her husband to repent before he and Dennis died on the scaffold. Hugh, who was Sir John Chester's natural son, met the same end.

After much effort Varden was able to secure the release of innocent, feeble-minded Barnaby.

Haredale withdrew all objections to a match between Edward and Emma. He himself planned to leave England. Before his departure, however, he revisited the ruins of The Warren. There he met Sir John Chester and killed his old enemy in a duel. That night he fled abroad and died, several years later, in a religious institution. Gashford survived Lord Gordon and died at last by his own hand.

But these grimmer matters were of little concern to Dolly, mistress of the Maypole, or to Joe, the beaming landlord. Nor did they disturb the simple happiness of Barnaby Rudge, who lived many years on Maypole Farm, in company with his mother and Grip, his talking raven.

BARON MÜNCHAUSEN'S NARRATIVE

Type of work: Mock-heroic chronicle

Author (in part): Rudolph Erich Raspe (1737-1794)

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Various countries and the moon

First published: 1785

Principal character:

BARON MÜNCHAUSEN (BARON KARL FRIEDRICH HIERONYMUS VON MÜNCHHAUSEN), a prodigious traveler from Göttingen

Critique:

This collection of tales was begun by Raspe, who is thought to have been a friend of the prototype of Baron Münchhausen. The work has gone through many editions, and various subsequent writers have added a multitude of tales to the earlier editions. The tales appearing subsequent to the sixth edition, however, lack the authentic Münchhausen flavor. These tall stories give continuous delight. They recall the wit of Rabelais and foreshadow Paul Bunyan's feats. So long as men enjoy harmless boasting these tales will live.

The Story:

Baron Münchhausen knew that some people might doubt the truth of these stories. To lend credibility to the tales, he got reputable witnesses to attest that everything he said was nothing but a simple addition to the truth. His witnesses were beyond question, for the four were Sinbad, Ananias, Aladdin, and Gulliver.

The Baron sailed for Ceylon with a cousin. While the ship was at anchor in an island harbor, a great wind arose and blew enormous trees, roots and all, five miles into the air. When the storm subsided, the trees fell back into their respective holes. In one tree, however, an old couple had been gathering cucumbers. When their weight overbalanced the tree it came down and toppled onto the chief, killing him outright. But it was a fortunate accident because the chief was an evil man.

While hunting on Ceylon, the Baron was attacked by a lion. Behind him was a forty-foot crocodile with open mouth, to his left a precipice, and to his right a lake. He faced the lion bravely. The beast jumped clear over the Baron and landed in the crocodile's mouth. Quickly the Baron whipped out his knife, cut off the lion's head, and shoved it down the crocodile's throat, thus killing both his adversaries.

The Baron left Rome to make a journey to Russia. One night, no village being in sight, he tethered his horse to a pointed stump and lay down in the snow to sleep. In the morning he was surprised to find himself lying in a churchyard. Hearing a faint whinny, he looked up and saw his faithful horse tied to the top of the church steeple. A moment's reflection gave an explanation to the Baron: during the night the deep snow had entirely melted! Taking his pistol, he shot through the bridle and his horse fell unharmed to earth. Smartly mounting, the Baron continued his journey to St. Petersburg.

He found that most Russians traveled by sledge rather than on horseback. Suiting himself to the customs of the country, he hitched his horse to a one-man sleigh and continued his journey. A ferocious wolf pursued him. The frantic animal's leap from behind was too long, for he jumped over the Baron's head and began to eat the horse's hindquarters. The famished wolf soon was eating himself right into the horse's body. The Baron whipped the wolf's rear vigorously and pushed him farther ahead. The horse's carcass dropped off and the harness settled on the wolf. With exuberant shouts the Baron drove the wolf on to St. Petersburg.

One day the Baron saw a flock of ducks in a pond. When he rushed out of the door, he banged his face hard enough for sparks to fly from his eyes. Arriving at the pond, he found the flint missing from his gun. He hit himself smartly between the eyes and the resultant sparks touched off the powder in his fowling piece. The shot killed fifty brace of ducks, twenty widgeons, and three pairs of teal.

When he went out to hunt another day, he forgot his shot. He saw a great stag with spreading antlers. Quickly he ate some cherries and spit the seeds into his gun. He fired at the stag and hit him squarely in the forehead, but the animal staggered off. The next year he came upon the same stag with a ten-foot cherry tree growing between his horns. After he killed the animal, he had cherry sauce with a roasted haunch.

The Baron had a faithful hound who hunted her legs off for her master; thereafter he used her only as a terrier. Once while she was big with pups, she set out in pursuit of a hare. From the sounds the Baron thought he must have a pack of hounds. As soon as he caught up he saw what had happened. Both the hare and the hound had stopped to litter, and six dogs were chasing six hares.

The Baron entered the tsar's army to help retrieve the glory of Russian arms. His regiment drove the Turks into Oczakow, and the Baron pursued the enemy so closely that he entered the town gates ahead of all his comrades. The Turks closed the portcullis on him and cut his horse in two. Riding only on the forequarters, he returned to the gate and had the farrier sew the hindquarters back on.

During this war the Baron was taken prisoner. Following the custom, he was sold as a slave to the sultan. His duties were light but irksome—each day he drove the bees to pasture. One day a bee escaped his vigilance. Two hungry bears fell on her to steal her honey. The brave Baron threw his silver hatchet at the bears but missed; the deflected hatchet flew to the moon. He quickly planted a Turkish bean and climbed the stalk to retrieve his hatchet. While he was on the moon, the hot sun withered the beanstalk. To get down, the Baron seized some chopped straw and instantly plaited a rope. Since the rope was not long enough to reach the earth, he held onto the lower end and cut loose the upper end fastened to the horn of the moon. Then, tying the severed end to the bottom end, he gradually descended.

While in the service of the Turks he chanced to see a bright object in the sky. Taking aim, he brought it down with his fowling piece. To his surprise a Frenchman carrying part of a roasted sheep stepped from the balloon. The man explained that the wind had shifted just after he took off in his weather balloon from Land's End. The sheep was intended for meteorological experiments. After several days in the air, the man became hungry. Since he was so high up, he roasted a part of the sheep on the sunny side of the balloon basket. Roast mutton had been all he had to sustain him on the long trip.

The Baron possessed a famous slingshot, the very sling that David had used to kill Goliath. Uriah's wife stole the sling when she left David and bequeathed it to her favorite son. Afterward it was handed down in the family until it reached the Baron's great-great-grandfather. This ancestor lent it to a famous poacher, one Will Shakespeare, who used the sling to good effect to get venison from Sir Thomas Lucy's park.

Once, after jumping into the crater of Mt. Etna, the Baron landed in Vulcan's domain. Vulcan, jealous of Venus' attentions to the earthling, dropped the Baron down through the earth. He came out in the Antarctic Ocean. On the way back he came upon a cheese island whose inhabitants were nine feet tall. On the blue side of the island the cheese was so moldy that the people who ate it were incandescent from the luminous cheese. The Baron brought one of the luminous people back to London. This cheese man was employed to light the lamps in Somerset Park. All went well for several nights, until the starlings were attracted by the strong odor of the lamplighter. The voracious birds consumed entirely the unhappy cheese man. The Baron trapped the starlings and baked them in a pie. The pie, naturally au gratin, was served to the Lord Mayor's company.

BARRY LYNDON

Author: William Makepeace Thackeray (1811-1863)

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: England, Ireland, and Europe

First published: 1843

Principal characters:

REDMOND BARRY, a braggart and a bully

LADY HONORIA LYNDON, his wife

LORD BULLINGTON, her son

Critique:

Few narratives written in the first person present a better portrait of the narrator than that found in The Memoirs of Barry Lyndon, Esq. From the first boastful paragraph to the last petulant complaint against the deceit of his wife, the revelation of his true nature is complete. The period in history covered by this book lends itself well to the full scope of Redmond Barry's talents, which seem directed toward the basest practices of the times. Given to murder, adept at winning at cards, skillful in wooing the ladies, Barry shows himself a thoroughly corrupt scoundrel in the pattern of Fielding's Jonathan Wild.

The Story:

Deprived of wealth and estates by relatives, Widow Barry devoted herself to the careful rearing of her son Redmond.

Uncle Brady took a liking to the lad and asked the widow for permission to take the child to his ancestral home, Brady Castle. There Barry was treated kindly by his uncle. One of his cousins, Mick, persecuted him, however, and Mrs. Brady hated him.

Aggressive by nature, Barry invited animosity; his landless pride in his ancestral heritage led him into repeated neighborhood brawls until he had fought every lad in the area and acquired the reputation of a bully. At fifteen he fell in love with twenty-four-year-old Nora Brady, who was in love with Captain John Quinn, an Englishman. Deeply in debt, Uncle Brady hoped that Nora would marry the captain, who had promised to pay some of the old man's debts. Thoroughly unscrupulous and lacking in appreciation for his uncle's kindness, Barry, in a fit of jealousy, insulted Quinn and wounded him in a duel.

Believing the captain dead, Barry hurriedly set out on the road to Dublin. On the way he befriended a Mrs. Fitzsimons, the victim of a highway robbery. She took him to her castle, where Barry spent some of his own money in a lavish attempt to create a good impression. When he had lost all his money through high living and gambling, Mrs. Fitzsimons and her husband were glad to see him leave.

Barry next took King George's shilling and enlisted for a military expedition in Europe. Boarding the ship, a crowded and filthy vessel, he learned that Captain Quinn had not died after all, for the pistols had been loaded only with tow, but had married Nora Brady.

Detesting service in the British Army, Barry deserted to the Prussians. At the end of the Seven Years' War he was garrisoned in Berlin. By that time he was known as a thorough scoundrel and a quarrelsome bully. Sent by Frederick the Great to spy on the Chevalier Balibari, suspected of being an Austrian agent, Barry learned that the officer was his own father's brother, Barry of Ballybarry. This elderly gentleman actually made his way by gambling, rising and falling in wealth as his luck ran. When the gambler decided to leave Berlin, Barry, eager to escape from Prussian service, disguised himself and fled to Dresden. There he joined his uncle, who was high in favor at the Saxon court.

Barry, living like a high-born gentleman, supported himself by operating a gambling table. At the court of the Duke of X— he pursued Countess Ida, one of the wealthiest heiresses in the duchy. Disliking the countess personally but greatly admiring her fortune, he ruthlessly set about to win her from her fiancé, the Chevalier De Magny. Gambling with the hapless man, Barry won from him all he possessed. At last De Magny agreed to play for the hand of Countess Ida, and lost. Barry's scheme might have succeeded if he had not become involved in a court intrigue. He was forced to leave the duchy.

Roaming through all the famous cities of Europe, Barry acquired a wide reputation as a skillful gambler. At Spa he met Lord Charles and Lady Honoria Lyndon, who held the former Barry lands, and he decided to marry Lady Lyndon following the death of her husband, who was very ill. A year later, hearing that Lord Charles had died at Castle Lyndon, in Ireland, he set out to woo Lady Honoria. Employing numerous underhanded devices, which included blackmail, bribery, dueling, and intimidation, Barry forced himself upon Lady Lyndon, who at first resisted his suit. But Barry persecuted the lady relentlessly, bribing her servants, spying on her every move, paying her homage, and stealing her correspondence. When she fled to London to escape his persistent attentions, he followed her. At last he overcame her aversion and objections, and she agreed to become his wife. Adding her name to his own, he became Barry Lyndon, Esq.

Although she was haughty and overbearing by nature, Lady Lyndon soon yielded to the harsh dominance of her husband, who treated her brutally and thwarted her attempts to control her own fortune. After a few days of marriage the Lyndons went to Ireland, where he immediately assumed management of the Lyndon estates. Living in high fashion, he spent money freely in order to establish himself as a gentleman in the community. When Lady Lyndon attempted to protest, he complained of her ill temper; if she pleaded for affection, he called her a nag. The abuse he showered upon her was reflected in the way he used her son, Lord Bullingdon, who, unlike his mother, did not submit meekly to Barry's malice.

The birth of Bryan Lyndon added to Barry's problems. Since the estate was entailed upon Lord Bullingdon, young Bryan would have no rights of inheritance to Lady Lyndon's property. To provide for his son, Barry sold some of the timber on the estates, over the protests of Lord Bullingdon's guardian. Barry gave the money so obtained to his mother, who used it to repurchase the old Barry lands, which Barry intended to bequeath to his son. Barry himself was actively despised in the community, but through foul means and cajolery he won a seat in Parliament and used his victory to triumph over his enemies.

Barry made no attempt to disguise his contempt and disgust for his wife, who under his profligacy had become petulant. When she rebelled against his conduct, he threatened to remove Bryan from her; she was subdued many times in this manner. Little Bryan was completely spoiled by his father's indulgence. Barry contrived also to rid himself of his stepson, who finally obliged him by running off to America to fight against the rebels. Barry's enemies used Lord Bullingdon's flight to slander the Irish upstart, and the young man's legal guardians continued their efforts to curb the wasteful dissipation of Lady Lyndon's wealth, which was dwindling under Barry's administration. In the end Barry's unpopularity caused him to lose his seat in Parliament.

Heavily in debt, he retired to Castle

Lyndon. When Lord Bullingdon was reported killed in America, young Bryan became heir to the estates. Soon afterward the boy died when thrown from his horse. His death caused Lady Lyndon such anguish that a report spread that she was mad. Barry and his mother, now the mistress of Castle Lyndon, treated Lady Lyndon shabbily. Keeping her virtually a prisoner, spying on her every move, and denying her intercourse with her friends, they did almost drive her mad. Under the necessity of signing some papers, she tricked Barry into taking her to London. There he was trapped by Lord George Poynings, Lady Lyndon's former suitor, and her indignant relatives, gathered to free the unhappy woman from his custody.

Offered the alternative of going to jail as a swindler or of leaving the country with an annuity of three hundred pounds, he chose the latter. Later he returned secretly to England and nearly succeeded in winning back his weak-willed wife. His attempt was foiled, however, by Lord Bullingdon, who reappeared suddenly after he had been reported dead. Barry was thrown into the Fleet Prison, where, suffering from delirium tremens, he died.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR

Type of work: Drama

Locale: Smithfield, London

First presented: 1614

Principal characters:

URSULA, owner of a booth at Bartholomew Fair

Critique:

The main plot, if there can be said to be such, of Bartholomew Fair is the story, reminiscent of the Arabian Nights' tale of Harun-al-Rashid, of Adam Overdo's mingling, in disguise, among people to whom he metes out justice. The other plots are hinted at rather than developed. Still, Bartholomew Fair teems with life and is probably unsurpassed for its delineation of English types—especially the low types—of the early Jacobean period. Jonson also held the society of his day up for criticism in such figures as Zeal-of-the-Land Busy, the puritan; Adam Overdo, the zealous justice of the peace; and Bartholomew Cokes, the well-to-do simpleton from Middlesex. That no great evil is done in the play and that no one comes to any grief would indicate that Jonson, though a satirist, felt a real affection for all men in his beloved London.

The Story:

Winwife, a London gallant, came courting Dame Purecraft, a widow who lived with her daughter, Win-the-Fight, and her son-in-law, John Littlewit, a proctor. Littlewit disclosed to him that Dame Purecraft had been told by fortune-tellers that she would marry, within a week, a madman. In this connection Littlewit suggested to Winwife that he deport himself in the manner of his companion Tom Quarlous, a city madcap.

Quarlous, entering in search of Winwife, kissed Win several times until Winwife cautioned him to desist. Littlewit, who was not too acute, actually encouraged Winwife and Quarlous to be free with his wife. Littlewit also revealed to his visitors that Dame Purecraft had a new suitor, one Zeal-of-the-Land Busy, a puritan from Banbury. Busy had taken lodgings in Littlewit's house.

Humphrey Waspe, the testy old servant of young Bartholomew Cokes, a foolish gentleman of the provinces, came to Littlewit to pick up a marriage license for his master. Soon afterward Cokes appeared in company with two women. One was Mistress Overdo, his natural sister and the wife of Justice Adam Overdo; the other was Grace Wellborn, Cokes' fiancée and Overdo's ward. It was obvious that Waspe was the servant to an extremely light-headed young man. Cokes declared his intention of squiring Grace to Bartholomew Fair before they returned to Middlesex. Waspe objected, but finally resigned himself to the inevitable. Winwife and Quarlous, sensing fun at hand, decided to go along. Not wishing to miss the fun, Littlewit declared that he would go too. Dame Purecraft and Busy both rationalized puritan strictures against attending fairs and gave the young couple permission to go so that Win might eat roast pig; indeed, Busy and the widow declared their intention of going with them to Bartholomew Fair.

In disguise and with a notebook in his pocket, Justice Overdo had gone to the fair to seek out criminals and to record lawlessness. Suspecting Ursula, a seller of beer and roast pig, Overdo stopped at her booth to test her. As he drank, various shady personalities entered the booth. He asked Mooncalf, Ursula's handy man, for information about them all, but Mooncalf's replies were always vague. Overdo conceived a feeling of sympathy for one Edgeworth, a young cutpurse. Not suspecting Edgeworth's profession, he felt that he should rescue this excellent youth from such knavish company.

At Ursula's booth, where Winwife and Quarlous condescendingly stopped for a drink, Quarlous became involved in a fight with Knockem, a horse-trader. Ursula, running from her kitchen to throw hot grease on Winwife and Quarlous, stumbled and the grease burned her leg. Knockem declared that he would operate her booth while she sat by to oversee the business.

Cokes and his party, arriving at the fair, made their way to Ursula's booth, where Overdo warned them against the evils of tobacco and ale. Edgeworth stole Cokes' purse and gave it to his confederate, Nightingale, a ballad-monger. Mistress Overdo observed that Overdo, who was in disguise, spoke much in the manner of her own husband, Justice Adam Overdo. Missing his purse, Cokes declared indiscreetly that he had another one and that he defied cutpurses by placing it on his belt where the other one had been. Waspe, suspecting Overdo to be the cutpurse, thrashed the justice. As Overdo cried for help, Cokes and his party left Ursula's booth.

Busy led Littlewit, Win, and Dame Purecraft into the fair after cautioning them to look neither to left nor right and to stay from the sinful booths as they marched toward Ursula's booth to get roast pig. While they waited to be served, Overdo reappeared, still determined to observe the goings on, but without preaching. Cokes and his party, burdened with trinkets, also returned to the booth. Waspe was miserable because Cokes was spending his money on every foolish article offered him. When a toyman and a gingerbread woman argued over customer rights, Cokes bought the wares of both and even retained the toyman to provide entertainment at the forthcoming marriage. Nightingale and Edgeworth feared that Cokes would spend all of his money before they could get at him again. Nightingale sang a ballad while Edgeworth lifted the second purse from the enchanted Cokes' belt. Winwife and Quarlous looked on with amusement. When Cokes realized his loss and cried out, Overdo, who was standing nearby, was seized as a suspect. Waspe, sure that Cokes would lose everything he possessed, took into his care a black box containing the marriage license.

Quarlous, meanwhile, disclosed to Edgeworth that he had been detected stealing Cokes' purse. In exchange for secrecy, Edgeworth promised to steal the contents of the black box.

Busy and his friends ate pork at Ursula's booth. Encountering the toyman and the gingerbread woman, Busy, in a moment of religious zeal, attempted to seize the wicked toys and upset the tray of gingerbread figures. The toyman called police officers, who took Busy, followed by Dame Purecraft, away to be put in the stocks. Littlewit and Win were now free to enjoy the fair as they chose.

Overdo, also in the stocks, overheard to his shame that he had a reputation for harshness in meting out justice. He did not reveal himself when the officers took him and Busy away to face Justice Overdo.

While Cokes was looking for the toyman and the gingerbread woman, in hopes of getting his money back from them, he was intercepted by Nightingale and Edgeworth, who tricked him out of his hat, jacket, and sword. Wretched Cokes began to understand at last that he was being grievously abused at the fair.

In another part of the fair, Winwife and Quarlous, who had attracted Grace away from her group, drew swords to decide a dispute as to who should have Cokes' attractive young fiancée. Grace bade them not to fight; at her suggestion, each wrote a word on a tablet. The first passerby was to choose the word he liked the better. The one whose word was thus chosen would win the hand of Grace, who had quite decided that Cokes was not the man for her. This business was interrupted, however, when Edgeworth urged both men to watch him steal the marriage license from Waspe, who was with the crowd in Ursula's booth.

Waspe and his companions, including Mistress Overdo, were drinking ale; all were quite intoxicated. When Waspe got into a scuffle with Knockem, Edgeworth took the license from the black box. Quarlous laughed at the drunken antics of one of the group and had to fight. Officers entered and seized Waspe for disturbing the peace.

Littlewit, who had written the story of the puppet show, left Win at Ursula's booth while he joined the puppeteers.

While she waited, Win met Captain Whit, a bawd, who told her that he knew how she could live a life of endless pleasure and wealth.

Unable to find Justice Overdo at his lodgings, the officers returned their prisoners to the stocks. Waspe, brought to the stocks, managed to escape before his legs could be confined. When a madman engaged an officer in a scuffle, Overdo and Busy also escaped, the lock of the stocks having been left unclasped. Dame Purecraft suddenly fell in love with the madman, a lawyer who was distracted because of a past misunderstanding with Justice Overdo.

Later Quarlous, disguised as the madman and pursued by Dame Purecraft, returned to Winwife and Grace. Meanwhile the real madman had chosen Winwife's word, Palemon. Grace then declared that she would become Winwife's spouse. Overdo, disguised as a porter, came upon Quarlous. Anxious to help the man whom he had brought to distraction, Overdo gave him a seal and warrant for anything within reason that he might desire.

Cokes, in the meantime, had found his way to the puppet theater, where he borrowed money from Littlewit. When Captain Whit, Knockem, and Edgeworth came to the theater, they had with them Win, masked, and Mistress Overdo, who was sick from too much ale. Captain Whit offered Win to Overdo for his pleasure. Waspe also came to the theater and joined his young master. The play was presented; it was an idiotic blending of the legends of Hero and Leander and Damon and Pythias. During the showing Busy entered and threatened to break up the theater. Persuaded to argue the sinfulness of the puppet theater with one of the puppets, he was soundly defeated in the argument.

Quarlous, still disguised as the madman, came with Grace to the theater. Littlewit, who had gone in search of Win, returned without her. The true madman and Ursula entered. When all were together, Overdo declared his intention of punishing all who had engaged in rascality. But when Quarlous questioned his judgment and revealed Edgeworth as a cutpurse and not an innocent youth, as the justice had supposed, Overdo decided there was such a thing as false judgment; also, that mankind was weak. Quarlous won the hand of Dame Purecraft. Being reassured that restitution would be made all around, Overdo invited everyone to his house for dinner.

BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER

Author: George Meredith (1828-1909)

Type of plot: Political romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1874-1875

Principal characters:

NEVIL BEAUCHAMP, a young naval officer

EVERARD ROMFREY, his uncle

MRS. ROSAMUND CULLING, the Romfrey housekeeper

RÉNEE ROUAILLOUT, née de Croisnel, Nevil's beloved

COLONEL HALKETT, a stanch Tory

CECELIA HALKETT, his daughter

DR. SHRAPNEL, a radical

JENNY DENHAM, his niece

Critique:

Beauchamp's Career appeared only a short time before Meredith published his famous Essay on Comedy. The novel, in consequence, bears the stamp of his theorizing, and in it comedy becomes a subtle and complex tool for character portrayal and social criticism, especially in the field of contemporary politics. Frederick Augustus Maxse, political reformer and Meredith's friend, was the original of Beauchamp. Other characteristics of the novel are typical of Meredith's work. There are delicately treated emotional conflicts and skillfully rendered personality differences. The dialogue is good, probably less discursive than in other Meredith novels. The plot is a simple one. The satire follows the same pattern. The hero, Beauchamp, is an admirable character, as is Cecelia Halkett. Both are targets for ironic but poetic comedy.

The Story:

There was a diplomatic dispute between England and France, with much rattling of swords on both sides. The affair, loudly taken up by the press, so stirred Nevil Beauchamp's national pride that he decided to post a challenge to the French Guard. Uncle Everard Romfrey's housekeeper, Mrs. Rosamund Culling, mailed the letter for Nevil. No reply ever came, and Nevil went off to fight the Russians in the Crimea. Uncle Everard expected his nephew to behave like a true Beauchamp.

Wounded in service, Nevil went to Venice with Roland de Croisnel, a French officer whose life he had saved at the risk of his own. Mrs. Culling also went to Italy. In Venice, Nevil drifted in a gondola with Roland de Croisnel's sister Rénee, who was grateful to her brother's rescuer. The flirtation was interrupted by the arrival of the middle-aged Marquis de Rouaillout, intended as a husband for Rénee. Nevil asked Rénee to marry him, but she refused to disappoint her father by betraying Rouaillout. When Nevil persisted, Roland assured him that Rénee did not love him.

The marquis arrived just as Nevil, Roland, Rénee, and Mrs. Culling set out for an overnight jaunt in a boat. During the trip Nevil secured Rénee's promise to break her pledge to the marquis. They headed for Trieste, but Rénee's phlegmatic consent and Roland's dismal viewpoint dissuaded Nevil from the elopement. They returned to Venice with nothing settled. The next day Rénee married the marquis. Nevil went to sea once more.

Later, in the famous port of Bevisham, Nevil began his campaign as a Liberal candidate for a seat in Parliament. Mrs. Culling, following the young man there, met a Miss Denham, ward of Dr. Shrapnel, who seemed to be helping Nevil in his campaign. Mrs. Culling wished that she could influence Nevil to drop his foolish scheme. Uncle Everard scoffed at Nevil's political ambitions, especially so because he despised Dr. Shrapnel.

Nevil, campaigning for votes, paid calls on his acquaintances and attended dinners. Colonel and Cecelia Halkett, steadfast Tories, prompted by Uncle Everard, tried to talk the young Liberal candidate out of his set course. They were strongly opposed to his views, but when the opposition wrote a rhyme comically depicting Nevil's romance with Rénee, the colonel thought the thrust unfair.

Meeting Lord Palmet, who was secretly in the rival camp, Nevil invited the gentleman to accompany him on his campaign tour. While entangled in political plots from which Cecelia was trying to extricate him, Nevil received from Rénee a note bidding him to come to her at once.

Twice since her marriage Nevil had met Rénee, both times in the company of her husband, and Roland had written to him occasionally. In France, Rénee told Nevil that she had sent for him only to fulfill a wish to see him once again, a mere caprice. She was in the company of a Count Henri d'Henriél, who wore her glove. The marquis was traveling and only his sister, Madame d'Auffrey, was staying with Rénee. Later Madame d'Auffrey told Nevil that Rénee had wagered her glove to d'Henriél that Nevil would come immediately at her request. A storm had delayed Nevil; the Frenchman had kept the glove.

When Nevil returned from France with a game leg, his enemies gossiped that he had fought a duel with the marquis. The report was not true, but Nevil did not win the election.

During the campaign Cecelia Halkett, admiring courage, had fallen in love with him. Uncle Everard pressed his nephew's cause by proposing to Colonel Halkett an alliance between Nevil and Cecelia. Nevil, after promising to meet Colonel Halkett and his daughter, paid a call on Dr. Shrapnel to bid farewell to Jenny Denham, who was leaving for Switzerland. The young girl begged Nevil to look after the doctor.

A letter written by Dr. Shrapnel filled with advice for the young man fell into Uncle Everard's hands. Indignant at the contents, he went to Dr. Shrapnel and horsewhipped the man who was attempting to undermine Nevil's future with radical theories. Cecelia, fearing that a break between Nevil and his uncle would end the marriage negotiations, tried to convince her father that Nevil was worthy of her. The more Colonel Halkett derided Nevil's political views and disdained the Shrapnel influence, the more Cecelia insisted that Nevil was a man of high honor. She added, however, that she would give him up if she ever learned that his honor was sullied.

Nevil challenged his uncle to give Dr. Shrapnel a personal apology. Trying to assist the injured man in earning his livelihood, Nevil next asked Uncle Everard for money. His request was refused. Penniless, Nevil left his uncle's house, but a short time later an unexpected inheritance saved him from actual need.

One night Rénee appeared at Nevil's house. Having left her husband and believing in Nevil's courtesy and constancy, she had come to him. Since she had married the marquis to please her father, now dead, she had no other bonds to keep her chained to a cold and sullen husband.

Nevil sent immediately for Mrs. Culling and pleaded with Rénee that Roland be summoned. Close on Rénee's heels came Madame d'Auffrey, who announced that the marquis was in London. When Rénee became ill, it was necessary for her family to occupy Nevil's home until her recovery. Nevil, who no longer loved Rénee, patched the shattered marriage, and the unhappy wife returned to France.

Cecelia still loved Nevil and in spite of all attempts to dissuade her she had remained loyal to him. But the new scandal about the marquis shook her faith. She went to Italy with her father. On her return she yielded to her father's wishes and became engaged to a young man of stable notions, Mr. Blackburn Tuckham. Nevil's proposal of marriage came too late, and when she refused him he became ill.

Uncle Everard, some time before, had married Mrs. Culling, who was soon to bear a child. When Nevil became ill, his uncle, in an effort to ease his wife's anxiety, begged Colonel Halkett to let Cecelia marry Nevil in order to hasten the sick man's recovery. Meanwhile Jenny Denham was Nevil's nurse in Dr. Shrapnel's house.

Nevil's illness brought all his friends to his bedside, as well as his political enemies. In the end a reconciliation between uncle and nephew was effected when Everard apologized to Dr. Shrapnel. Nevil was persuaded to sail to Italy to recuperate. He insisted that Jenny and the doctor accompany him.

Jenny had nursed Nevil back to health. More than that, she had been steadfast throughout all his difficulties. In love with Jenny, Nevil wanted her to marry him before they set out on their voyage. Until the last moment she refused, hoping that he and Cecelia would become reconciled.

The three went on their cruise. Jenny bore a child along the way. Shortly after their return to England, Nevil, trying to rescue a drowning child, was himself drowned. His career to reform the world was over.

Critique:

Beneath the surface of this gay, bustling, even risqué comedy, lies a sterner note. The final agreement of Sullen and his wife to separate because they cannot arrive at compatibility is basically the same doctrine which John Milton had professed in his divorce tracts some sixty-odd years before. Yet those doctrines were still not prevalent in England in Farquhar's time, and the dramatist showed courage in introducing them into his play, even though it was a comedy not likely to be taken seriously. Restoration plays with a locale other than London and Bath were extremely rare. This drama, laid in Lichfield, proved popular in its own day, and it is still acted by college drama groups. The lively scenes in the tavern and the picture of life in a smaller English town give the play perennial appeal.

The Story:

Aimwell and Archer, two younger sons who were down to their last two hundred pounds, left London and traveled to Lichfield, where they hoped to wed Aimwell to an heiress and thus make their fortunes. Aimwell posed as his older brother, Lord Aimwell, and Archer assumed the livery of a servant. Arriving in Lichfield, they went to an inn, where the innkeeper mistook them for highwaymen traveling in disguise.

In Lichfield they learned that Dorinda, sister of Sullen, the local squire, was an heiress in her own right. Aimwell went to church on Sunday to call himself to her attention and to see her for himself. Back at the inn Archer made advances to the innkeeper's daughter Cherry. He found her ready to marry him and bring a dowry of two thousand pounds. But in spite of the fact that she was pretty and well-dowered, he could not, as a gentleman, make up his mind to marry her.

After church Dorinda and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Sullen, talked about the gentleman they had seen at the service. Dorinda had decided already that she was in love with Aimwell. Offering as evidence her own unhappy marriage to the brutal and drunken Sullen, Mrs. Sullen urged her not to hurry into matrimony. Mrs. Sullen also disclosed that she was enjoying a flirtation with Bellair, a French officer held prisoner in Lichfield. Dorinda agreed to help Mrs. Sullen in her flirtation as long as Mrs. Sullen retained her honor.

At the inn the landlord, in league with a gang of robbers, talked with Gibbet, a highwayman, about Aimwell and Archer. The evasiveness of Archer and Aimwell, when questioned, made the innkeeper and Gibbet even more certain that the two gentlemen were also highwaymen. The innkeeper's daughter, overhearing the conversation, resolved to aid Archer.

tried to learn more about Aimwell. They had their servant invite Archer, his supposed servant, to the house so that they could question him about his master. While the two women made their plans, Gibbet introduced himself to Aimwell and tried to find out who Aimwell might be. They were both introduced to Foigard, who claimed to be a French priest but who actually was an Irishman in disguise.

At the Sullen house Dorinda and Mrs. Sullen questioned Archer about his master. Mrs. Sullen, seeing through his disguise as a servant, became infatuated with him. Dorinda and Mrs. Sullen later agreed that Aimwell and Archer must be hiding after a duel, since both of them were obviously gentlemen. Later in the day, Bellair came to the house. While he and Mrs. Sullen talked, Sullen entered and threatened to kill the Frenchman, even though the latter, as a prisoner, bore no arms. Mrs. Sullen intervened by threatening her husband with a pistol.

Late in the afternoon Aimwell pretended to be taken ill in front of the Sullen house. Carried inside for treatment, he took the opportunity to get better acquainted with Dorinda and her sister-in-law. Both Aimwell and Dorinda were soon convinced that they were in love, and Mrs. Sullen found herself more and more infatuated by Archer. While in the house Archer discovered from the servants that Foigard, the pretended Frenchman, had plotted to introduce Bellair into Mrs. Sullen's bedroom that night.

On their return to the inn Aimwell and Archer made Foigard acknowledge his plot against Mrs. Sullen. Rather than be taken to law, he agreed to help them. While they spoke, in another part of the inn, the landlord, Gibbet, and other highwaymen were plotting to rob the Sullen house that night. They planned to leave the country and live well for a while.

Early in the evening Sir Charles Freeman, Mrs. Sullen's brother, arrived at the inn. Just returned to England, he was furious to learn that his sister had been married to Sullen. Sir Charles, knowing the brute Sullen was, hoped to secure his sister's release from the marriage.

With the help of Foigard, Archer hid himself in Mrs. Sullen's bedroom. When he revealed himself to Mrs. Sullen, they talked until the robbers entered the house. Gibbet, entering Mrs. Sullen's room, was overpowered by Archer, who then went in pursuit of the other rogues. As he engaged two of them, Aimwell, who had been aroused by the innkeeper's daughter, arrived and aided his friend in subduing the robbers.

Archer, slightly wounded in the fray, was taken away and treated by Mrs. Sullen and her mother-in-law, Lady Bountiful. Meanwhile Aimwell proposed to Dorinda and was accepted. As Foigard was about to begin the impromptu ceremony, Aimwell became conscience-stricken at the thought of marrying the girl under false pretenses. When he revealed that he was not Lord Aimwell but only a poor younger brother, the ceremony was postponed.

Sir Charles Freeman arrived from the inn to visit his sister. Archer and Aimwell, who knew him well, realized that he would penetrate their disguises immediately. Dorinda put an end to their worries when she returned to tell Aimwell that his brother had died. He was now Lord Aimwell and a rich man.

Aimwell could not believe the news until Sir Charles Freeman confirmed the story. Aimwell agreed quickly to give an amount equal to Dorinda's dower, ten thousand pounds, to Archer, who had helped him win her hand.

Sullen, entering on this scene of happiness, demanded to be told what Aimwell and Archer were doing in his home. He softened somewhat when told that they had rescued his family and property from robbers. Then Sir Charles questioned Sullen and discovered that he was as unhappy as Mrs. Sullen in their marriage. Sullen agreed to a separation, but he refused to give up her dower. Archer then produced some papers he had taken from the robbers, including the marriage documents and Sullen's titles to property, and gave them to Sir Charles Freeman. Faced with the loss of the documents, Sullen agreed to give up both his wife and her dower.

Everyone except Sullen joined hands and danced their celebration of the approaching marriage of Dorinda and Aimwell and Mrs. Sullen's separation from her husband. Sullen glumly sent for a drink of whiskey.

THE BETROTHED

Author: Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: Milan, Italy

First published: 1825-1826

Principal characters:

LORENZO, a young Italian peasant

LUCIA, his betrothed

DON RODRIGO, an arrogant nobleman

THE UN-NAMED, a powerful outlaw nobleman

DON ABBONDIO, a parish priest

FRA CRISTOFORO, a Capuchin, friend of the betrothed couple

Critique:

The Betrothed, one of the world's great historical novels, established its author as the leading Italian romantic novelist of the nineteenth century. It was the work of Manzoni, and The Betrothed in particular, which raised Italian fiction from the low estate to which it had fallen and made it, in the nineteenth century, assume a high place in European fiction. The simple, adventurous story that Manzoni told has captivated readers ever since it first appeared; in fact, the novel has had a recent flurry of popular success. In the best tradition of historical fiction, Manzoni presented many facets of life and culture in Milan during the 1620's, when much of Italy was under Spanish domination. In this novel there are not only peasants and villainous nobles, who are the chief characters, but also the bravos, citizens, nuns, petty officials, churchmen in high office, and scores of other types so typical of seventeenth-century Italy.

The Story:

On the day before he was to have performed the marriage ceremony for Lorenzo and Lucia, two young peasants, Don Abbondio, parish priest at Lecco, was warned by two armed henchmen of Don Rodrigo, a tyrannical noble, not to marry the pair. In fear for his life, Don Abbondio refused to perform the marriage when asked to do so by the young couple, and when they tried to trick him into being present while they exchanged vows he dashed away into hiding.

The reason for the warning given to the priest was that Don Rodrigo himself wished to seduce Lucia. He was not in love with the girl, but he had wagered his cousin that he could have her for his enjoyment while she was still a virgin. Toward this end he sent a crew of his henchmen to abduct the girl from her home. Appearing at Lucia's home, they were frightened away by the tumult aroused when the priest caused the alarm to be sounded by tolling the church bell.

Lucia, frightened, sought aid from a saintly Capuchin, Fra Cristoforo, who gave her, her mother, and Lorenzo temporary haven within the walls of the monastery while he made arrangements for the safety of all three away from the wrath and wickedness of Don Rodrigo. He sent the girl to seek sanctuary with a Capuchin chapter at Monza, along with her mother. He sent Lorenzo to another monastery in Milan.

Arriving at Monza, Lucia was put under the care of a nun who belonged to a noble family that had placed her in the convent rather than pay a dowry. The nun was a headstrong woman and, in some ways, wicked, but the Capuchins thought Lucia would be safe under her care. Lucia remained hidden for some weeks. Then she was abducted from the convent by ruffians who had received forced aid from the nun.

After Lucia had escaped him, Don Rodrigo caused a search to be made for her until his henchmen discovered her place of refuge. Fearing that he himself could never take her from the sanctuary, Don Rodrigo enlisted the aid of a powerful noble called The Un-named. The Un-named, grateful for past services by Don Rodrigo, agreed to aid his vassal in abducting the girl and teaching a harsh lesson to peasants who thought they could defy the nobility.

The Un-named learned that one of his men living near the convent had undertaken to murder a nun who had displeased the woman to whom the Capuchins had sent Lucia. Because of the murder committed for her benefit, the nun was forced to enter into the scheme and send Lucia out of the convent. Once out of the sanctuary, Lucia was kidnaped by the Un-named's men and taken in a coach to his mountain retreat.

Meanwhile Lorenzo had failed to reach the Capuchin monastery in Milan. On his arrival in the city he had found the populace in a turmoil because of a shortage of bread created by famine. He had taken part in a riot and afterwards he became drunk in a tavern. While drunk, he had babbled to a police spy that he had incited a crowd to riot, and the spy had him picked up by the police. Another mob released Lorenzo from the police. With a price on his head, he fled from the Duchy of Milan into territory controlled by Venice. There he located a distant relative who found work for him in a silk mill. When the authorities of Milan tried to have him returned to that city, Lorenzo fled again and assumed a fictitious name in another Venetian community.

The Un-named, moved by Lucia's beauty and innocence, refused to turn her over to Don Rodrigo. Instead, he went to Cardinal Federigo and announced that he had suffered a change of conscience and wished to end a career of tyranny and oppression. The churchman welcomed him as an erring parishioner. Lucia, released from her imprisonment in the noble's mountain castle, returned once again to the keeping of her mother. Rather than send the girl to her home and the persecution of Don Rodrigo, Cardinal Federigo sent Lucia and her mother to the home of a noblewoman known for her charity. There the girl would be safe.

Don Rodrigo, angry because Fra Cristoforo had been able to aid the girl and so preserve her honor, caused the removal of the Capuchin to Rimini.

More than a year passed, with Lorenzo unable to return to the Duchy of Milan because of his banishment. Corresponding with Lorenzo through letterwriters, Lucia told him that in her period of duress she had vowed to the Virgin that she would never marry if released from the clutches of the ruffians who held her. Finally, because of the time that had intervened and the confusion that had arisen because of a plague, Lorenzo decided to return to Milan, where Lucia was staying with the charitable noblewoman. While searching for her in a city desolated by the plague, he himself took the disease. After his recovery he continued his search, only to learn that Lucia had been taken ill and sent to the pesthouse, along with thousands of other unfortunates who had contracted the disease.

At the pesthouse he found Fra Cristoforo, who had gone to Milan to aid the sick. Among his patients the Capuchin had Don Rodrigo, who had caught the plague and was near death. Fra Cristoforo made Lorenzo pardon Don Rodrigo and promise to pray for his soul. Continuing his search for Lucia, Lorenzo found her convalescing in the women's section of the pesthouse. After their reunion Fra Cristoforo told Lucia that her vow to the Virgin was not valid, inasmuch as she had previously exchanged betrothal vows with Lorenzo.

When the plague subsided, Lorenzo went back to their village and found that the plague had almost wiped out its population as well, although sparing Don Abbondio and Lucia's mother. While he was there, the new heir to the estate arrived, Don Rodrigo having succumbed to the plague. With the new incumbent's aid, for he was a friend of the cardinal who had befriended Lucia, the betrothed couple returned to Lecco and were at last married by Don Abbondio.

After their marriage the couple moved, again with the nobleman's aid, to a new home in the Venetian territory, where Lorenzo plied his trade in a silk mill and he and Lucia reared a large and healthy family.

Type of work: Drama

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Critique:

This play is the second and more powerful half of a dual play in which Bjørnson examined social and economic problems of his century. In Beyond Human Power, II, he probed the apparent inability of labor and management to understand one another. Bjørnson's own solution is propounded by Pastor Falk, who preaches Christian patience and forbearance, and by Rachel Sang, a moderate liberal whose aim it is to spread social enlightenment. There is in the drama a rather disconcerting mixture of naturalism and expressionism which slightly diminishes but does not too greatly detract from the effectiveness of the play as a document of social protest.

The Story:

In an industrial city of coastal Norway the workingmen were on strike against the factory owners. They were forced, by their poverty and low social status, to live in a dank chasm below the city, called Hell.

The strike dragged on, and from day to day the people grew more desperate and restive. Maren Haug, a worker's wife, was so distracted by the futility of the situation that she bolstered her courage with liquor and killed her two children and herself. The entire community of Hell attended the funeral, which was conducted by the good but ineffectual Pastor Falk. After the funeral service, the people gathered in what constituted the community square. There they listened while Falk tried to give them Christian advice; he told them that they should not despair, that they should avoid all violence, that the situation demanded understanding and patience.

As he talked, Bratt, a former pastor who was now leader of the workers' union, appeared and the crowd joined him. Bratt harangued the workers with hate-filled words about the injustices suffered by the inhabitants of Hell, and he revealed that the owners were to meet that night in the castle, which had been bought and rebuilt by the town's most affluent manufacturer. Bratt's attitude suggested that violence might be done the owners while they were assembled in the castle, a symbol of their wealth and power.

As the workingmen trooped away to get money at the union office in Hell, Elias Sang, a young sympathizer of the workers, joined Bratt. Elias, in seeking solutions to the workers' plight, had been avoiding Bratt. Now, under Bratt's demagogic influence, he had changed; he appeared to believe that Maren Haug's recourse was one that more of the workers should take, that sensational examples of martyrdom would impress the owners and public opinion. Elias, clearly determined on more violent methods than those already employed, left Bratt deeply disturbed.

Meanwhile the industrialist Holger had turned his hilltop mansion over to Rachel, the sister of Elias; it was to house the workers' convalescent hospital that she had established. Rachel and Elias, who were from the northern part of Norway, had inherited a fortune from an aunt in America, and they had put their fortune into worthy endeavors. Elias devoted his time and money to the cause of the union; Rachel had established a hospital and a liberal newspaper. Holger, Rachel's friend, was about to move into the medieval castle he had recently bought and restored. At the same time he took under his own supervision his niece and nephew, Spera and Credo, the children of his late liberal brother, Summer. Since the death of their parents Rachel had been their guide and mentor.

When a delegation of workingmen called on Holger for the purpose of settling the strike, his highbanded attitude greatly incensed them. Aroused by his insults, one workman leaped at Holger's throat, but was restrained from doing violence by his fellow workers. The workingmen having left in despair, Rachel went to Holger and advised him not to hold the manufacturers' meeting in the castle that night; she foresaw danger. Holger, insisting that the meeting would be held there, declared that it would be lavish in hospitality and entertainment. When Rachel hinted that the workingmen might set off dynamite in the abandoned mine shafts which ran under the castle, Holger said that such a move would only aid the cause of the owners.

Elias, joining his sister in her new hospital, was disturbed as he tried to explain how deeply Maren Haug's suicide had affected him, but Rachel was unable to grasp the seriousness of his new attitude even when he told her that the only way to a new life was through death. The two reminisced about their happy childhood in northern Norway; then Elias kissed Rachel goodbye, as though for the last time, and left her.

Bratt, in excitement, went to Rachel and disclosed his conviction that Elias was about to end his life in the cause of the workingmen. Rachel, understanding at last, regretted that her brother had ever come under the influence of a leader who preached extreme, impracticable measures. Bratt himself, realizing what he had done, was filled with remorse.

In the castle, meanwhile, Holger was host to manufacturers from the entire country. The castle was festively lighted; servants dressed in medieval costumes carried refreshments to the guests; several orchestras provided music. In the great hall Holger presided over a meeting to decide upon the adoption of his plan to unionize the owners. The majority were quite eager, like sheep, to follow his plan, but two of the owners, Anker and Blom, spoke in behalf of an enlightened attitude toward the workingmen and toward capital's function in society. When they saw that they spoke to no avail, they left. A short time later they returned to report that they were unable to leave the castle.

All but one of the servants had disappeared. When Holger demanded an explanation from the remaining servant, who was Elias in disguise, he was told that the workingmen had filled the mine-shafts beneath the castle with high explosives, that the police who were guarding the castle had been tricked away from their posts, and that at his signal the castle would be blown to bits. As Elias moved to signal his people, Holger shot him.

The owners were thrown into a panic. One, out of his mind with fear, leaped from a window and fell to his death in the moat below. Holger, seeing that his fellow owners were, in their way, as wretched as the workingmen, joined Anker in a prayer for the good of all in the future; then the castle blew up.

Sometime later, at the hospital, Rachel mourned the loss of her brother. She was particularly disturbed by her inability to understand that when she had last talked to Elias he had then been intent upon self-destruction; she thought that she might have saved him. She felt bitterness because radical Bratt had brought death to her brother and barbarism to the city. Believing that the workingmen were in the right, she wondered why those in the right had ever resorted to violence.

As Rachel talked with Halden, a young architect, Holger, his right hand paralyzed and his head swathed in bandages, was brought to her in an armchair. When he disclosed to her that he had shot Elias, Rachel wept. Bratt, shaken out of his right senses by the explosion, came also to Rachel and disclosed, to her amazement that Halden was the son of Holger and that the architect, while employed in rebuilding the castle, had aided the workingmen in placing their dynamite.

After Bratt had wandered off distractedly, Credo and Spera came to Rachel and told her that Holger had given them permission to stay with her. Credo declared that he would dedicate his life to the inventions of devices that would bring mankind more leisure and happiness. Spera said that her intention was to work among women to bring them more freedom. The three went to find Holger, to ask him to forgive the workingmen and to confer with them.

BILLY BUDD

Author: Herman Melville (1819-1891)

Type of plot: Symbolic tragedy

Time of plot: 1797

Locale: Aboard a British man-of-war

First published: 1924

Principal characters:

BILLY BUDD, a young British sailor

CAPTAIN VERE, commanding officer of H. M. S. Indomitable

CLAGGART, master-at-arms aboard the Indomitable

Critique:

This last work of Melville's, finished shortly before his death in 1891, was finally given to the reading public through the offices of the author's granddaughter. It came at a time to help nurture the reawakened interest in Melville's work which has been growing ever since. If there is any message that the author wished his readers to have from him in the last days of his life, it must be found here. Such message is probably the symbolic assertion that evil is defeat in the world and that natural goodness, as exemplified in Billy Budd, the young sailor, is invincible in the affections of man, as represented by Captain Vere and the rest of the navy men aboard the Indomitable. This message seems to be what the author himself clung to in his last years when he was forgotten; he seemed to have the feeling that his apparent defeat at the hands of unknown forces could still be a victory.

The Story:

In 1797 the British merchant ship Rights-of-Man, named after Thomas Paine's famous reply to Edmund Burke's criticism of the French Revolution, was close to home after a long voyage. As it neared England, the merchant vessel was stopped by a man-of-war, H. M. S. Indomitable, and an officer, from the warship went aboard the Rights-of-Man to impress sailors for military service. This practice was necessary at the time to provide men to work the large number of ships which Britain had at sea for protection against the French.

The captain of the Rights-of-Man was relieved to have only one sailor taken from his ship, but he was unhappy because the man was his best sailor, Billy Budd. Billy was what his captain called a peacemaker; because of his strength and good looks he was a natural leader among the other sailors, and he used his influence to keep them contented and hard at work. Billy Budd seemed utterly without guile, a man who tried to promote the welfare of the merchant ship because he liked peace and was willing to work hard to please his superiors. When informed that he was not to return to England, but was to head for duty with the fleet in the Mediterranean Sea, he did not appear disturbed; he liked the sea and he had no family ties. He was an orphan who had been left in a basket as a tiny baby on the doorstep of a family in Bristol.

As the boat from the warship took him away from the merchant ship, Billy called farewell to the Rights-of-Man by name, a deed which greatly embarrassed the naval officer who had impressed him. The remark was unwittingly satirical of the treatment to which Billy was being subjected by the navy.

Once aboard the Indomitable, Billy quickly made himself at home with the ship and the men with whom he served in the foretop. Because of his good personality and his willingness to work, he soon made a place for himself with his messmates and also won the regard of the officers under whom he served.

At first the master-at-arms, a petty officer named Claggart, seemed particularly friendly to Billy, a fortunate circumstance, Billy thought, for the master-at-arms was the equivalent of the chief of police aboard the warship. The young sailor was rather surprised, therefore, when he received reprimands for slight breaches of conduct which were normally overlooked. The reprimands came from the ship's corporals who were Claggart's underlings. Since the reprimands indicated that something was wrong, Billy grew perturbed; he had a deadly fear of being the recipient of a flogging in public. He thought he could never stand such treatment.

Anxious to discover what was wrong, Billy consulted an old sailor, who told him that Claggart was filled with animosity for the young man. The reason for the animosity was not known, and because the old man could give him no reason Billy refused to believe that the master-at-arms was his enemy. Claggart had taken a deep dislike to Billy Budd on sight, however, and for no reason except a personal antipathy that the young man's appearance had generated. Sly as he was, Claggart kept, or tried to keep, his feelings to himself. He operated through underlings against Billy.

Not long after he had been warned by the old sailor, Billy spilled a bowl of soup in the path of Claggart as he was inspecting the mess. Even then, Claggart smiled and pretended to treat the incident as a joke, for Billy had done the deed accidentally. But a few nights later someone awakened Billy and told him to go to a secluded spot in the ship. Billy went and met a sailor who tried to tempt him into joining a mutiny. The incident bothered Billy, who could not understand why anyone had approached him as a possible conspirator. Such activity was not a part of his personality, and he was disgusted to find it in other men.

A few days later the master-at-arms approached the captain of the ship and reported that he and his men had discovered that a mutiny was being fomented by Billy Budd. Captain Vere, a very fair officer, reminded Claggart of the seriousness of the charge and warned the master-at-arms that bearing false witness in such a case called for the death penalty. Because Claggart persisted in his accusations, Captain Vere ended the interview on deck, which place he thought too public, and ordered the master-at-arms and Billy Budd to his cabin. There Captain Vere commanded Claggart to repeat his accusations. When he did, Billy became emotionally so upset that he was tongue-tied. In utter frustration at being unable to reply to the infamous charges, Billy hit the master-at-arms. The petty officer was killed when he fell heavily to the floor.

Captain Vere was filled with consternation, for he, like everyone except the master-at-arms, liked Billy Budd. After the surgeon had pronounced the petty officer dead, the captain immediately convened a court-martial to try Billy for assaulting and murdering a superior officer. Because England was at war, and because two mutinies had already occurred in the British navy that year, action had to be taken immediately. The captain could not afford to overlook the offense.

The court-martial, acting under regulations, found Billy Budd guilty and sentenced him to be hanged from a yard-arm the following morning. Even under the circumstances of Claggart's death, there was no alternative. The only person who could have testified that the charge of mutiny was false was the man who had been killed.

All the ship's company were dismayed when informed of the sentence. But Billy bore no animosity for the captain or for the officers who had sentenced him to die. When he was placed beneath the yardarm the following morning, he called out a blessing on Captain Vere, who, he realized, had no other choice in the matter but to hang him. It was quite strange, too, that Billy Budd's calm seemed even to control his corpse. Unlike most hanged men, he never twitched when hauled aloft by the neck. The surgeon's mate, when queried by his messmates, had no answer for the unique behavior of the corpse.

Some months later Captain Vere was wounded in action. In the last hours before his death he was heard to murmur Billy Budd's name over and over again. Nor did the common sailors forget the hanged man. For many years the yard-arm from which he had been hanged was kept track of by sailors, who regarded it almost as reverently as Christians might revere the Cross.

THE BIRDS

Critique:

It has been said that The Birds was written to ridicule the Athenian expedition to Sicily, which ended in disaster for the Greeks in 413 B.C. Quite aside from the political theme, however, The Birds is rollicking commentary on the simpler level of the customary weaknesses of Man and his institutions: his eternal dissatisfaction with his lot; his habit of ignoring the divinities which shape his ends; his crowded, evil-breeding cities, and his god-provoking tendency forever to be disturbing the equilibrium of the universe. Pisthetærus, with his irresistible rhetoric, surely is a forebear of the men who sell uplift, salvation, or the world's goods with equal glibness and ease.

The Story:

Euelpides and Pisthetærus, two disgruntled citizens, wanted to escape from the pettiness of life in Athens. They bought a jay and a crow, which Philocrates, the bird-seller, told them could guide them to Epops, a bird not born of birds; from Epops they hoped to learn of a land where they could live a peaceful life.

The jay and the crow guided the pair into the mountains and led them to a shelter hidden among the rocks. They knocked and shouted for admittance. When Trochilus, Epops' servant, came to the door, Euelpides and Pisthetærus were prostrated with fear; they insisted that they were birds, not men, a species the birds intensely disliked. Epops, a hoopoe with a triple crest, emerged from the shelter to inform the Athenians that he had once been a man named Tereus, whom the gods had transformed into a hoopoe. At that particular time, however, Epops did not present a very colorful aspect, since he was molting.

When the Athenians revealed the purpose of their visit, Epops suggested that they move on to the Red Sea, but they said they were not interested in living in a seaport. Epops suggested several other places, but on one ground or another the pair objected to all suggestions which Epops had to offer. The truth was that they wanted to stay among the birds and establish a city. Interested in this novel idea, Epops summoned the birds that they too might hear of the plan.

The birds swarmed to the shelter from all directions until every species of Old World birds was represented at the gathering. The leader of the birds, fearful of all men, was dismayed when he learned that Epops had talked with Euelpides and Pisthetærus, and he incited all the birds to attack and to tear the Athenians to pieces. To defend themselves, Euelpides and Pisthetærus took up stewpots and other kitchen utensils. But Epops rebuked the birds for their precipitous behavior. Finally, heeding his suggestion that perhaps they could profit from the plan of the two men, they settled down to listen. Epops assured the birds that Euelpides and Pisthetærus had only the most honorable of intentions.

Pisthetærus told the birds that they were older than man. In fact, the feathered tribes had once been sovereign over all creation, and even within the memory of man birds were known to have been supreme over the human race. For that reason, he continued, men used birds as symbols of power and authority. For example, the eagle was the symbol of Zeus, the owl Athena's symbol, and the hawk, Apollo's.

Seeing that the birds were vitally interested in his words, Pisthetærus propounded his plan: the birds were to build a wall around their realm, the air, so that communication between the gods and men would be cut off. Both gods and men would then have to recognize the supremacy of the birds. If men proved recalcitrant, the sparrows would devour their grain and crows would peck out the eyes of their livestock. If men acceded, the birds would control insect plagues and would help men to store up earthly treasures.

The birds were delighted with his plan. Epops ushered the Athenians into his shelter, where the pair momentarily forgot their project when they saw Epops' wife, Procne, who had an uncanny resemblance to a desirable young maiden. Meanwhile the leader of the birds spoke of man's great debt to the birds. Urging mankind to look upon the birds as the true gods, he invited all men to join the birds and acquire wings.

Pisthetærus, winged like a bird, organized the building of the wall and arranged all negotiations with gods and men. As he prepared to make propitiatory offerings to the new gods, he was beset by opportunists who had heard of the great project. An indigent poetaster offered to glorify the project in verse. A charlatan offered worthless prophecies. But when Meton, a surveyor, offered to divide the realm of the air into the principal parts of a typical Greek city, Pisthetærus thrashed him. An inspector and a dealer in decrees importuned him and were likewise thrashed and dismissed. Annoyed by these money-seeking hangers-on, Pisthetærus retreated into Epops' shelter to sacrifice a goat. The leader of the birds again sang the praises of his kind and told how the birds were indispensable to the welfare of mankind.

The sacrifice was completed, and shortly thereafter the wall was finished, all the birds, using their various specialized organs, having coöperated in the construction. Then a messenger reported that a winged goddess, sent by Zeus, had got through to the bird kingdom in spite of the wall. Pisthetærus issued a call to arms—the birds would war with the gods. When Iris, the goddess of the rainbow, made her appearance. Pisthetærus was enraged at the ineffectualness of his wall. Oblivious of the importance assumed by the birds under Pisthetærus' influence, Iris declared that she was on her way to men to ask them to make a great sacrifice to the Olympian gods. When Pisthetærus inferred that the birds were now the only gods, Iris pitied him for his presumption and warned him not to arouse the ire of the Olympians.

A messenger who had been sent as an emissary from the birds to men returned and presented Pisthetærus with a gift, a golden chaplet. Men, it seemed, were delighted with the idea of the bird city; thousands were eager to come there to take wings and to live a life of ease. Pleased and flattered, the birds welcomed the men as they arrived.

First came a man with thoughts of parricide, who felt that he would at last be free to murder his father. Pisthetærus pointed out to the would-be parricide that the young bird might peck at his father, but that later it was his duty to administer to his father. He gave the youth wings and sent him off as a bird-soldier in order to make good use of his inclinations. Next a poet arrived and asked for wings so that he might gather inspiration for his verse from the upper air. Pisthetærus gave him wings and directed him to organize a chorus of birds. An informer arrived and asked for wings the better to practice his vicious profession; Pisthetærus whipped him and in despair removed the baskets of wings which had been placed at the gate.

Prometheus, the friend of mankind, made his appearance. Although he still feared the wrath of Zeus, he raised his mask and reported to Pisthetærus, who recognized him, that men no longer worshipped Zeus since the bird city, Nephelococcygia, had been founded. He added that Zeus, deeply concerned, was sending a peace mission to the city and was even prepared to offer to Pisthetærus one of his maidservants, Basileia, for his wife. Prometheus then sneaked away to return to the abode of the gods.

Poseidon, Heracles, and Triballus, the barbarian god, came upon Pisthetærus as he was cooking a meal. Pisthetærus, visibly impressed by their presence, greeted them nonchalantly. They promised him plenty of warm weather and sufficient rain if he would drop his project. Their argument might have been more effective had they not been so noticeably hungry. Pisthetærus declared that he would invite them to dinner if they promised to bring the scepter of Zeus to the birds. Heracles, almost famished, promised, but Poseidon was angered by Pisthetærus' audacity. Pisthetærus argued that it was to the advantage of the gods that the birds be supreme on earth since the birds, who were below the clouds, could keep an eye on mankind, while the gods, who were above the clouds, could not. The birds could, in fact, mete out to men the justice of the gods. The envoys agreed to this argument, but they balked when Pisthetærus insisted also upon having Basileia as his wife.

After a heated discussion Pisthetærus convinced Heracles, a natural son of Zeus, that he would receive nothing on the death of Zeus, and that Poseidon, as brother of Zeus, would get Heracles' share of Zeus' property. Heracles and Triballus prevailed over Poseidon in the hot dispute that followed and Basileia was conceded after much argument. The envoys then sat down to dinner. Pisthetærus, having received the scepter of Zeus, became not only the king of the birds but also the supreme deity.

THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE

Author: Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804-1864)

Type of plot: Psychological romance

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: Massachusetts

First published: 1852

Principal characters:

MILES COVERDALE, a resident of Blithedale Community

ZENOBIA, a worldly woman

PRISCILLA, a simple maiden

HOLLINGSWORTH, loved by Zenobia and Priscilla

WESTERVELT, an evil conjurer

OLD MOODIE, Priscilla's protector

Critique:

Hawthorne himself told us that The Blithedale Romance grew out of his experiences at Brook Farm, that famous but short-lived experiment in communal living indulged in by idealists, reformers, and writers. In the story, however, the setting is incidental to the plot and the characters, all of whom, Hawthorne assured us, are fictitious. There is no attempt to judge the merits or evils of community living, only an effort to show the way in which certain characteristics affect the lives of people thrown together into close associations.

The Story:

As Miles Coverdale prepared to journey to Blithedale, where he was to join in a project in community living, he was accosted by Old Moodie, a seedy ancient who seemed reluctant to state his business. After much mysterious talk about having Coverdale do him a great favor, he changed his mind and shuffled off without telling what it was that he wanted.

It was April, but Coverdale and his companions arrived at Blithedale in a snowstorm. There they were greeted by a woman called Zenobia, a well-known magazine writer. Zenobia was a beautiful, worldly woman of wealth and position. At all times she wore a rare, exotic flower in her hair. Zenobia spent most of her energy fighting for "woman's place in the world."

On the evening of Coverdale's arrival another of the principals arrived at Blithedale. He was Hollingsworth, a philanthropist and reformer. In fact, philanthropy was to him a never-ceasing effort to reform and change mankind. With him he brought Priscilla, a simple, poorly dressed, bewildered young girl. Priscilla went at once to Zenobia and, falling at the proud woman's feet, never took her eyes from that haughty face. There was no explanation for such behavior. Hollingsworth knew only that he had been approached by Old Moodie and asked to take Priscilla to Blithedale. That was the request Old Moodie had tried to ask of Coverdale, but his courage failed him. But such was the community of Blithedale that the inhabitants made the girl welcome in spite of her strange behavior.

It was soon evident to Coverdale that Hollingsworth's philanthropy had turned inward until that man was on the way to madness. He was convinced that the universe existed only in order for him to reform all criminals and wayward persons. The dream of his life was to construct a large edifice in which he could collect his criminal brothers and teach them to mend their ways before doom overtook them. To Coverdale he was a bore, but it was obvious that both Zenobia and Priscilla were in love with him. Priscilla blossomed as she reaped the benefits of good food and fresh air, and Zenobia viewed her as a rival with evident but unspoken alarm. Hollingsworth seemed to consider Priscilla his own special charge, and Coverdale feared the looks of thinly veiled hatred he frequently saw Zenobia cast toward the lovely girl. Priscilla, devoted to Zenobia, wanted always to be close to the beautiful woman.

When Old Moodie appeared at Blithedale to inquire of Priscilla, Coverdale tried to persuade him to reveal the reason for his interest in the girl. But the old man slipped away without telling his story.

Shortly after this incident, Professor Westervelt came to Blithedale to inquire about Zenobia and Priscilla. Coverdale saw Westervelt and Zenobia together and was sure that even though Zenobia hated him now, she once had loved and been ruined by this evil man. Coverdale knew that all of the misery which he sometimes saw in Zenobia's eyes must surely have come from this man. Coverdale felt also that there was still some bond between them.

After Westervelt's visit Zenobia was short-tempered and more vehement than usual about the poor lot of women. But she was so much in love with Hollingsworth that even the misery, or perhaps terror, caused by Westervelt did not deter her from literally worshiping at his feet. Hollingsworth, in his egotism, believed that women were placed on earth only to serve men, and so great was Zenobia's passion that she accepted his words without protest, not proclaiming her real thoughts in his presence. It was clear to Coverdale that Hollingsworth intended to use Zenobia's money to build the school for criminals of which he never ceased to talk. When Coverdale refused to join him in this project, Hollingsworth became quite cool in his dealings with Coverdale.

Tiring of the life at Blithedale, Coverdale took a vacation in town. He was greatly surprised when Zenobia, Priscilla, and Westervelt also arrived in the town shortly afterward. He called on the ladies and was disturbed by the tension that was apparent. When he chided Zenobia about Priscilla and Hollingsworth, she warned him not to interfere lest he cause serious trouble. Priscilla obviously did not know why she was there. She told Coverdale that she was like a leaf blown about by the wind. She had no will of her own, only the will of Zenobia. Then Westervelt called for the two women, and the three left Coverdale standing as if they did not know he was there.

Determined to uncover the mystery surrounding the three, Coverdale sought out Old Moodie and pried from him the story of the two girls. Once Moodie had been a wealthy and influential man until through dishonest business practices he was ruined. Then, leaving his wife and daughter Zenobia, he wandered about in poverty and disgrace. His wife died and he married again. To them Priscilla was born, as different from his first child as it was possible to be. Zenobia was beautiful and proud, Priscilla plain and shy. Neighbors thought Priscilla had supernatural powers, but her kindness and her goodness made everyone love her.

Zenobia, after Moodie's disgrace, was reared by his brother; and since Moodie was believed dead, Zenobia, as the next heir, inherited her uncle's wealth. Because she grew up a wild and willful girl, it was whispered that she had made a secret marriage with an unprincipled man. No one, however, knew anything definite. Such were her beauty and wealth that no one criticized her. Moodie called her to his home and, not telling her who he was, cautioned her to be as kind as a sister to Priscilla.

During his vacation Coverdale chanced upon a magician's show in a nearby village. There he found Hollingsworth in the audience and Westervelt on the stage. Westervelt produced a Veiled Lady, an ethereal creature whom he said he could make do his bidding. At the climax of the act Hollingsworth arose from the audience and strode to the platform. He called to the Veiled Lady to remove her veil, and as he spoke, Priscilla lifted her veil and fled into the arms of Hollingsworth with a cry of joy and of love. She looked like one who had been saved from an evil fate.

Coverdale returned to Blithedale. There he witnessed a terrifying scene between Zenobia, Priscilla, and Hollingsworth. To Zenobia Hollingsworth admitted his love for Priscilla. Zenobia reviled him and warned her sister against the emptiness of his heart. She said she knew at last the complete ego of the man and saw that he had deceived her only to get her fortune for his great project. After the lovers left her, Zenobia sank to the ground and wept, and that night the unhappy woman drowned herself in the river flowing close by. Westervelt came to view her dead body, but his only sorrow seemed to be that he could no longer use Zenobia in his black schemes.

After Zenobia's tragedy, Coverdale left Blithedale. Priscilla and Hollingsworth lived quietly, he giving up his desire to reform other criminals because he felt himself Zenobia's murderer. In his twilight years Coverdale confessed his real interest in these ill-fated people. He had from the first been in love with Priscilla.

BLOOD WEDDING

Author: Federico García Lorca (1899-1936)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Probably early 1900's

Locale: Spain

First presented: 1933

Principal characters:

THE BRIDEGROOM

THE BRIDEGROOM'S MOTHER

THE BRIDE

THE BRIDE'S FATHER
LEONARDO FELÍX, former suitor of the Bride
LEONARDO'S WIFE

Critique:

The works of García Lorca are today unavailable in Spain, for he alienated the Franco regime and his works were proscribed. The author himself was slain brutally by Falangists during the Spanish Civil War. Although Lorca spent some time in America and several of his plays have been produced here, his works are not well known in this country, probably because his plays have puzzled readers and theater audiences alike. His drama, like his paintings and his poetry, shows the influences of avant-garde art. In the early years of the Spanish Republic Lorca was active in a movement to popularize drama among the Spanish masses. In 1931 and 1932, largely because of his efforts and those of Leonardo de los Reos, Minister of Education, a touring company presented plays of the first quality to village and small-town audiences throughout Spain. Although more passionate and symbolic, Lorca has been compared to the Irish dramatist, John Millington Synge. He was the chief lyric dramatist of the contemporary European theater.

The Story:

The Bridegroom's Mother was unhappy when she learned that he wished to be married and that he had found a girl whom he desired. In spite of her sorrow at losing him, she commanded him to go buy fine presents for the Bride. The Bridegroom's Mother was unhappy because the Bridegroom was her only surviving child. Her husband and her older son had both been killed many years before in fights with members of the Félix family. Ever since then, the Bridegroom's Mother had lived in fear that the only surviving man in her family, the Bridegroom, might also fall a victim to someone's knife or gun. She told her son that she would much rather that he had been born a girl, to sit in the house and knit instead of going out among men.

After the Bridegroom had left the house to go buy gifts for the Bride, gifts to be presented when the parents met, a neighbor stopped to see his Mother. The neighbor told the Bridegroom's Mother that there was bad blood in the Bride's veins, inherited from her mother. She also said that Leonardo, a member of the hated Félix family and a cousin of the Bride, had wooed the Bride unsuccessfully before his own marriage three years earlier. The Bridegroom's Mother grew uneasy at the news, but she determined to carry through her part in the marriage forms because her son was in love and because the Bride's Father owned rich vineyards comparable to those of her own family.

Meanwhile word of the proposed marriage had reached Leonardo, who still was in love with the Bride. In fact, he rode many miles to her house to see her whenever he had the chance. For some time both Leonardo's Wife and her mother had realized that something was wrong. Leonardo was curt and sharp with his wife for no reason at all and he failed to take much notice of their child.

The next day the Bride's servant prepared her to meet with her father, the Bridegroom, and the Bridegroom's Mother in order to make plans for the wedding. The servant accused the Bride of permitting Leonardo to visit late at night. The Bride, without denying the fact, merely indicated that she was not very happy at the prospect of marrying the Bridegroom.

After the arrival of the Bridegroom and his Mother, it was decided to have the wedding take place on the following Thursday, the Bride's twenty-second birthday. The Bride said that she would welcome the chance to shut out the world from her life and devote herself to the Bridegroom. A short time after the Bridegroom and his Mother had departed, Leonardo's horse was heard neighing beneath the Bride's window.

The day of the wedding arrived, and early in the morning the servant began to prepare the Bride for the ceremony. But the Bride was not happy. When the servant began to speak of the bliss that would soon be hers, the Bride commanded the woman to be quiet. She even threw her wreath of orange blossoms to the ground.

A short time later the guests began to arrive. The first to make his appearance was the Bride's cousin and former wooer, Leonardo. He and the Bride, despite the servant's pleas, had a talk in which bitter recriminations were flung back and forth. Neither wished to be married to anyone else, but each blamed the other for the unhappiness to which they were apparently doomed. Only the arrival of other guests broke up the argument.

The guests having arrived, the party set out for the church. Only the most vigorous language on the part of his wife convinced Leonardo that he ought to ride in the cart with her, in order to keep up appearances. When the wedding ceremony was over, Leonardo and his wife were the first guests to return to the Bride's Father's house. Leonardo had driven like a madman.

Shortly after the guests had gathered at the house, the Bridegroom went quietly up behind the Bride and put his arms about her. She shrank from his embrace. Complaining that she felt ill, she went to her room to rest after asking the Bridegroom to leave her alone. As the wedding feast continued, some of the guests proposed that the Bridegroom and the Bride dance together. But the Bride was nowhere to be found. Searchers discovered that she and Leonardo had ridden away on his horse. The Bridegroom, furious at being so dishonored and filled with desire for revenge, organized a posse of his own relatives and immediately started out after the fugitives. All day they searched without finding the pair.

On into the night the Bridegroom continued his search and came at last into the wood where the runaways had stopped. The Bride, meanwhile, had had a change of heart; refusing to give herself to Leonardo, she said that it was enough that she had run away with him. Leonardo, becoming angry, reminded her that it was she who had gone down the stairs first, who had put a new bridle on the horse, and who had even buckled on his spurs. Nevertheless, the Bride said she had had enough. She did not want to stay with him, but she had no greater desire to return to her husband.

While they argued, the Bridegroom met Death, disguised as a beggarwoman. Death insisted upon leading him to the place where he would find his escaped bride and her lover. By the light of the moon they searched until they found the pair. When they met, Leonardo and the Bridegroom fought, killing each other.

After they had died, Death, still disguised as a beggarwoman, went back to spread the evil tidings. When she heard of her son's death, the Bridegroom's Mother took the news stoically, not wanting her neighbors to see her overwhelming grief. Returning to her mother-in-law, the Bride was told to remain at the door without entering the room. The Bride tried to explain her actions, saying also that she had come so that the Bridegroom's Mother could kill her. No one paid any attention to the Bride's argument that neither Leonardo nor her husband had ever known her as a woman.

The Bridegroom's Mother was joined in her lamentations by Leonardo's wife

when searchers carried in the bodies of the two men. The grief-stricken women, joined by the Bride, complained bitterly that an instrument as small as a knife could take away the lives of two such men, lives that were so much greater than the instruments which caused their deaths.

A BLOT IN THE 'SCUTCHEON

Author: Robert Browning (1812-1889)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Rural England

First presented: 1843

Principal characters:

THOROLD, EARL TRESHAM, a proud nobleman

MILDRED, his younger sister

HENRY, EARL MERTOUN, her suitor

AUSTIN TRESHAM, brother of Mildred and the earl

GUENDOLEN, the Treshams' cousin and Austin's betrothed

Critique:

This drama was published in one of the eight small volumes of poetry issued by Browning under the title of Bells and Pomegranates between 1841 and 1846. It had been written at the request of Macready, the famous actor and producer in England during the nineteenth century. The play, though written expressly for the stage, has never been popular on the boards. While the drama is obviously Browning's invention, the similarities to Romeo and Juliet immediately call the Shakespearean play to mind. The quarrel between two great houses, the duel, the love affair between a young man and an extremely young girl, and the multiple deaths of the principals at the end all are paralleled in the two plays. Interesting to most readers of the play are the comments by the retainers of both houses about the main characters and the great families they represent.

The Story:

Thorold, Earl Tresham was a middle-aged, active man, the epitome of courtesy and honor, and extremely proud of his family's record through the generations. So proud of that reputation was he that he resolved to keep it untarnished throughout his life, and to see that other members of the family bore themselves as honorably.

The earl's parents had died many years before, leaving a younger sister in his care. Mildred was now fourteen years of age and ready for marriage. She was loved by her brothers and her more distant relatives, who regarded her as an innocent, guileless, and beautiful young woman.

Henry, Earl Mertoun, having seen Mildred, came one day to ask her hand in marriage. Tresham was at first hesitant, but when he had talked with the young man and looked over the Mertoun family record, he realized that no more honorable and personable young suitor could have sought Mildred as a wife. He therefore gave his consent to the marriage if the girl herself agreed. Mertoun left Tresham Castle after promising to return at the end of two days, during which time the Treshams and their cousin were to broach the subject of marriage to Mildred.

In the library, that same night, Tresham, his brother Austin, and their cousin Guendolen acquainted Mildred with Mertoun's suit, but she seemed indifferent to the nobleman's proposal. Later, in Mildred's room, Guendolen continued the discussion, describing the personality and appearance of the young earl. The girl still remained hesitant. When Guendolen left the room she was confident, however, that her cousin would soon look kindly on so desirable a suitor.

Shortly after Guendolen's departure the clocks struck midnight. Mildred placed a candle in her window. A short time later a man dressed in a long, flowing cloak and a slouch hat entered through the window. The hat and cloak were swept away, revealing Henry, Earl Mertoun. Mildred declared that she could not bring herself to agree to a marriage with him under the conditions known to both, for she and Mertoun had been lovers for many weeks. She said she could not appear at a wedding under the guise of a virgin and a stranger to a man whom she had long since taken as her lover.

Seeing no real sin in what they had done, the lovers felt that their youthful years had betrayed them. They had met when Mertoun had wandered into the Tresham domain after wounded game, and they had fallen in love immediately. Within a short time Mildred had admitted Mertoun to her bedchamber.

After a lengthy discussion the young nobleman left Mildred, with her promise that she would talk to him once again on the following night before announcing her decision to her brothers and cousin.

The following morning one of the retainers went to Tresham and told that he had seen a man leaving Mildred's chamber window late at night. Pressed by Tresham, the retainer admitted that the man had been there on previous nights and that the nocturnal visitor obviously had Mildred's aid in visiting her. Tresham was dumfounded and then angry, for he saw the whole reputation of the family about to receive its first blot in generations. He also thought he saw why Mildred had appeared hesitant in giving her consent to marry Mertoun.

After talking over the matter with Guendolen, Tresham sent for Mildred. Accused by her brother, Mildred admitted by her silence that she was guilty of transgression, but she steadfastly refused to acknowledge the identity of her lover. Tresham was furious that she could have even permitted her relatives to consider a match between herself and Mertoun after she had fallen into sin. Mildred's only defense to her brother was that she had not had a mother's guiding hand, that she was too young to know what she had done, and that God must have deserted her at a crucial time.

Mildred's brother, refusing to recognize the defense she offered, disowned her in the presence of Austin and Guendolen. But they, feeling only sorrow and sympathy for Mildred, remained loyal to her. Guendolen took Mildred to her chamber and tried to comfort the girl as best she could. While the two women talked, it became evident to Guendolen that Mertoun was not only Mildred's suitor but her lover as well. Guendolen realized that Mertoun's suit was the way taken by the lovers to hide their transgression. As soon as she realized the situation, Guendolen went at once to tell Austin and the earl. Tresham, however, was nowhere to be found; he had gone to the farther reaches of his estates.

Tresham had wanted to be alone while he tried to find some solution to his problems. At last he decided to lie in ambush for the lover, in case the man tried to visit Mildred that night. He was unaware that Mertoun was Mildred's lover, and Austin and Guendolen were unable to find him in time to tell him what they had learned.

That night Earl Tresham concealed himself behind a tree to watch. Shortly after midnight a figure wearing a cloak and slouch hat raced across the lawns and clambered into a yew tree which grew just outside Mildred's window. As the figure started into the tree Tresham seized him and pulled him back to the ground. Mertoun then threw off his disguise and revealed himself. Too angry to realize the implications of Mertoun's identity, Tresham engaged him in a duel. Mertoun did not even try to defend himself and was quickly run through by Tresham. Seeing his opponent downed and mortally wounded, Tresham lost his anger and became filled with remorse. His regrets knew no bounds when Mertoun revealed how he and Mildred had been led innocently into sin. Tresham realized that haste and anger had undone both of them, as well as Mildred.

The noise of the duel had attracted Guendolen and Austin, who tried unsuccessfully to save Mertoun's life. After Mertoun died, Tresham went to tell Mildred what had happened. Her dismay at hearing of her lover's death at the hands of her brother was too much for the girl; she died within a matter of minutes. As she died Guendolen and Austin appeared to see if they could be of assistance, and they saw that Tresham, too, was as white as death. He told them that they came too late, for he had taken poison. His last words before he died were that he left his name, title, and estates to them unblemished; he felt that three tragic deaths had obliterated the sinful blot on his family escutcheon.

THE BOHEMIANS OF THE LATIN QUARTER

Author: Henri Murger (1822-1861)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1848

Principal characters:

RODOLPHE, a poet

MARCEL, a painter

SCHAUNARD, a musician and painter

COLLINE, a philosopher

MIMI, loved by Rodolphe

MUSETTE, loved by Marcel

Critique:

Henri Murger wrote of his own life and that of his friends when he composed the episodes which make up Scènes de la vie de Bohème, the romantic work usually translated as The Bohemians of the Latin Quarter. Places and people of his novel have been identified easily, and the situations are almost wholly derived from actual experiences. Written originally for a periodical called The Corsair, the book was later rewritten as a play, a work in which Murger had the assistance of M. Barrière. The play, tremendously popular, was the foundation of Murger's literary success. At a still later date Puccini turned the play into the ever-appealing opera, La Bohème. Together, the novel and the play have created the romantic tradition of the Parisian Latin Quarter, still the artistic and spiritual home of young poets, painters, and musicians from many lands.

The Story:

Alexander Schaunard, a poor musician and painter, was unable to pay the rent for his cold and windy top-floor room in the Latin Quarter of Paris. Eluding the porter who was on watch to keep Schaunard from moving his few pieces of furniture, the musician tried in vain to borrow money from his impecunious friends. Shortly after he left the tenement, Marcel, a painter, came to take over the room Schaunard had vacated. The painter had no furniture except his canvas flats, and he was pleased to find that his quarters would contain Schaunard's table, chairs, bed, and piano.

Although Schaunard approached all of his friends in alphabetical order, he was unable to borrow more than three of the seventy-five francs he needed to satisfy his landlord. At dinnertime his stomach led him to Mother Cadet's, famous for her rabbit stew. There he arrived too late; his table companion had ordered the last stew of the evening. This companion, barricaded behind a pile of books, kindly offered to share the stew with Schaunard. Not to be outdone, Schaunard ordered extra wine. Colline, as his companion introduced himself, ordered still another bottle. Schaunard called for a salad; Colline, for dessert. By the time they left Mother Cadet's they were well pleased with the world. Stopping by a café for coffee and liqueurs, they fell into conversation with Rodolphe, who could have been nothing but a poet if one judged by his clothes.

Rodolphe soon became as expansive as they. Forgetting that he no longer had a room, Schaunard offered to take Colline and Rodolphe home with him, for the hour was late and they lived at the far ends of Paris. As they reeled into the house, the porter also forgot that Schaunard had been dispossessed. The musician was a bit taken aback when he found another key in his door, but the three made so much noise that Marcel opened for them and gladly accepted the supper they had brought with them. Schaunard and Marcel decided to stay together, since the musician owned the furniture and the painter had paid the rent. The other two were surprised to find themselves in a strange room the next morning. After another day and night of convivial treating, when all but Schaunard still had a few francs in their pockets, the four decided to meet daily.

One day Marcel received an invitation to dine with a patron of the arts. Being famished, he yearned to go but realized that he had no dress coat. Just then a stranger appeared at the door asking for Schaunard, whom he wanted to paint his portrait. Marcel pointed to the caller's coat, and Schaunard, preparing to begin the painting, asked the man to doff his coat and put on a borrowed dressing gown because the picture, intended for the man's family, ought to be as informal as possible. Marcel appropriated the coat and went to the dinner. Schaunard persuaded his sitter to send out for a fine dinner and kept the man entertained until Marcel returned.

One evening in Lent Rodolphe was disturbed to find that everywhere he looked people and birds were pairing off. Schaunard told him that he was in love with love and offered to find him a girl. Schaunard did produce a fresh-colored, pleasing girl, but she refused to stay with Rodolphe more than a few days. She did not understand his poetizing.

Lacking money for his rent, Rodolphe turned to his stove-maker uncle, who wanted him to write a manual on stove-making. Having learned that an advance to Rodolphe meant that he would disappear until the money had been spent, the uncle kept the young man locked up. The manual proved to be slow and boring work. Rodolphe struck up an acquaintance with an actress on the floor below and she promised to get his play produced. When a letter arrived with word that Rodolphe had won three hundred francs, the uncle refused to let him go. Rodolphe made a knotted rope out of his quilt and slid down to the actress' apartment. She provided a disguise for him, enabling him to leave the house. Later she did have his play put on, but it brought the young writer neither fame nor fortune. Before long, as he said, his address was Avenue St. Cloud, third tree as you go out of the Bois de Boulogne, fifth branch.

Mlle. Musette was a friend of Rodolphe's, but never more than a friend, though neither knew why. When he asked leave to introduce Marcel, Musette invited them both to a party. She had just been jilted by her lover, the Councilor of State. On the day of her party her creditors took her furniture from her rooms and put it in the courtyard to be sold the following morning. Nothing abashed, Musette had her party in the courtyard and invited all the tenants. They were still laughing and singing when the porters came to take the furniture away. It was such a successful party that Rodolphe and Marcel carried Musette off to the country for the day.

On their return to Paris Rodolphe allowed Marcel to take Musette home. Soon after he had left her at her doorway he felt a tap on his shoulder. There stood Musette, who told him that she no longer had a key to her room and that it was after eleven o'clock at night. Calling her the goddess of mirth, Marcel took her home with him. The next morning he bought her a pot of flowers. She said that she would stay with him until the flowers faded. He was surprised at their continued freshness until the day he found Musette watering them carefully.

M. Benoit was dunning Rodolphe for three quarters of rent, three pairs of shoes, and extra money lent, for he was landlord, shoemaker, and money-lender all in one. Rodolphe walked the streets all day in the hope that providence would provide. When he returned, M. Benoit had already rented his room, but the landlord allowed Rodolphe to go upstairs to claim his papers. A girl named Mimi was the new tenant. After one look at Rodolphe she told M. Benoit that she had been expecting the gentleman.

On Christmas Eve the four friends with Mimi and Musette and Schaunard's Phémie repaired to the Café Momus. Momus and his wife had a weakness for the arts; depending on that weakness, the bohemians ordered a fine supper. In their high holiday spirits they ran up a huge bill before they drew lots to see who would speak diplomatically to the proprietor. Schaunard was having no success on that errand when a stranger, Barbemuche, asked to be introduced and offered to pay the bill. Schaunard suggested a game of billiards to settle the matter. Barbemuche had the good taste to lose the match and the bohemians' dignity was saved.

Neither Mimi nor Musette could resist going off with other lovers. One time Mimi and Rodolphe agreed quietly to separate, but it was not long before Mimi came to call, ostensibly to take away her belongings. Instead, she stayed on with Rodolphe.

Musette was said to alternate between blue broughams and omnibuses. While she was living with M. Maurice, she received a letter from Marcel asking her to come for dinner, for the friends even had wood for a fire. She received the note in a roundabout way but left the bewildered M. Maurice immediately. Because snow was beginning to fall, she stopped at a friend's house and there met an interesting young man. Five days later she arrived at Marcel's room. The fire was dying out and the food was gone. She stayed one day before returning to M. Maurice with the announcement that she had quarreled with Marcel. She told M. Maurice that each of her loves was the verse of a song, but Marcel was the refrain.

The second time Mimi and Rodolphe separated, she went to live with Paul, a young viscount. Meeting by chance on the street, Mimi and Rodolphe bowed. The poet went home and wrote for Mimi a long poem which so irritated the young nobleman that he put Mimi out of his house.

On another Christmas Eve, as Marcel and Rodolphe were trying to forget their sorrows, Mimi came back, so ill that a doctor insisted that she be taken at once to a hospital. She was afraid to go, even though her friends tried to encourage her with the hope that she would be well by spring. Rodolphe went to see her on the first visiting day. Before the next day for calling he heard that she was dead. A few days later his correspondent admitted that he had been mistaken, that Mimi had been moved to a different ward. Rodolphe hurried to the hospital, only to have his hopes shattered forever. Mimi, grieved because Rodolphe had failed to appear for the expected visit, had died that morning.

A year later Rodolphe had written a book which was receiving much critical attention. Schaunard had produced an album of songs. Colline had married well, and Marcel's pictures had been accepted for the annual exhibit. Musette came to spend a final night with Marcel before marrying her last lover's guardian.

THE BONDS OF INTEREST

Author: Jacinto Benavente y Martínez (1866-1954)

Type of plot: Comic romance

Time of plot: Early seventeenth century

Locale: Italy

First presented: 1907

Principal characters:

LEANDER, a rogue with gentlemanly attainments

CRISPIN, his accomplice

SILVIA POLICHINELLE, an heiress

SIGNOR POLICHINELLE, Silvia's miserly father

DOÑA SIRENA, a well-placed, but penniless aristocrat

COLUMBINE, Doña Sirena's confidante and servant

HARLEQUIN, poet and lover of Columbine

Critique:

This play was a product of the Nobel Prize winner in 1922 and one of the most important authors in the Spanish literary world of the twentieth century. In this particular work we find Benavente playing the part of satirist, demonstrating the duality of man's nature. He has attempted to reveal the mixture of good and evil in every man by showing that the human personality is a complex one, that generosity and friendliness mingle freely, but irreconcilably, with the sordid and base. In addition, Benavente shows by means of the characters and the action in The Bonds of Interest that every person must be made aware of the practical implications of one's conduct and the effect that these implications have on every person's ethical outlook. One point that this play, and Benavente's work in general, makes clear: he was primarily interested in man as an individual. Benavente, a Loyalist sympathizer, disappeared during the Spanish Civil War; his fate has not definitely been determined.

The Story:

Crispin and Leander, two rascals with gentlemanly airs, arrived penniless in a strange city. Crispin, the more realistic of the two, pointed out that there were actually two cities, one of the rich and one of the poor. He hoped that they would chance upon the better one. Being penniless, the two rogues plotted to make their way by putting on the best possible front. Leander suggested that they make use of some letters of introduction which he had received to present to persons of mark in the city, but Crispin scoffed at the idea.

Instead, he proposed that Leander impersonate a great nobleman who came to the city on official but mysterious business. He further proposed that he, Crispin, would act as a servant and carry off the whole plan, if Leander would remain quiet and speak only when necessary. Leander having agreed, Crispin proceeded to pound on the door of an inn. By treating the innkeeper with blows and scurrilous language, they convinced him that Leander was indeed a great man and one whom the innkeeper should welcome to his establishment. So deceived was he that he had his best rooms made ready for the two guests.

Shortly after Leander and Crispin had been treated so royally by the innkeeper and his household, two other down-at-heels rogues—a poet named Harlequin, and a captain—approached the inn. Knowing that they were penniless, the innkeeper refused to serve them. Crispin, hearing of their plight, forced the innkeeper to give them a fine dinner by putting them under the protection of his so-called master. The poet and the captain, pleased to be so treated, vowed friendship for the great man who had caused them to be treated like gentlemen. When asked by Leander why he helped the two, Crispin answered that by so doing they had enlisted the aid of both poetry and arms, and that with such support they could win the entire world.

In another quarter of the city a well-placed but penniless and middle-aged widow was also concerned with affairs of money. The woman, Doña Sirena, had been informed by Columbine, her maid, that the servants, musicians, and tradespeople had all refused to serve her until she paid her overdue bills. Doña Sirena had planned a garden fête for the same day, at which were to appear Signor and Signora Polichinelle, along with Silvia, their only daughter. Since Signor Polichinelle was extremely rich, Doña Sirena was trying to wed their daughter to one of her own friends, all of whom had signed statements agreeing to pay a large sum of money to Doña Sirena for arranging the match.

Columbine, in love with Harlequin, promised to get help from him for her mistress, for he had many friends who would be willing to help put on the garden fête. But when Columbine went to find Harlequin, she found Crispin instead. Crispin introduced himself as her lover's friend and told her that if his master were invited to the fête he would see that the affair went off well. Crispin pointed out that his master wished to marry Silvia Polichinelle and would amply reward Doña Sirena for her aid as matchmaker.

The fête began in grand style that afternoon. When he arrived, Crispin gave Doña Sirena a promissory note in which his master agreed to pay a large sum at the time of the marriage and another large sum upon the death of Signor Polichinelle. Doña Sirena did not know who Leander was, but she found the prospect of money too pleasant to be ignored, and so she agreed.

The fête was a success in every way. Everyone was anxious to learn the identity of the great but mysterious nobleman who paid marked attentions to Silvia Polichinelle, and all except Signor Polichinelle seemed happy at the prospect of a match between the two. Silvia herself had quickly fallen in love with the handsome young man and her mother, despising her own husband as a vulgar tradesman, seconded the daughter in preferring the young nobleman for a prospective husband. Leander was in love with Silvia the moment he saw her. Crispin, seeing that the only possible trouble lay with Signor Polichinelle, plotted to keep him in the background.

Before long Leander and Crispin found their own affairs in a sorry state. Having paid for nothing since their arrival in the city, they were faced by many creditors demanding payment. In addition, Leander had become over-scrupulous in the plan to have him marry Silvia Polichinelle. Having fallen in love with the girl, he did not want to marry her under false pretenses. The only successful aspect of the adventure seemed to be Crispin's; he was plotting to undermine the name of Silvia's father so that he could not very well oppose the marriage. Crispin's last stratagem had been to have Leander attacked by a group of rascals and then to spread the word that the bravos had been hired by Signor Polichinelle to assassinate Leander.

One morning Doña Sirena arrived to press for an immediate marriage between Silvia and Leander, for she wanted money without delay. Silvia, she declared, was at her house and quite ready for the ceremony. She also reported that the authorities, including a lawyer from Bologna, were hot on the trail of Leander and Crispin, and she pointed out that the marriage must take place quickly, if it was to take place at all. At that moment Silvia arrived and proposed an immediate ceremony. Leander began to tell her of the plot by which he had hoped to make her his wife. He was interrupted when the authorities and the rogues' angry creditors arrived at the door. Crispin, after hiding Silvia and helping Leander to escape through a window, prepared to meet the men clamoring at the door.

The creditors stormed in, announcing their intention to send Leander and Crispin to prison and to seize whatever property the two possessed, but after some argument Crispin was able to convince them that such a procedure, while it would hurt him and Leander, would not pay their debts. He then proceeded to point out that it was to everyone's benefit to hush up the matter of credit and promote the marriage between Silvia and Leander. Then Leander would be in control of a fortune and would be able to pay his bills.

The practical aspects of Crispin's proposals appealed to everyone but Signor Polichinelle. The creditors immediately pounced on him, however, and badgered him into consenting to the wedding. He also was forced into agreeing to give his daughter a large sum of money as a dowry, to be paid over to Leander. Everyone was then completely happy. Leander confessed his true identity to Silvia, who said it mattered not to her. Even Silvia's mother was so pleased with his manners and appearance that she made no protest. Silvia replied to her lover that everyone was moved by the bonds of interest between himself and other people. She added that the strongest bond was love, the bond that had drawn her and Leander together.

GRIGORY OTREPYEV, the pretender

MARYNA, beloved of Grigory

Critique:

Pushkin, a great admirer of Shakespeare, wanted to bring some of the boldness of Renaissance drama to the Russian stage. He was not successful. Boris Godunov, excellent as a poem, is static as a play. It was written in 1825, published in 1831, and failed as a stage piece when it was first presented nearly forty years later. Pushkin had little political interest in this poem; he wrote it as a study of personal ambition. To most readers the poem is remembered chiefly because it furnished the libretto for Mousorgsky's opera.

nation of Tsarevitch Dimitry so that the actual assassins had been caught and promptly executed by a mob, but popular suspicion did not fall on Boris. He even sent Shuisky, a nobleman, to investigate the crime. Shuisky returned and told with a straight face the version of the murder that Boris had suggested to him.

When the people began to clamor for Boris to become tsar, Boris and his sister took refuge in a monastery, ostensibly to escape the pressure of the populace who had acclaimed him their ruler. With a great show of humility and hesitation he finally accepted the great honor. In spite of his initial popular appeal, Boris proved to be a cruel ruler, binding the serfs more firmly than ever to their masters and crushing ruthlessly nobles who might have opposed him. There were a few, however, who could never forget that Boris had murdered Dimitry.

Father Pimen was an old monk, a writer of chronicles. At night he wrote his observations of Russia's troubled times while a young monk named Grigory Otrepyev slept nearby. Grigory was troubled by grandiose dreams. It seemed to him that he was mounting a great stairs from the top of which all Moscow was spread out before him. When he awoke, Father Pimen counseled him to forget the call of the world, for lust and power were illusory. Grigory would scarcely listen, for he knew that in his youth Pimen had been a soldier and had had his fill of secular life.

When a wicked monk tempted Grigory by reminding him that he was the same age as the murdered Dimitry would have been, Grigory accepted the intimation quickly. Then and there he resolved that he would indeed be Dimitry.

To get support for his enterprise Grigory went to Lithuania. To pass unnoticed through the country, he attached himself to two beggar monks. Somehow word had got to Boris of the impostor's intentions. His description was broadcast, and the tsar's agents had instructions to arrest him on sight. In a remote tavern some officers came upon Grigory and his two companions. To escape capture, Grigory drew a dagger and fled.

Both the Lithuanians and the Poles were delighted to help Grigory march on Moscow. The Poles, especially, were eager to attack the hated Muscovites. As rumors of the impending rebellion spread, many Russians came into Poland to join the swelling ranks of Grigory's supporters. Before long Grigory found another powerful ally in a Jesuit priest who promised to throw the influence of Rome behind the pretender. All in all, Grigory at the head of a rebellious army in Poland was a real menace to Boris' throne and life.

Still Grigory, comfortably installed at an estate near the Russian border, lingered in Poland. He could not bring himself to give orders to advance. The reason was that Maryna, the daughter of the house, had captured his heart. She had been cold in her manner for a time, but finally at a tryst she asked him outright whether he was really Dimitry or an unfrocked monk, as some people were saying. Grigory, unnerved by love, confessed that he was a baseborn monk. Then Maryna haughtily refused to ally her noble blood with his. Stung by her actions, Grigory proudly declared that he would be tsar, and if Maryna denounced him, he would use his power to punish her. Satisfied that he had an indomitable spirit, Maryna overlooked his birth and agreed to be his tsarina.

The next morning Grigory began his conquering march, and for a while all went well. Towns and villages joined his campaign willingly, for the name of Dimitry was a powerful one.

In Moscow, Boris was greatly perturbed and asked the Patriarch to give his best counsel. He was told that Dimitry's grave had become noted for its cures; the Patriarch himself knew of an old man who had been blind for many years before a visit to the tomb had restored his sight. Therefore, if Dimitry's remains were brought into the Kremlin, and a miracle were to happen before all the people, Moscow would have proof that Dimitry was dead and that the pretender was a fraud. Boris paled at the suggestion. Tactfully Shuisky proposed another course. Rather than appear to use religious means in a political quarrel, he would go before the people and denounce Grigory. Surely when the people knew the truth they would desert the baseborn monk who called himself Dimitry.

For a time events seemed to favor Boris. Grigory was beaten back in several attacks on strongholds held by Boris' troops. But Grigory did not seem to mind defeat. He remained cheerful and confident, so that Boris grew less easy in his mind at the outcome of the fighting. Even after his forces had defeated Grigory, the attackers reassembled and continued to fight.

At last Boris entrusted the command of his whole defense to Basmanov, an able leader though not of noble birth. Basmanov was gratified at the honor, for he had as little patience with the intrigues of the court as he did with the fickle loyalties of the mob. His conference with Boris was interrupted by the arrival of a delegation of foreign merchants. Boris had hardly left the room before an alarm was sounded; the tsar had suddenly been taken ill. Blood gushed from his mouth and ears.

Before his death Boris had time formally to name his son Feodor the next tsar. His life ebbing, he advised Feodor to name Basmanov the military leader, to retain all the stately court procedures which gave dignity to the government, and to preserve strictly the discipline of the church. After the last rites were administered, Boris died.

At army headquarters, Pushkin, a supporter of Grigory, had an interview with Basmanov. Pushkin admitted that Grigory's army was only a rabble, that Cossacks and Poles alike were not to be trusted. But if Basmanov would declare for Grigory, the new tsar would make him commander of all the Russian armies. At first Basmanov hesitated, until Pushkin reminded him that even if Grigory were an impostor the magic name of Dimitry was enough to insure that Feodor had no chance of retaining his tsardom. Basmanov, convinced, publicly led his troops over to Grigory's side.

Basmanov's defection spread. The people of Moscow willingly listened to Pushkin when he made an inflammatory speech in the great square. As he reminded them of all they had suffered under Boris and of the justice of Dimitry's accession, the crowd shouted their allegiance to the false Dimitry. Impassioned, the mob surged into Boris' palace to seek out Feodor.

In the meantime Feodor looked hopelessly out of the window. Some in the crowd felt pity, but their voices were overruled. The boyars forced their way inside, presumably to make Feodor swear allegiance to Dimitry. Out of the uproar came screams. At last the door opened. One of the boyars made an announcement: Feodor and his mother had taken poison. He had seen the dead bodies. The boyar urged the people to acclaim Dimitry, but the people stood silent, speechless.

THE BOURGEOIS GENTLEMAN

Author: Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin, 1622-1673)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: Paris, France

First presented: 1670

Principal characters:

MONSIEUR JOURDAIN, a tradesman
MADAME JOURDAIN, his wife
LUCILE, their daughter
NICOLE, a servant
CLÉONTE, in love with Lucile
COVIELLE, his valet
DORANTE, a count
DORIMÈNE, a marchioness

Critique:

Molière, the master satirist, is a trifle more gentle in The Bourgeois Gentleman (Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme) than in many of his plays, but here too he thrusts sharply at the sham and hypocrisy so often seen in seventeenth-century Paris. Humor and keen wit are abundant, but they are used to ridicule as well as to amuse. The play, one of the best of Molière's court dramas, was first performed in 1670, just three years before the playwright's death. It was instantly popular and has remained one of his most successful plays.

The Story:

Monsieur Jourdain was a tradesman who aspired to be a gentleman. Thinking, like many of his kind, that superficial manners, accomplishments, and speech were the marks of a gentleman, he engaged a dancing master, a music master, a fencing master, a philosophy teacher, and other assorted tutors who were as vain and ignorant as he. They constantly quarreled among themselves as to which art was the most important, and each tried to persuade Jourdain to favor him above the others.

From the dancing master he learned to approach a lady: to bow, to step backward, and to walk toward her bowing three times and ending at her knees. From the philosopher he learned that all speech is either poetry or prose. Jourdain was delighted to learn that he had been speaking prose all his life. He also learned that he spoke with vowels and consonants. This great knowledge set him apart from ordinary citizens and certainly made him a gentleman.

The primary reason for his great desire to be a gentleman was his regard for one Dorimène, a marchioness. He had himself fitted out in costumes so ridiculous that they appeared to be masquerades, six tailors being required to dress him in his fantastic costumes. Madame Jourdain had retained her common sense in spite of her husband's wealth, and she constantly chided him about his foolishness. But he considered her a bumpkin and reviled her for her ignorance.

In addition to criticizing his dress and speech, his wife rebuked him for being taken in by Count Dorante, a nobleman who flattered Jourdain's affected gentlemanly customs and at the same time borrowed large sums of money from him. Jourdain begged Dorante to accept the money because he thought it the mark of a gentleman to lend money to a nobleman. Jourdain, engaging Dorante to plead his case with Dorimène, provided money for serenades and ballets and a large diamond ring. Dorante had promised to bring Dorimène to Jourdain's house for dinner, Jourdain having made arrangements to send his wife and daughter away at the time. Madame Jourdain, suspecting that her husband was up to some knavery, sent the maid, Nicole, to listen to the conversation between the two men. Nicole could not hear all of it before being discovered by Jourdain, but she heard enough to convince Madame Jourdain that her husband needed watching.

Jourdain's daughter Lucile loved and was loved by Cléonte. Nicole loved his servant, Covielle. When the girls passed the men on the street without nodding, the men swore to forget the faithless ladies and turn to new fields. But after learning that Lucile's aunt had been the cause of their coldness—that old lady thinking it unseemly to speak to men—the four lovers were reconciled. Lucile and Cléonte wanted only Jourdain's permission to marry. Madame Jourdain approved of Cléonte and promised to intercede with her husband. But Jourdain would not have Cléonte for a son-in-law; the boy was not a gentleman. Cléonte was honorable, with both wealth and a noble career, but he shunned hypocrisy and false living, conduct becoming a gentleman. The lovers pleaded in vain. At last Covielle suggested a deception to play on the foolish old man, and Cléonte agreed to the plan.

In the meantime Dorante, true to his nature but false to Jourdain, used the tradesman's money to act as suitor to Dorimène. All of the gifts and entertainment provided by Jourdain's money were presented to Dorimène as coming from Dorante. Even the diamond ring became a gift from him. Dorante secretly thought Jourdain a fool and enjoyed making him a real one.

At the dinner in Jourdain's home Dorimène was somewhat confused by Jourdain's ardent speeches to her, for she thought herself known as Dorante's mistress. She was even more disturbed when Madame Jourdain burst in upon the dinner and accused her husband of infidelity. Convinced that she was being insulted by a madwoman, Dorimène left in tears.

Covielle, disguised, called on Jourdain and informed him that he had been a friend of Jourdain's father and that his father was indeed a gentleman. He had not been a tradesman, but had only bought fabrics and then given them to his friends for money. Jourdain, delighted with the news, felt justified in his belief that he was a gentleman. Then Covielle told Jourdain that the son of the Grand Turk desired to marry Lucile. Jourdain was flattered and promised to give the girl to the Grand Turk's son even though she had vowed she would marry no one but Cléonte. Jourdain, duped into accepting initiation into the Grand Turk's religion, a ceremony performed with much silly gibberish, believed he was being honored above all men.

When Cléonte appeared, disguised as the son of the Grand Turk, Lucile recognized him and agreed to be his wife. Madame Jourdain chided her for infidelity to Cléonte until Covielle whispered to her that the Grand Turk's son and Cléonte were one and the same; then she gave her consent to the marriage. Jourdain sent for a notary. After convincing Jourdain that their plan was only in jest, Dorante and Dorimène said that they would be married at the same time. In great joy at his exalted position Jourdain blessed them all and in addition gave Nicole to Covielle, whom he thought to be the Grand Turk's son's interpreter.

Thinking himself loved by Dorimène, Jourdain offered his wife to whoever wanted her. She, knowing the whole plot, thanked him and proclaimed him the greatest fool of all.

Critique:

Forrest Reid was a novelist little known in the United States. Like Walter de la Mare, his friend, he found the supernatural inseparable from his conception of reality. Denis Bracknel, in this novel, reflects somewhat the author's personal experience, for in his imagination, at least, Reid himself lived in a pagan dream world not unlike that of his hero; and his interest in such imaginary existence, another reality quite different from the ordinary world, is apparent in most of his fiction. As a beginning novelist, he was influenced by Henry James, but their correspondence ended when James failed to comprehend fully Reid's first novel. As a novelist and as a person, Reid was poetical and mystical, qualities which are easily discernible in The Bracknels, especially in the character of young Denis, who finds the evil of the everyday world unbearable. In this book, as in most of Reid's fiction, there is reflected as well the author's strong interest in the psychology of the abnormal person.

The Story:

Mr. Bracknel, an Irish businessman, was disgusted with his family, for he felt that they all tried to go counter to his wishes merely for the sake of displeasing him. The members of his family felt, however, that he was unduly tyrannical. Alfred Bracknel, the oldest child, had a place in his father's business, but he paid little attention to his work. Instead, he preferred to spend his time and thought on gambling, drinking, and women, much to his father's disgust. Seventeen-year-old Denis, the youngest child, displeased his father with his interest in everything mystical. Mr. Bracknel prided himself upon being a very practical person.

May, the oldest daughter, gave her father the least trouble, but Amy, a very sensual girl, constantly fell in love with undesirable young men whom her father had to discourage. Mrs. Bracknel annoyed her husband because she was sickly. Although only forty-six, she seemed much older, while her husband was still a lusty man.

The entire family thought that Denis was a little mad because of his interest in the occult. He had been sent away to school in England. After his career there had ended in failure, a series of tutors had not been able to cope with him. At last a physician who specialized in mental cases recommended to Mr. Bracknel that he hire Hubert Rusk, a young Englishman, as a tutor for the boy. The doctor knew Rusk and felt that he could depend on the young man to be careful of the boy's mental condition.

The girls in the family, particularly Amy, looked forward to the arrival of the young tutor, for their father tried to keep them from social contacts with young men. Even before his arrival, Amy expressed a real interest in Hubert Rusk.

Being a deferential and easygoing man, Rusk made himself quickly at home with the Bracknels, all of whom seemed anxious to have him as a confidant. On his arrival he found that his charge had a wide knowledge of occult subjects but knew next to nothing in other fields. He also found that Denis was an extremely odd young man who had been driven inward by the failure of the family to understand him.

On his first night at the Bracknel home Rusk observed that Denis went out for a walk late at night. Later he discovered that Denis, obsessed with moon worship, had discovered an ancient pagan altar in a wood near the house. At the ancient altar Denis performed ceremonies in honor of the moon, including the sacrifice on occasion of small animals.

Before long the two daughters of the house became rivals for Rusk's attentions. Amy, the more sensual of the two, cowed her sister into letting her have what attentions the oblivious tutor gave. He, on his part, was unaware of the attraction he had for the girls, except that he did not like to have Amy constantly interrupting the lessons he was giving her younger brother.

During Rusk's stay with the Bracknels, Alfred gave his father a great deal of trouble. Once Mr. Bracknel shipped Alfred off to an office of the business in Switzerland, but he had to bring him back because of the young man's incompetence. Later he discovered that Alfred was stealing from the firm to pay his gambling debts. Finally Alfred married a typist from the office, at which point Mr. Bracknel turned him out, but not without a scene in which Alfred accused his father of being partial to his illegitimate son, who was also in the business. Alfred even thought of telling publicly the fact that his father had an illegitimate son, for no one except the mother of the young man, Alfred, and his father knew the fact.

In the meantime Rusk was investigating Denis' behavior. One night he found the lad actually worshipping the moon, but the boy did not tell his tutor that he had visions, both at night and in the daytime, of the goddess of the moon, who appeared to him and even kissed him. As it was, healthy-minded Rusk tried to convince the lad that such behavior was peculiar and not good for his own mental health. Despite his friendship with the doctor who had requested him as a tutor, Rusk did not tell the medical man of Denis' visions. Learning that the boy believed the house to be haunted and lived in fear, he did decide to enlist the doctor's aid in getting Mr. Bracknel's permission to take Denis abroad for a year or two, as an aid to improving the young man's state of mind. The boy was so frightened by his illusions that he moved his bed from his own room to that occupied by his tutor.

Amy Bracknel, still infatuated with the young tutor, seized every opportunity to throw herself at him; she even had an old woman make up a love potion for her to administer to him. Almost pathologically obsessed, she found him alone in the library one evening and enticed him into kissing her. She then told her sister and her mother that Rusk and she were engaged to be married. Rusk, not knowing what she had said, but thinking that her sister and Denis had been aware of the embrace, prepared to leave. He assumed that Mr. Bracknel would discharge him for making love to Amy.

As it was, Mr. Bracknel heard from Amy herself that she was in love with Rusk and wished to marry him. She also related to her father that she had gone to Rusk's room the night he had kissed her, but that she had been deterred in carrying out her plans by the presence of Denis in the tutor's room. Mr. Bracknel sent Amy at once to an aunt's house and made arrangements to have Denis and the tutor leave within two days for a trip to the continent.

Before the two could leave, however, Mr. Bracknel died of a heart attack, brought on by a heated interview with Alfred in the father's office. Alfred was glad rather than sorry to come into his own as the heir to the business. Mr. Bracknel's death was a great shock to Denis, who believed that he had seen a vision of his father's death. In spite of the young man's strange behavior, Rusk left him alone at tea time one day. When the lad failed to appear after nightfall, Rusk and the doctor went to look for him. They found him hanging from a tree limb beside the old pagan altar he had discovered.

His pupil being dead, and preparations for his departure already made, Rusk left the house after Mr. Bracknel's funeral. Two years later he had an opportunity to emigrate to Australia. Before leaving, he decided to make a short trip to Ireland to see the Bracknels. He found them engaged in a great deal of social activity. Amy Bracknel was infatuated with a new beau. Alfred had turned the business over to a capable manager. No one paid any attention to Rusk. He realized that he no longer mattered to anyone in that strange family.

BROAD AND ALIEN IS THE WORLD

Author: Ciro Alegría (1909- )

Type of plot: Social chronicle

Time of plot: 1912-1926

Locale: Peru

First published: 1941

ROSENDO MAQUIS, mayor of a community of Indians

DON AMENABAR, tyrannical owner of a neighboring ranch

BISMARCK RUIZ, a rascally lawyer

CORREA ZAVALA, a lawyer friendly to the Indians

FIERO VASQUEZ, a highwayman friendly to the Indians

BENITO CASTRO, an Indian who had lived away from the village

Critique:

This novel won for its author a two thousand dollar award offered in 1941 by the Division of Intellectual Co-operation of the Pan-American Union. Although the book and author are Peruvian, the novel was submitted by the Chilean committee. Stephen Vincent Bénéet later dramatized part of the novel. Underlying the story is Alegría's plea for justice for the Peruvian Indians, a group exploited and injured by racial, social, and political self-seekers. When the novel appeared, it was frequently referred to as a South American version of John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath. In addition to the sociological elements, the novel is a veritable storehouse of Peruvian lore, giving as it does a detailed picture of the social structure of the Indian community, its innate dignity, its traditions, and its overwhelming tragedy. Since 1934 Alegría has been an exile from Peru because of his political views.

The Story:

Rosendo Maquis was the mayor of Rumi, a small Indian town in the Peruvian uplands. The village was a communal organization, as it had been for centuries. Its life was peaceful, for the Rumi Indians were an agricultural people. Rosendo's only troubles were personal. Because his wife was dying, he had been sent into the mountains to find herbs to be used in making medicine for the sick woman. On his way back to the village he saw an evil omen in the passage of a snake across his path. Troubled times, he felt, lay ahead.

That same night Rosendo's wife died, and her death marked the beginning of many misfortunes for the mayor and his people. A few days later it became known that Don Amenabar, whose ranch bordered the Indian village, was filing suit to take away the best of the land belonging to Rumi. Rosendo and his selectmen saddled their horses and rode to the nearby town to get a lawyer to defend them. They hired Bismarck Ruiz, a man who had a poor reputation in the town because of his love affair with La Castellana, a notorious woman of very expensive tastes. In return for a large fee, Bismarck Ruiz promised to win the suit for the Indians.

Life went on as usual in the village during the days before the trial. There was a cattle roundup, to which Don Amenabar sent men to collect the cattle belonging to him. Although he did not pay the grazing fee, and the Indians knew it would be futile to ask it of him, he charged them a high fee to redeem any cattle that accidentally wandered onto his lands. The Indians were also busy building a school, for the commissioner of education of the province had promised them a schoolmaster as soon as they had a hygienic place for the school to convene.

In an effort to learn what Don Amenabar was plotting against them, the Indians sent one of their number to the ranch to sell baskets and woven mats. When Don Amenabar saw the Indian on his ranch, he ordered his overseers to give the unlucky fellow a hundred lashes, a punishment which would have killed many men.

Finally the case came to court. The Indians felt at first that they would win. Don Amenabar's men had removed the stones marking the community boundaries, but the Indians had returned them. The return, they felt, was indicative of their success. But the case was soon over, thanks to a large number of perjuring witnesses who testified against the Indians by claiming that the people of Rumi had encroached on Don Amenabar's land. Even the judge had received money and preferment from the rancher.

The Indians' lawyer immediately made up a brief for an appeal to a higher court, but Don Amenabar's men, disguised as the followers of Fiero Vasquez, the outlaw, stole the mailbag containing the documents as the mailcarrier passed through a desolate part of the Andes. Don Amenabar did not want the authorities in Lima to hear of the affair because he wished to send his son to the legislature and, eventually, to become a senator himself.

Correa Zavala, a young lawyer fired with zeal for the cause of the Peruvian Indians, took up the villagers' case. It had become clear to the Indians that Bismarck Ruiz was not helping them with all his ability, and they had evidence that he was really in the pay of Don Amenabar. The young lawyer made up a long brief which included many documents from the history of the village. These were sent to the capital with a guard of troops and Indians, for their loss would have made it difficult to prove the village's legal existence as a community.

All was to no avail, however, for at last the day came when the court order, enforced by troops, was delivered to the Indians. They were to leave the most fertile of their lands and move to what was left to them in the higher areas. When one of the village women went to her lover, Fiero Vasquez, the notorious highwayman and bandit, he came with his band of cutthroats to help the Indians drive off the people who were forcing them to leave. Rosendo refused aid from the outlaws because he knew that resistance would have been useless. His point was made when a villager was machine-gunned to death for daring to kill one of Don Amenabar's men with a rock.

Even in the highlands the Indians were not safe from Don Amenabar, who wanted to make them slaves to work a mine that he owned on another piece of property. Because he had resolved never to be satisfied until they were delivered into his hands, his men raided the Indians' cattle herds, even creeping up to the corrals in the village at night. At last the prize bull of the village disappeared. The Indians found the animal on Don Amenabar's ranch. In spite of the brand, Don Amenabar refused to return the bull and ordered Rosendo off the ranch. That same night the mayor returned, determined to regain the animal for his people. He found the bull, but as he was leading the animal away he was captured. Taken into town, Rosendo was jailed on a charge of thievery. At his trial he was found guilty and sentenced to a long term in prison.

While Rosendo was in jail, Fiero Vasquez was captured and placed in the cell with Rosendo. Having plenty of resources to make bribes, the highwayman made arrangements to break out of prison. When he escaped, Rosendo was blamed. The prison guards beat the old man so severely that he died within a few hours.

Not long after the death of Rosendo, a young Indian he had reared came back to the village after an absence of many years. Benito Castro, a soldier and a gaucho, was quickly accepted as a leader by the Indians, who needed the wisdom and aid of someone who had been outside the mountain village. Under Castro's leadership the people drained swampy meadows and rebuilt their village in a better location in the highlands. But their relative prosperity was short-lived, for Don Amenabar still planned to enslave them or drive them into hiding. At last a large detachment of troops, augmented by men convinced that the Indians were mutinous against the government, attacked the village. In a long battle with the forces sent against them, the Indians were utterly defeated, their leaders were killed, and the village was destroyed. The few survivors, told by the dying Benito Castro to save themselves, had no idea where they could go to seek a refuge in that harsh, lawless land.

This long novel of the Jewry of Lodz has two main themes: the cyclical prosperity and misfortune of the Polish Jews, and the differences between the Ashkenazi brothers. In their increasing industrialization the Jews had all the ups and downs of the Poles and Germans except that the masses were always a little more miserable than their gentile neighbors. In addition, they suffered recurring waves of oppression. Jacob, the younger of the brothers, represents the upright, extroverted Jew who makes his way by personality. Simcha is a planner and schemer who outlasts his brother because he can take any insults and turn them to his own advantage.

The Story:

Abraham was a pious Jew and a good businessman. General agent for the Huntze mills, he was greatly respected by the community. He always spent the Passover season with his beloved rabbi in a town some distance from Lodz. One year his wife protested more than usual at being left alone because she expected to be confined soon. Furthermore she knew the child would be a boy; she felt stirrings on her right side. Abraham paid no attention to her protests.

When he returned he found two sons. The older by several minutes was Simcha, the younger Jacob. Simcha, the smaller, always showed a meaner spirit. As they grew older, Jacob was the happy leader of neighborhood games, the favorite of all. Dinah, a neighbor girl, worshipped him for years. Simcha seldom played with anyone, and he had no stomach for physical hurts.

In school, however, Jacob was an amiable dunce, while Simcha was the scholar. Before long Simcha was recognized as a genius. At an early age he could cite the Talmud and dispute with his teacher. By the time he was ten he was sent to a more learned rabbi, Nissan's father. Since his new teacher was more moral and uncompromising, Simcha's glib smartness often led him into disfavor. Also, he had to take second place to Nissan.

Simcha kept his leadership by running gambling games during the class hours, and on holidays he led his schoolmates into gambling houses. Simcha always won, even from the professional gamblers. Nissan had no time for gambling, but his sin was even greater: he read secular books on chemistry, astronomy, economics. Betrayed by Simcha, and cast out by his father, Nissan became an apprentice weaver.

Because of Simcha's growing reputation for acuity, a marriage broker was able to arrange an advantageous engagement. At the age of thirteen, Dinah and Simcha were betrothed. Dinah was miserable. She was blonde and educated in languages; Simcha was unprepossessing and educated only in the Talmudic discipline. The marriage, which took place several years later, was never a happy one. Dinah could never forget Jacob.

Simcha, with a clever head for figures, kept the accounts at the mill belonging to his easygoing father-in-law. By getting the older man to sign promissory notes, Simcha soon became a partner. Although the family resented Simcha's hard dealing, he was grimly intent on making money. By shrewdness and trickery he became sole owner of the mill in a short time. But his father-in-law's mill was only a handloom establishment; Simcha set his sights higher.

The biggest steam mill in Lodz was owned by a crusty German, Huntze. With Simcha's father as general agent, the mill had a high reputation. Huntze's profligate sons wanted a title in the family, but old Huntze would not spend the money for one. Wily Simcha lent great sums to the Huntze boys, enough to buy a title and more. When their father died, the sons recognized the debt by appointing Simcha their agent; Abraham was dismissed. Thereafter Abraham counted his oldest son among the dead.

Meanwhile Jacob had married Pearl, the anemic daughter of the great Eisen household in Warsaw. Pearl had seen Jacob at Simcha's wedding and had fallen in love with the ebullient younger brother. Jacob easily shed his Jewish ways and became Europeanized. Since Pearl was sickly, she could not keep up with her vigorous husband, and Jacob spent much time in Lodz. Eventually, tr

Simcha's chagrin, Jacob was made agent for the Flederbaum mills, a rival establishment.

When a depression came, Simcha adulterated his goods to keep going, and then decided to cut wages. Under the leadership of Tevyeh, a fanatic, and Nissan, now a well-educated weaver, the men struck. Simcha resisted for a long time and then broke the strike by bribing the police to arrest Nissan and Tevyeh. The two were sentenced to exile in Siberia.

By close attention to sales, by sweating his labor, Simcha made money. He traveled to the East and increased his market enormously. He was recognized as the merchant prince of Lodz. During the Russo-Japanese War he made great profits by selling to the military. Throughout these years the trade union movement was growing, however, and Nissan, back in Lodz, had become a highly-placed official in the revolutionary society. When the workers struck again, the unionists were too strong for Simcha and his factory stayed closed for months. This time the strike was broken only by military action which turned into a pogrom against the Jews. Nissan was again sent to prison.

In order to increase his holdings and to get sufficient capital to buy the entire ownership of the Huntze mill, Simcha divorced Dinah and married a rich widow. Jacob, matching his brother's affluence by becoming the lover of one of the Flederbaum girls after Pearl divorced him, was made director of the rival mill. Simcha's daughter Gertrude, a headstrong modern girl, made Jacob fall in love with her. He married her because she reminded him of Dinah.

When the World War broke out, Simcha moved his factory to Petrograd and so missed the German occupation of Lodz. Russia went through a revolution, however, and the workers came to power. Once again Nissan met Simcha, but this time Nissan was the master, and his party confiscated Simcha's property. When the ruined Simcha tried to get out of Russia, he was arrested and jailed through the treachery of a fellow Jew.

Back in Lodz, Jacob still maintained some position in the community, and Simcha's second wife had managed to hold on to some wealth. Jacob went to Russia and by judicious bribery freed his brother, now a broken man. When the two brothers attempted to re-enter Poland, anti-Jewish feeling was strong. The border guards forced Simcha to dance and grovel and shout a repudiation of his religion and race. Jacob, refusing to truckle, struck a captain savagely. Jacob was shot to death but Simcha was permitted to live.

Simcha lived for a time apathetically with his wife, his divorced wife Dinah, his daughter Gertrude, and his granddaughter. Gradually his cunning returned. He made a trip to England and arranged for a loan big enough to rebuild his looted factory. He induced his long-forgotten son to come back from France. Ignatz brought with him his French wife. Simcha suspected darkly that she was not even Jewish, but he did not inquire. When the postwar depression struck, Simcha was reviled by his fellow merchants for bringing in English capital. Lodz was almost a dead town commercially when Simcha died.

THE BRUSHWOOD BOY

Type of work: Novelette

Author: Rudyard Kipling (1865-1936)

Type of plot: Fantasy

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England and India

First published: 1895

Principal characters:

GEORGIE COTTAR, the brushwood boy

MIRIAM LACY, the girl in his dreams

Critique:

One of the lesser known of Kipling's works, "The Brushwood Boy," from The Day's Work, follows the career of a boy who was haunted by the same dream from his infancy through his years in the army. The companion of his dreams, a lovely girl, grew with him and shared his experiences in dreamland. When she materialized and appeared before him in real life, he knew that he had unknowingly been waiting for her all his life. This brief, fantastic romance differs sharply from the themes and treatment found in Kipling's more popular books.

The Story:

When he was three years old, Georgie Cottar was frightened by a dream about a policeman and screamed out in terror. But by the time he was six his dreams fused into the stories he told himself while he was going to sleep. These dreams always started the same way. Near a beach was a pile of brushwood. Around this heap of brushwood Georgie ran and played with other boys and girls. Strange and beautiful things happened in his dream story. Iron railings turned soft and could be walked on; houses filled with grown-up people were pushed over by the children. These wonderful things happened, however, only so long as Georgie knew he was dreaming. As soon as he thought them real, his dream left him sitting on a doorstep doing multiplication tables.

The princess of his dreams, and his favorite, he called by the two names he thought the most beautiful in the world, Anna and Louise. These he ran together and pronounced Annianlouise. She applauded his slaying of dragons and buffaloes and all the other brave deeds he did in the country of dreams.

When he was seven, Georgie moved with his family to "Oxford-on-a-visit." While there he was taken to a magic show, where he sat next to a little girl who in a lisping voice admired the cut in Georgie's finger. The cut was the work of Georgie's first knife, and he was intensely proud of it. He hoped it might give him lockjaw. His conversation with the little girl was cut short by his nurse, who told him he must not talk to strangers. Georgie knew his friend was not a stranger, but he could not explain the fact to a grownup. That night he had a new dream, and at the brushwood pile the girl of the theater waited for him; they played wonderful games around the brushwood.

The next ten years Georgie spent at an English public school. Those busy years did not leave much time for dreaming. In each form he became a leader, excelling in athletics and dealing with the boys' personal quarrels. In his last year at school he was the acknowledged leader of the students, a friend of the Headmaster himself. From public school he went to Sandhurst, where he again started at the bottom of the Lower Third Form and worked his way up to a position of leadership. After Sandhurst he received a commission as a subaltern in one of Her Majesty's regiments.

His training for leadership during his school years served him well in his new position of minor authority in the Indian service. His natural way with men made him a good leader; the poorest soldiers became men under his training. He knew his own men as few officers did, and they would follow him through any danger or through the boredom of garrison duty. Heroic deeds he passed off as no more than duty. Although ladies of the garrison sought his favor, he was oblivious to their attentions.

In India his dreams started again. They began like his dreams of old, by a brushwood pile. A sea lay beyond the brushwood pile, and on it he would travel far. Somewhere there was a lamppost, at which any wonderful thing could happen. Sometimes he raced for that lamppost in his dreams, for he knew it was a place of safety. Once a policeman waited there for him and filled him with terror, just as the policeman had terrified him in his babyhood dream. Sometimes his dreams were filled with pleasure. He sailed in a clockwork steamer, stopping by likes labeled Hong Kong or Java. He knew that he had reached the world's end. Then a person, unknown and unseen, would lead him back to the brushwood pile and safety. He took a pony on a Thirty-Mile Ride, trying to reach the down with the lamppost on it. Then "They" could not harm him, whoever "They" were. So his dreams went, formless and weird.

Georgie was promoted, and under his leadership his men won an important battle. As a reward he was given a year's leave in England. Throughout his furlough his dreams continued. Now a girl with black hair, combed in a widow's peak, was his companion in most of his dreams. She was the companion who helped him back to the lamppost and the brushwood pile. Although she had become a woman, Georgie still recognized her as his dreamland friend.

At home Georgie was pampered and catered to by his father and mother and the servants. Mothers brought their daughters to parade before the eligible Georgie, but he was immune to them. Then Miriam Lacy was brought for a visit by her mother. Before he saw Miriam he heard her singing a song about the policeman and the city of sleep, from the land of his dreams. His heart stood still; he knew here was the girl of the brushwood pile. When he met her he saw the black hair, the widow's peak, and she spoke with a concealed lisp.

On a ride, that evening, Georgie spoke to Miriam of the Thirty-Mile Ride and the lamppost. At first she pretended ignorance, but her song had given her away. Then the two young people broke all barriers and shared in real life the dreams they had shared so long. Miriam, too, had seen all the wonderful things Georgie had seen. The companion of his dreams, through all the years, she was his Annieanlouise. Now they would marry and be together in real life. In the darkness, each of them wondered what the other would look like in the light.

BUSSY D'AMBOIS

Author: George Chapman (1559?-1634)

Type of plot: Tragedy of blood

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Paris

First presented: c. 1604

Principal characters:

BUSSY D'AMBOIS, a soldier of fortune

HENRY III, King of France

MONSIEUR, the king's brother

THE DUKE OF GUISE

THE COUNT OF MONTSURRY

TAMYRA, his wife

A FRIAR

Critique:

Bussy d'Ambois appears to represent a decadent, rather cynical comment on the Renaissance individual whose ambition and self-confidence knew no bounds.

Having achieved status in a ruthless and utterly corrupt court, he offended at every hand and dallied with abandon in illicit love. What the Quarto of 1607 refers to as Bussy d'Ambois: A Tragedy, appears to be as much satire as tragedy. Even Bussy's determination, after he has been shot, to die while he supports himself on his sword seems comic in its futility, considering the despicable nature of his antagonists and of his mistress. Chapman's play, based on the actual career of Louis de Clermont, Sieur de Bussy d'Amboise, is skillfully constructed, the language poetic and compelling.

The Story:

In Paris, Bussy d'Ambois was a soldier and gentleman too poor to gain favor at the court. By appointment he met Monsieur, brother of King Henry III, in a side street. Monsieur, chiding Bussy for his downcast countenance, reminded him that some of the greatest men in history had endured obscurity and exile before becoming renowned. Anxious to have ambitious and ruthless young men about him, Monsieur invited Bussy to be his man and to become a courtier. Later, Maffé, Monsieur's steward, came to Bussy and, seeing the wretched state he was in, gave him a hundred crowns of the thousand that Monsieur had sent Bussy. But Bussy, perceiving that Maffé was a proud scoundrel and knowing Monsieur's reputation for generosity, was able to talk Maffé out of the remaining nine hundred crowns. With the money in his possession, Bussy struck Maffé in payment for his insubordination. Maffé hinted that he would be avenged.

Monsieur introduced Bussy, dressed in fine new clothes, at court. As he was presented to various noble people of the court, he impressed them with his directness. The Duke of Guise jealously noted that Bussy was being quite free with his wife, Elenor, and suggested that Bussy not be so forward. Bussy, uncourtier-like, answered Guise sharply. Although warned by Monsieur, Bussy still persisted in dallying pleasantly with Elenor. Having offended Guise, Bussy also bluntly incurred the enmity of three courtiers, Barrisor, l'Anou, and Pyrhot.

In the duel which followed the three courtiers and two of Bussy's friends were killed; he was the only survivor. Later he went to the court with Monsieur, who successfully won a pardon for Bussy from King Henry. Bussy thanked the king and declared that he could not avoid defending his honor. Guise was deeply offended by the royal pardon Bussy had received.

Tamyra, Countess of Montsurry, met Bussy and fell in love with him. At the same time Monsieur, making every attempt to seduce the noblewoman, gave her a pearl necklace. Later Tamyra entered a secret chamber back of her bedchamber. A friar, in league with her, brought Bussy by a secret passageway to the chamber on the pretext that Bussy was to explain to Tamyra a false report that he had killed Barrisor because the dead man had been interested in the countess. The friar, after hinting of Tamyra's love for Bussy and cautioning him to be discreet, left Bussy and Tamyra together.

Her passion for Bussy having been consummated, Tamyra expressed a deep feeling of guilt and feared that she might be discovered. Bussy assured her that he would protect her from all dishonor. As he took leave of her, again accompanied by the friar, she gave him the necklace Monsieur had given her. At daybreak Montsurry returned home to find his wife awake and fully clothed. She explained that she had not been able to sleep while he had been away on business. When he asked her to come to bed with him, she begged off, saying that the friar did not approve of making love by daylight.

Bussy, having become a great favorite of the king, declared to the court that he would be the king's own right arm in exposing sycophants, rascals, and any other unprincipled men in the realm. Grown heady with favor, he taunted

Guise, who retorted that Bussy was the illegitimate son of a cardinal. The two men were ready to settle their grudge in a duel, but the king managed to reconcile them momentarily.

Monsieur realized that he had sponsored a man who could not be manipulated. He and Guise plotted Bussy's downfall by gaining the confidence of the serving-women of the chief ladies of the court. Pero, Tamyra's maid, disclosed to Monsieur that her mistress had given herself to Bussy, but the servant was unable to reveal the identity of the person who had acted as go-between in the illicit affair.

Bussy, at the height of his power in the court, reminded his patron of Monsieur's ambition to be king. He declared that he would assist Monsieur in everything short of actually killing King Henry. Monsieur asked Bussy for his honest opinion of him; Bussy said he would give it in return for Monsieur's opinion of Bussy. Monsieur thereupon declared that Bussy was a vain, pompous, ruthless, and inconsistent man. Bussy, in return, said that Monsieur was a liar, a gossip, and the fountainhead of all cruelty and violence in France. The two, having made their disclosures of each other's worth, went together to a banquet given by the king.

During the banquet Monsieur suggested to Bussy that he pay court to Tamyra, who was reputed to be unapproachable. When Bussy pretended to have only the slightest acquaintance with her, Monsieur hinted that he knew more than he would tell. The king, sensing that violence was in the offing, beckoned to his favorite to join him, and he and Bussy left the banquet hall.

Monsieur offered to show Montsurry a letter which would reveal to him the perfidy of his wife, but trusting Montsurry refused to take the letter. His suspicions having been aroused, however, Tamyra, aided by Pero, was able to convince him that he had no cause to suspect his wife of faithlessness.

Later Bussy and Tamyra met in the secret chamber and Tamyra revealed to her lover that Monsieur knew of their meetings. The friar invoked spirits so that the two could foresee what the future might hold. Behemoth, the chief spirit invoked, re-created an image of Monsieur, Guise, and Montsurry in conference. Monsieur and Guise, having convinced Montsurry of Tamyra's passion for Bussy, urged him to force Tamyra to reveal the identity of the go-between so that Bussy might more easily be ambushed and killed. Pero came to the conferring lords and gave Monsieur a letter written by Tamyra. Montsurry, utterly confused by that time, and not knowing whom to trust, stabbed Pero. Behemoth forecast a violent end for the friar, Tamyra, and Bussy unless they were able to act with the greatest wisdom.

Montsurry returned to his house and seized Tamyra, who was in the company of the friar. Despite the friar's warning to him not to act with violence, Montsurry ordered Tamyra to write her confession. She resisted, whereupon he stabbed her repeatedly. When she still persisted in her refusal to write, he had her placed on a rack. The friar, who had left that scene of violence, returned with a sword and killed himself with it. Tamyra, tortured on the rack, confessed that the friar had been the go-between. She wrote to Bussy in her own blood that he was to come to her in the secret chamber.

Montsurry, disguised as the friar, brought hired murderers to his friends Monsieur and Guise; then he left them to lure Bussy to a carefully plotted doom.

Meanwhile the ghost of the friar appeared to Bussy and predicted a dire fate for him. When the ghost left, after declaring that it would meet Bussy in Tamyra's secret chamber, Bussy apprehensively invoked the spirit of the underworld. The spirit, appearing, told him that the friar was really dead and that Bussy should not heed his next summons from Tamyra. Bussy wanted to know who would deliver the summons.

The spirit could not answer because a stronger spirit, Fate, controlled by Monsieur and Guise, prevented that disclosure.

Montsurry, dressed as the friar, brought the letter written in blood to Bussy. Duped by the disguise and defying the malign predictions he had heard, Bussy followed Montsurry back to Tamyra.

The ghost of the friar, meanwhile, appeared to Tamyra and advised her to shout a warning to Bussy as he was brought into the secret room. When Bussy and Montsurry entered the chamber, she did indeed warn Bussy. As his enemies and the hired murderers closed in on their victim, the ghost of the friar unnerved the murderers and Bussy was given time to collect himself. Having killed one of the murderers, he was about to kill Montsurry when he was shot down. Bussy, propping himself on his sword so that he might die in a defiant attitude, forgave those who had brought him to his death. After Bussy's death Montsurry banished Tamyra, the unfaithful wife.

Critique:

Although this novel presents a vivid and realistic picture of life in one corner of Spain, Blasco Ibáñez did not want himself to be catalogued as a regional novelist. Proud of his country and its efforts, he felt that he, his work, and his countrymen in general were often misunderstood, particularly by Americans. Like many other Spanish authors, also, he could not understand why Americans knew so little about Spain and its culture, and so much of his early fiction dealt with his native section of Spain. Even so, he did not want to be thought of as associated with any one district or as the chronicler of the manners of any one region. Many of his novels achieved greater popularity, but most critics believe that The Cabin was his major contribution to the art of the novel.

The Story:

Batiste Borrull brought his family to a district near Valencia to take up a small truck farm that had lain idle for more than ten years. None of the Borrulls knew that other farmers in the district had vowed that the owners of the farm should never reap any profit from its rich soil. When Batiste and his family arrived, they knew only that the stares and lack of greeting meant that they were not welcome.

The former tenant of the farm had been a very meek old man named Barret, a farmer who would do anything to keep his land, which meant more to him than did his family. The owner of the farm, Don Salvador, lived in the nearby city of Valencia. He took advantage of Barret's meekness and his love of the land and raised the rent year after year, always knowing that the old farmer would somehow find a way to get the money. Charging a large amount of interest, he even lent Barret money to buy a horse when the old one died of overwork. At last the rent for the rich acres exceeded the income from the crops; Barret and his family sold all their bits of finery and used up all their savings to pay the rent, but such actions only postponed their inevitable ruin. At last the time came when they could not pay the rent.

When that fateful day arrived, Barret was forcibly put off his farm by officers of the law. The old man went berserk that night and crept off into the cane-breaks. The next day he found Don Salvador alone on the road and killed him with a scythe. He also destroyed all the crops so that the heirs of Don Salvador would not gain anything by his labors. Old Barret was imprisoned for his deed and his daughters ended up as prostitutes in Valencia. The neighbors vowed in a body that no one should farm the place and thus make it profitable for the heirs of the hateful Don Salvador. Several people before Batiste Borrull had come to take over the place, but the farmers had driven off each newcomer very shortly.

Batiste and his family stayed on the farm and worked as busily as ants for many days. While they were on their own land, not even Pimentó, the neighborhood bully, dared bother them, for the home was sacred to those simple peasants. In addition, Batiste was a very large and strong man. When he and his family ended their initial labors, the house was repaired and half of the land was under cultivation. Once again the place looked prosperous, even more so than the fields around it. To the neighbors' original prejudice was added envy.

Roseta, Batiste's daughter, went to work in the silk mills of Valencia, returning to her home each night from the city. Many of the girls from the district worked in the factory, and Roseta quickly learned that she was not wanted in their company any more than her family was wanted in the district.

The three little boys of Batiste fared no better in school. The other boys picked on them and thrashed them at every opportunity, even though the young Borrulls gave no offense to the others.

Disaster almost overtook the family when Batiste was falsely accused before the water tribunal of taking water from the irrigation ditch when it was not his turn. For that offense he was fined heavily, and was ordered by the court not to use any water for some time. The person behind the accusation was Pimentó, the village bully. But Batiste refused to allow his crops and his family to be ruined. That same night he took his shotgun and went to the water gates. Opening the gates, he took the water his land needed. He looked so fierce that no one disturbed him, nor did anyone tell the authorities what he had done.

Although humiliated in little ways and insulted at every turn, the family prospered. They even felt that they were beginning to make some decent impression upon the farmers who hated them. But one day the schoolboys beat the smallest of Batiste's sons and threw him into a water-filled ditch. The boy, whom the family called the Bishop because of his inoffensive manners and quiet attitude, became ill from exposure and died after a lingering illness. The entire district finally took pity on the family, the neighbors feeling that they were somewhat to blame for the little fellow's death. Everyone attended the funeral, even though a few days before several of the men had wounded Batiste's horse as it stood in the fields.

For several weeks after the Bishop's death and burial, Batiste's family seemed to fit into the community life; even the bully Pimentó was pleasant to them. The harvest was ready, and Batiste's acres yielded him a fine return for the labor and love he had bestowed upon them. The barn was filled with wheat and vegetables to carry the family through the coming seasons. But during the festival days that followed, the people, envious of the fine harvest the newcomers had raised, began to turn against the Borrulls again.

During the festival Pimentó and two fellow rascals held a contest in the local inn to see who could sit and play cards the longest while drinking brandy. For more than two days the contest continued. Batiste, overwhelmed by curiosity and thinking he had only friends in the district, went to the inn to watch. As the contest drew to a close, with Pimentó the winner, the bully saw Batiste standing among the spectators. Utterly drunk, the bully turned upon Batiste and ordered him to leave the inn and the district immediately. Batiste, knowing the matter had to be settled sooner or later, raised a heavy stool and attacked the bully. So fiercely did he swing the stool that no one bothered him. From that day on Batiste carried his shotgun wherever he went.

One evening, while he was returning to his home, he felt that he was being followed. As he entered a dark lane, someone shot him in the shoulder. Wounded only slightly, Batiste pursued his attacker and saw that the man was Pimentó. He followed the bully and finally wounded him seriously. Batiste, suffering from his wound, then crawled back to his cabin. No one bothered the family for several days, although the tumult a few days later told them that Pimentó had died and was being buried in the local manner.

On the night following Pimentó's funeral Batiste could not sleep well. He had weird dreams, in which it seemed that Pimentó was victorious over him. At last he awoke, to find the cabin in flames. He and his family dashed outside, saving almost nothing but their own skins. They sat helplessly and alone by the side of the road and watched their belongings and their harvest go up in flames. Knowing that their neighbors had set the blaze, the Borrulls realized that they would be forced to leave at last, unless they wished to court death. They were surrounded by an insurmountable, undying hatred.

CAIN

Author: George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788-1824)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: The period of Genesis

Locale: Outside Eden

First published: 1821

ADAM, the first man
EVE, his wife
CAIN, and
ABEL, their sons
ADAH, Cain's wife
ZILLAH, Abel's wife
LUCIFER, the fallen angel

Critique:

Byron, unorthodox in his religious beliefs and bitterly critical of the mores of his society, managed to adapt this Biblical tale to an expression of his own temperament. Cain's motivation in murdering his brother lay deeply within the murderer's tortured soul, a soul which lusted for truth but was denied fulfillment. Byron's Cain is the eternal romantic rebel, and Byron, in spite of his rationalism, his autobiographical egocentricity, and his invectives against society, is an original and singular artist in this poetic drama.

The Story:

While Adam, Eve, Abel, Zillah and Adah prayed to God, Cain stood sullenly by and complained that he had nothing to pray for, since he had lost immortality when Eve ate the fruit from the tree of knowledge. He could not understand why, if knowledge and life were good, his mother's deed had been a deadly sin. Abel, Adah, and Zillah urged him to cast off his melancholy and join them in tending the fields.

Alone, Cain deplored his worldly toil. Tired of the repetitious replies to all his questions, replies which refused to challenge God's will, he was no longer sure that God was good.

At the conception of this thought, Lucifer appeared to explain that Cain's mortality was only a bodily limit. He would live forever even after death. Cain, driven by instinct to cling to life, at the same time despised it. Lucifer admitted that he also was unhappy in spite of his immortality, which was a cursed thing in his fallen state. He launched into a bitter tirade against God, whom he described as a tyrant sitting alone in his misery, creating new worlds because his eternity was otherwise expressionless and boring to him. Lucifer exulted that his own condition was at least shared by others. These words echoed for Cain his own beliefs about the universe. Long had he pitied his relatives for toiling so hard for sustenance, as God had decreed when he had banished Adam and Eve from Eden.

Lucifer confessed that the beguiling snake had not been a disguise for himself; the snake was merely a snake. He predicted, however, that later generations of man would array the fall of Adam and Eve in a cloak of fable.

Cain then asked his mentor to reveal the nature of death, which held great terrors for Cain. Lucifer promised to teach Cain true knowledge if Cain would worship him. But Cain, having refused to worship even God, would not worship any being. His refusal was, according to Lucifer, in itself a form of worship.

Adah came to ask Cain to go with her, but he claimed that he must stay with Lucifer, who spoke like a god. She reminded Cain that the lying serpent, too, had spoken so. Lucifer insisted that the serpent had spoken truly when it had promised knowledge from the fruit of the forbidden tree; man's grief lay not in the serpent's so-called lie but in man's knowledge of evil. Lucifer said he would take Cain with him for an hour, time enough to show him the whole of life and death.

Traveling with Lucifer through the air, Cain, watching with ecstasy the beauty around him, insisted upon viewing the mystery of death, which was uppermost in his mind. The travelers came at last to a place where no stars glittered and all was dark and dreadful. As they entered Hades, Cain voiced again his hatred of death, the end of all living things.

In the underworld he saw beautiful and mighty shapes which, Lucifer explained, had inhabited the world and died by chaotic destruction in an age before Adam had been created. When Lucifer taunted Cain with his inferiority compared to those other beings of an earlier age, Cain declared himself ready to stay in Hades forever. Lucifer confessed, however, that he had no power to allow anyone to remain in Hades. When he pointed out to Cain that the spirits of the former inhabitants of the earth had enjoyed a beautiful world. Cain said that earth was still beautiful. His complaint was against man's toil for what the earth bore, his failure to obtain knowledge, and his unmitigated fear of death.

Cain, bewailing the trade man had made of death for knowledge, asserted that man knew nothing. Lucifer replied that death was a certainty and therefore truth and knowledge. Cain thought that he had learned nothing new from his journey, but Lucifer informed him that he had at least discovered that there was a state beyond his own.

They discussed Cain's relative state of happiness in life, which, Cain asserted, was dependent upon his love for his family. Lucifer hinted that Abel, favored by the others and by God, caused Cain some jealousy. Cain then asked his guide to show him where Lucifer lived, or else God's dwelling place. It was reserved for those who died, Lucifer claimed, to see either one or the other, not both.

As Lucifer prepared to return his pupil to earth, Cain complained that he had learned nothing. He had, Lucifer said, discovered that he was nothing. With a warning to distinguish between real good and evil, and to seek his own spiritual attachment, Lucifer transported the mortal back to earth.

Standing over their son Enoch, who was asleep under a tree, Adah and Cain discussed their ever-present sorrow: they must all die. When Adah said she would gladly die to save her parents, Cain agreed only if his own death might save everyone else. Adah prophesied that such a gift might some day be rendered. Seeing the pair of altars Abel had erected for a sacrifice, Cain uttered his first evil thought by muttering a denial that Abel was his brother.

Abel insisted that Cain share in the sacrificial rites he was about to perform. While Cain impiously stood by, Abel knelt in eloquent prayer. Cain's prayer was a defiant challenge to the omnipotent to show his preference for one of the altars. His own offerings were scattered to the earth, while Abel's sacrifice burned in high flames toward the heavens. In anger Cain attacked his brother's altar, and when Abel protested that he loved his God more than life, Cain struck him a mortal blow.

Adam, Eve, Adah, and Zillah, rushing to the scene of the murder, accused Cain of murdering his brother. Eve uttered loud imprecations against her guilty son. Adam ordered him to depart. Only Adah remained by his side. The Angel of the Lord then appeared to confront Cain and ask the whereabouts of his brother. The Angel predicted that henceforth Cain's hand would cultivate no growing things from the earth and that he should be a fugitive. Lest the man guilty of fratricide be the cause of another murder, the Angel branded Cain with a mark on his forehead, to warn the beholder that to kill Cain would engender a sevenfold vengeance. Cain blamed his evil deed upon Eve, who bore him too soon after her banishment from Eden, when her own mind was still bitter over the lost paradise.

Adah offered to share her husband's fate. Carrying their children with them, she and Cain traveled eastward from Eden.

Geoffrey Chaucer, the son of a wealthy wine merchant, spent most of his life in the king's service in various capacities, some of which entailed frequent journeys to France and Italy. Actually, he served under three English kings, Edward III, Richard II, and Henry IV. It seems probable that his keen insight into human nature was the direct result of his association with people of all kinds in his various positions. In Chaucer's day England was still medieval, but in Italy the Renaissance had begun; his poetry belongs to both the Middle Ages and the new. His works can be roughly divided into three periods: the French, the Italian, and the English. The Canterbury Tales make his English period the most important. For these tales Chaucer used a form of language now called Middle English, language which in his day was understood by everyone, not by the learned only. Just as he used everyday language, he used everyday characters, presenting a series of portraits in poetry such as no one had attempted before. The pilgrims to Canterbury, representing all kinds of Englishmen, are revealed as real people, some noble, some coarse, some witty, some pious. While these portraits are individual, they are also typical; in them we have a picture of English life in the fourteenth century. The stories the pilgrims tell on their way to Canterbury are as varied as the characters who tell them.

Among the most common types used by Chaucer were the chivalric romance in "The Knight's Tale"; the fabliau, a farcical or bawdy story, in "The Miller's Tale" and "The Friar's Tale"; the supernatural story in "The Wife of Bath's Tale"; the sermonizing exemplum in "The Pardoner's Tale"; the beast fable in "The Nun's Priest's Tale"; and the saint's legend in "The Second Nun's Tale."

The Stories:

THE PROLOGUE

In the spring of the year when everyone wanted to get outdoors, Chaucer met a group of people at the Tabard Inn, in Southwark, bent on making a pilgrimage to the shrine of Thomas Becket in Canterbury. Among the pilgrims were the Knight, who had behaved admirably in his lord's wars; the Miller, a jokester and a ribald clown; the gap-toothed, lusty Wife of Bath; the Friar, a wanton, merry licensed beggar; the Pardoner with a bag stuffed with pardons hot from Rome; a kindly Parson; Nuns; Priests; a Merchant; a Man of Law; a Physician; a Franklin, and others that added up to a band of thirty. The host suggested that Chaucer join them and that each, to shorten the way, tell at least one story, the pilgrim telling the best story to be treated to a fine dinner on their return to Southwark.

THE KNIGHT'S TALE

After Theseus, Duke of Athens, had defeated Creon at Thebes, his soldiers captured two cousins of the Theban royal house and imprisoned them for life in a high tower overlooking the duke's garden. Their names were Palamon and Arcite.

Theseus had a beautiful sister-in-law, Emily, who used to walk in the garden. Palamon and Arcite saw her there and both immediately loved her.

Soon afterward Arcite was released as a favor to an old friend of Theseus who had known Arcite for many years. Arcite, unable to stay away from Emily, changed his name and worked as a servant in Theseus' palace.

Palamon escaped from prison to be near Emily. When he and Arcite met, they agreed to fight the next day in full courtly armor, the winner to woo the girl. Theseus came upon them during the fight and persuaded them to desist. Instead, he arranged a tourney for them and one hundred knights each a year hence.

At the tourney Arcite and his knights captured Palamon, and Arcite was declared the winner. Then his horse stumbled and injured him mortally. When he died, Theseus gave Emily to Palamon, since he, as well as Arcite, was a noble youth.

THE MILLER'S TALE

John, a rich carpenter in Oxford, had recently married buxom and beautiful Alison. Since his wife was younger than he, he was constantly afraid of being cuckolded. John kept as a boarder in his house a lively young cleric called Nicholas who knew, among other odd information, the signs for rain and drought.

Nicholas immediately laid siege to Alison, but the wife, while she was not loath to play, feared her husband's jealousy. Nicholas spoke so appealingly that Alison promised to find time for them to be together.

Meanwhile Absalom, a young dandy, had fallen in love with Alison. He wooed her by singing under her window and sending her gifts of all sorts. Alison would have none of him.

Nicholas prepared to trick John so that he could spend the night with Alison. He told John that all signs pointed toward a flood second only to that of Noah's time, but that he and John and Alison might be saved if the carpenter would secure three large tubs, one for each of them, to be hung under the attic roof. John was to fill each with food for a day. In the roof he was to cut a hole out of which the tubs could float when the flood came.

John worked so hard getting the tubs prepared that he fell asleep shortly after the three of them took their places. Then Alison and Nicholas crept downstairs and made merry in John's bed.

Near dawn Absalom came to the bedroom window and begged Alison's love. When she tried to send him away, he asked for a kiss. She told Nicholas she would have a little fun with her foolish suitor and she stuck her bum out of the window. Absalom's hot love being cooled, he went to a blacksmith and borrowed a hot iron. Returning to Alison's window, he begged another kiss for which he would give a gold ring. By that time Nicholas wanted to get in on the fun, and so he thrust his rump out the window. Absalom, ready with the hot iron, scorched Nicholas' buttocks. When Nicholas screamed for water to cool his scorched flesh, John awoke and, thinking the flood had come, cut the ropes holding his tub. He fell headlong into the cellar.

THE FRIAR'S TALE

Once there was a summoner who knew more about bribery than can be told briefly. He was on his way to summon an old widow, pretending he had a case against her, when he met a yeoman at the edge of a forest.

They swore to be blood brothers and to stay together. The summoner tried to learn some more tricks from his companion when the yeoman claimed to be a bailiff who made all his money by extortion. Then the yeoman told him that he was really the fiend from hell.

They passed a carter whose horses were mired down. As he beat the beasts, the carter consigned them to the devil. The summoner asked his companion why he did not take the animals. The yeoman explained that the carter did not really mean that speech, though he did mean the praise he heaped on the horses when they got on firm ground.

When the summoner and the devil reached the widow's house, the summoner tried to get twelve pence from her. She refused to pay a penny since she was guilty of nothing, but she begged mercy. The summoner, swearing that the foul fiend could take him if he let her off, said that he would take her new pot in payment. She consigned the summoner and the pot to the devil. The yeoman asked if that were her true desire and she said it was unless the summoner repented. Since the summoner had no intention of repenting, the devil claimed him by rights and carried him off to hell.

THE WIFE OF BATH'S TALE

A lusty squire from King Arthur's court ravished a girl against her will. For this deed he was condemned to death, but the queen and her ladies asked mercy for him. The king allowed the queen to decide on the lad's life or death. She decided to give the boy a year in which to find the answer to the question of what women desire most.

Although the squire traveled far and wide seeking the answer, he found none to satisfy him. Finally a horribly ugly old woman gave him an answer to take back to the queen.

When the queen received him, the boy answered her question by saying that women wanted most to have complete control over their husbands and love affairs. The queen accepted that answer and agreed that he deserved to live.

The old hag who had supplied the answer asked of the queen the right to marry the squire. Scorning her because she was ugly, old, and of low birth, the squire was horrified at having to bed with a wife so foul. After lecturing him at length about gentle manners, noble deeds, and honesty, his wife finally gave him the choice of having her old, ugly, and true to him, or young and beautiful and possibly unfaithful. He sighed that he left the choice up to her. Seeing that she was then master of the situation, she commanded him to kiss her and swore to be both beautiful and true. When he looked at her in the light of day, he found her truly beautiful, and they lived in perfect joy.

THE PARDONER'S TALE

There was once a group of people in Flanders who were given to dissipation in all its forms, to excesses in eating, drinking, gambling, dancing, and frequenting brothels.

One morning before nine o'clock three rioters were sitting drinking in a tavern when they heard a bell tolled as a corpse was carried by. They sent a boy out to learn who had died. He returned to tell them that the dead man had been a merry friend of theirs from a neighboring town, where Death seemed to have found a home.

Swearing to be true brothers, the three rioters decided to look for and slay Death himself. Briskly they set out for the nearby town. On the way they met an old man to whom they were unduly rude. He told them they would find Death under a certain tree in the forest ahead.

When they reached the tree, they found a huge pile of gold coins. They were overjoyed at their find, but decided they had better wait until dark before they took the coins home.

One of the young men went into town for food for all. On the way he decided to kill the other two and keep all the gold for himself. He secured poison which he put into two of the three bottles of wine he bought.

Meanwhile the other two, having decided to share the gold equally, worked up a friendly tussle with the third man when he returned. In the scuffle one of the rioters brought out a dagger and killed the third one. Then the two celebrated his death with the bottles of wine. In no time all three were dead and had proved the old axiom that greed is the root of all evil.

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

Chanticleer was a very beautiful rooster whose crowing was the delight of the neighborhood. He lived on a widow's small farm with his seven hens. Dame Partlet was his favorite wife. She sat by him at night.

One night, after dreaming that he was being chased by a fox, he awoke frightened and trembling. Partlet insisted that dreams were all foolishness and that he needed a laxative which she would find for him among the herbs as soon as they flew from their perch in the morning. She accused him of being a coward, even after he had quoted Cato, St. Cenhelm, Macrobius, and the Bible to her. Then in the flush of a beautiful morning he made love to her and forgot the dream.

Sometime later that morning he had gone ahead of his hens to spy out some tempting food for them. There in the long grass lay a fox. Chanticleer would have run away except that the fox began to talk to him like an old friend of the family. The fox told Chanticleer that he had had the honor of entertaining Chanticleer's father and uncle in his home. Never was there such a sweet singer as Chanticleer's father, who sang so loudly that he had to close both eyes! Was Chanticleer's voice of the same caliber?

Chanticleer tipped back his head, closed his eyes, and crowed. The fox jumped up, grabbed Chanticleer by the throat, and carried him out of the yard. Chanticleer's hens made such a clatter, however, that the widow came out to investigate. She, her children, and all the barnyard animals made a great din.

Chanticleer asked the fox why he did not spurn the animals and tell them he was already clear of them. As soon as the fox opened his jaws Chanticleer leaped high into a tree. The fox begged him to come down, but the rooster hoped never to be fooled by flattery again. The fox hoped that some day he would learn to hold his tongue when he should.

THE SECOND NUN'S TALE

Cecilia was a devout Christian girl in Rome. On the night of her marriage to Valerian she told him that she had a guardian angel who protected her awake or asleep. If Valerian would love her only spiritually, the angel would protect him too, but if he loved her physically the angel would kill him.

Valerian asked to see the angel to know what he should do, and Cecilia directed him to St. Urban to be baptized. After being baptized, Valerian returned home. There he found Cecilia with the angel, who carried two wreaths of roses and lilies that he put on Cecilia's head and on Valerian's. Only those who truly believed could see the wreaths. Valerian asked the angel to convert his brother Tiburtius as well.

Tiburtius came to the house and was changed in heart as soon as he smelled the flowers. He too wanted to be baptized by St. Urban.

When officers of the law in Rome heard of the conversions and miracles attributed to Cecilia and the brothers, the prefect Almachius commanded them to sacrifice to Jupiter. Imprisoned overnight, they converted their jailer and his family. Because they refused to make a sacrifice to the pagan god, Valerian and Tiburtius were beheaded. Their jailer said he saw angels carrying their souls to heaven, and many more people were converted because of his story.

Tried before Almachius, Cecilia would not deny Christ. The prefect commanded that she be burned in a bath of red flames. Because the heat did not harm her, Almachius' emissary tried to sever her neck. He hit her three times; the law forbade a fourth try. Cecilia lived three days thereafter and continued to preach.

After asking that her house be made a church, she died. Her body was buried among the saints, and her house became the Church of St. Cecilia.

Critique:

This drama is one of the most inoffensive from the racy pen of Plautus; for this reason it is most frequently included in play anthologies. We know also that thirty years or so after the death of the dramatist a prologue was added to the play, indicating the harmless nature of the drama and explaining the plot, a rather complicated series of mistaken identities. The plot of the drama was probably derived from a comedy by the Greek playwright Menander, as were many of Plautus' other plays. This drama, although laid in Greece, abounds in details allusive to life in Plautus' Rome. Like Shakespeare, Plautus was skilled at adapting older plays to new and alien settings. The real comedy springs not from the situation of the lost sons, but rather from the character of the parasite, a stock figure in Roman drama, who is always hungry and always looking for a free meal.

The Story:

Hegio, a wealthy Aetolian, had lost a son years before, when a runaway slave named Stalagmus had carried the boy off at the age of four years. Later, during a war with Elis, his other son, Philopolemus, was captured and made a slave by the Elians. In an effort to regain his second son, Hegio bought up prisoners of war captured by the Aetolian army; his hope was to find a wealthy young Elian whom he could exchange for his own son. He had spent a great deal of money without finding a prisoner who might be so exchanged. Mourning his son's loss with him was a parasite, Ergasilus, a favorite of Hegio's son and the recipient of many free meals.

Finally, entirely by accident, Hegio bought a pair of prisoners, one of whom was the son stolen years before. The son, named Tyndarus, was the slave of Philocrates, a wealthy Elian prisoner. Philocrates and Tyndarus, having changed clothing and names, hoped by that ruse to get Philocrates set free to return to Elis. The ruse worked, for Hegio allowed Philocrates to return to Elis and arrange for an exchange of his own son for Philocrates' "master." Shortly afterward, Hegio, while visiting at his brother's home, found there another slave, a prisoner named Aristophontes, who claimed to be a friend of Philocrates. To satisfy himself as to the identity of his hostage and to do a kindness to both prisoners, Hegio took Aristophontes home with him. At Hegio's home Aristophontes laid bare the ruse that had been played on Hegio. At first Tyndarus tried to carry out his plans by claiming that Aristophontes was mad, but Hegio soon became aware that Tyndarus was not Philocrates. In his anger, Hegio had Tyndarus, actually his own son, sent to the stone quarries, with orders that he was to be worked hard for the trick he had played on his new owner.

In the meantime poor Ergasilus, the parasite, was going hungry in the absence of his patron, Philopolemus, although Hegio occasionally gave him a frugal meal. Ergasilus was the victim of a move on the part of the wealthy Aetolians to pay no attention to the parasites, thus forcing those rather unwelcome individuals to earn an honest living in some way or other.

Eliau Philocrates was an honest man who had loved his slave Tyndarus, for the two had been companions since childhood. Upon his return to Elis he arranged for the exchange of Philopolemus in return for his own freedom. He also decided to go with Philopolemus to Aetolia to regain his slave Tyndarus. He had promised, through the false Philocrates, to pay a sum of money as bail for Tyndarus' return.

The first person to see Philocrates and Philopolemus was the parasite Ergasilus. Realizing that the news was money in his wallet and food in his stomach, he rushed headlong to tell Hegio the tidings. Overjoyed, Hegio promised to give Ergasilus his board for the rest of his life and, for one meal, to give Ergasilus free rein in the kitchens. While Ergasilus rushed to have a feast prepared, Hegio went to the harbor to meet Philopolemus and the former prisoner, Philocrates. Hegio's joy knew no bounds when he embraced his son.

As soon as he returned to his house, Hegio sent for Tyndarus and had him released to his master Philocrates, without payment of the money he had once demanded for Tyndarus' freedom. While they were waiting for Tyndarus, Hegio questioned Stalagmus, his former slave, who had been recaptured at Elis and returned by Philocrates. Hegio hoped to discover what had happened to his other son. Stalagmus told how he had kidnaped Hegio's son and taken him to Elis. There, he said, he had sold the young boy to Philocrates' father. Philocrates then related how the little boy had been given to him as a companion and play fellow and had later become his valet. By the time Tyndarus had returned from the Quarry, the riddle had been solved. He was welcomed, not as a slave, but as a free man, the brother of Philopolemus, and Hegio's son.

Tyndarus was overjoyed by his good fortune. Hegio, anxious to punish Stalagmus for the kidnaping and to make amends to his long-lost son, gave the kidnaper over to Tyndarus to be punished. Tyndarus sent immediately for a blacksmith to strike off his own chains, which were exceedingly heavy, and had them placed on Stalagmus; he promised that unworthy person a life of hard labor and harsh treatment. Stalagmus philosophically accepted his fate; he had been born a slave, and he could expect to die a slave as well.

CASTE

Author: Thomas William Robertson (1829-1871)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: 1867

Principal characters:

THE HONORABLE GEORGE D'ALROY, a young man of social position
MARQUISE DE ST. MAUR, George D'Alroy's mother
ESTHER ECCLES, an actress loved by George D'Alroy
ECCLES, Esther's drunken father
POLLY, Esther's sister
CAPTAIN HAWTREE, George D'Alroy's friend
SAM GERRIDGE, Polly's fiancé

Critique:

Robertson is famous in the history of nineteenth-century British drama for his efforts to introduce naturalism in dialogue, feeling, and situation. He felt that British drama needed plays which would reflect the life of the times without artificialities of plot and violence of passion. Critics failed to appreciate his pioneering in realistic drama, but the contemporary theatergoers patronized productions of his dramas in large numbers. To the reader of today, accustomed to extreme realism in both fiction and drama, Robertson's plays seem rather conventional, unless one remembers that he was a pioneer and his work was revolutionary at the time. When compared to the drama of the 1920's and later, the realism of Caste may seem questionable, the stage business lacking in finesse, and the dialogue stilted. But in a historical analysis, plays like this are important for the changes they mark in the development of the drama.

The Story:

Captain George D'Alroy, whose mother was married to a French marquis, fell in love with a beautiful dancer named Esther Eccles. Despite his mother's pride in rank and family, he was resolved to marry the girl, but his good sense warned him that the marriage might result in his mother's unhappiness. In an effort to prove he was right in wishing to marry her, in spite of her place in a lower level of society, D'Alroy took his friend, Captain Hawtree, to see Esther at her home.

Hawtree agreed that Esther was a charming girl. Indeed, he himself was quite charmed with Esther's sister Polly. He warned D'Alroy, however, that the differences in social position and culture were too great to be bridged; he pointed out what D'Alroy wished to overlook—that Esther's father was a confirmed drunkard and loafer and that Polly was satisfied to marry a petty tradesman. Hawtree tried to make D'Alroy see that such people could never be acknowledged as the relatives of the daughter-in-law of the Marquise de St. Maur and the wife of an officer in a good regiment.

When Hawtree recommended that D'Alroy take a leave of absence from the regiment and travel to the West Indies in an effort to forget Esther, D'Alroy said that he had already tried unsuccessfully to stay away from her. He said also that he would rather be dead than give her up for good. D'Alroy pointed out that the girl's love for him was worth more than a title, at which statement Hawtree only smiled.

Captain D'Alroy, refusing to listen to his friend's well-intended advice, married Esther, and the newly married pair moved into good lodgings. A few weeks after the wedding D'Alroy's regiment was ordered to service in India. The captain did not know how to break the news to Esther. When the day of departure arrived, he still had not told her. To add to the complications, he had word that his mother, the marquise, was coming to bid him goodbye. Before he could tell Esther, his mother arrived. Afraid to let his mother meet Esther, D'Alroy had her hide in a bedroom. Overhearing the conversation, Esther learned that her husband would embark within a few hours. Unable to contain herself, she burst into the room. The marquise misunderstood at first and thought that Esther was her son's mistress. When she learned that the girl was his wife, however, she was only slightly mollified. Then Esther's drunken father came in, accompanied by Polly's tradesman-fiancé, Sam Gerridge. The marquise was dismayed.

A few months after D'Alroy's departure for India, Esther gave birth to a son. While she was still convalescing, word came that D'Alroy had been captured by Sepoys and undoubtedly killed. In addition, Esther was in need of money. Her father, entrusted with the money D'Alroy had left to provide for her, had spent the funds on drink and horse-racing. Too proud to ask her mother-in-law for help, Esther lived in real poverty. When the marquise heard of Esther's sad straits, she offered to take the baby and rear it as a grandson of the nobility ought to be reared. Too spirited and loving to accept the offer, Esther indignantly showed the marquise to the door.

Esther then tried to get work as a dancer, but the theater managers, knowing her story, took advantage of her plight and refused to pay her even a living wage, so that she and the baby were forced to rely on financial help from Polly's fiancé, who had but little money of his own, and on an unexpected check from Hawtree. Esther felt truly degraded when she found her father stealing the baby's gold necklace in order to pawn it for money to buy liquor.

Captain Hawtree, who had been promoted to a majority, returned from India and went to see what he might do to help his friend's widow. He had not even guessed the extent of Esther's difficulties. The sight of him was too much for her. She became ill and had to be put to bed. Polly then invited Hawtree to stay for tea with her and her fiancé. While they sat at tea, D'Alroy himself, much to everyone's surprise, came to the house.

D'Alroy told that after his capture he had been befriended by a native whom he had helped some time before. With the assistance of the native and his own daring in killing a guard with his bare hands, D'Alroy had managed to escape not long after Hawtree left India.

D'Alroy was surprised to learn that he was the father of a son. Overjoyed, he swore that he would buy the boy a pony the next day. As soon as his first rapture at seeing his child was over, D'Alroy wanted to see his wife, but Polly was afraid that the shock of seeing her supposedly dead husband might kill Esther. Polly asked D'Alroy to leave the room until she could break the good news gently to her sister.

Esther was a sensitive woman, and it took only a hint from Polly to let her know the news was about D'Alroy. As soon as she guessed, D'Alroy rushed into the room and took her in his arms. Scarcely a minute afterward, D'Alroy's mother also arrived. Pleased with D'Alroy's return, she forgave him his marriage to a commoner and agreed to accept her son's wife and the child without further regard for Esther's inferior social rank.

Highly pleased with his mother's change of heart and the splendid way in which Esther had cared for herself and the child during his absence, despite the many terrible difficulties she had faced, D'Alroy told Hawtree that Esther had proved caste of no importance. He said Esther had proved that a woman with brains could surmount a crude and vulgar background and make herself capable of being accepted by the highest classes of society.

In her own happiness Esther felt somewhat sorry for her sister, who was content to marry a tradesman. Polly thought, on the other hand, that she would be happier than Esther could possibly be.

CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA

Type of work: Story

Author: Giovanni Verga (1840-1922)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: Sicily

First published: 1880

Principal characters:

TURIDDU MACCA, a Sicilian peasant

LOLA, his former sweetheart

ALFIO, her husband

Critique:

Verga's stories of Sicilian peasant life are deeply moving in their realism and dramatic vigor. Best known of his shorter pieces is "Cavalleria Rusticana—Rustic Chivalry"—a story of swift passions, violence, and revenge, on which Pietro Mascagni based his famous opera of the same title. In all his work Verga revealed his sympathy for the ignorant and down-trodden poor, and sorrow for the humble and innocent wronged by the wise and the worldly. He was unsparing in his realism, however, in showing how the vulgar and greedy peasants destroyed others of the same class. His concise style and the disciplined feeling of his work mark him as one of the important fore-runners of contemporary Italian literature.

The Story:

When Turiddu Macca returned from soldiering, he swaggered like a hero through his tiny Sicilian village. Each Sunday he wore his rifleman's uniform and a red cap with a tassel that swung jauntily about his shoulders. In addition, he smoked a pipe with a figure of the king on horseback carved on the bowl. In short, he cut a dashing figure as he strutted about the town square, and the girls eyed him approvingly and longingly if they passed him on their way to or from mass. Small boys tagged at his heels and begged him to tell stories of the faraway places he had seen.

But Turiddu had eyes only for Lola, Master Angelo's daughter, who had given him her handkerchief and wept many tears when he went away to be a conscript. While he was away, however, she had been betrothed to Alfio, a young carter who had four mules in his stable. Turiddu was enraged when he heard the news on his return, and he swore that he would have revenge on the man who had stolen his sweetheart. Although he lingered day after day in the neighborhood of Master Angelo's house, Lola neither appeared on the balcony nor went to mass. Unable to speak to her, Turiddu had to content himself with singing derisive songs under her window. The neighbors began complaining instead of laughing after a while; they felt the time had come for him to end his caterwauling ways and earn money to support his widowed mother, Mistress Nunzia.

At last Turiddu came face to face with Lola as she was on her way home from church. She answered his reproaches by saying that she was soon to marry Alfio. Turiddu angrily declared that their friendship was at an end.

The first Sunday after her wedding Lola appeared on the balcony of her new home, her hands outspread against her dress so that the neighbors could see the gold rings that Alfio had given her. That show of wealth was an added insult to Turiddu, a peasant so poor that Mistress Nunzia had been forced to sell their vineyard while he was away.

In order to make Lola jealous, Turiddu went to work for Master Cola, the vine grower, whose house was directly across from Alfio's. Before long Turiddu was making pretty speeches to Santa, his master's unmarried daughter. When the girl asked him pertly why he did not keep his compliments for Lola, he told her that his former sweetheart was not even fit to carry Santa's shoes. And Santa was greatly pleased by his rustic gallantry, in spite of her father's disfavor. Every evening, after Master Cola had closed the door behind his young workman, Santa would show herself at her window and stand there talking with Turiddu until long after bedtime. Because the two houses stood so close together, Lola, loitering on her balcony night after night, overheard, as Turiddu intended, his protestations of love to Santa.

One day, unable to control herself any longer, Lola called down to ask her old lover why he no longer greeted her as a friend. At the time Alfio was away showing his mules at country fairs. Turiddu gave the watchful neighbors, especially Santa, much to talk about when he went to see Lola in secret during her husband's absence. Santa, jealous, closed her window in his face.

When Alfio came home, he brought Lola a new dress to wear on feast days. Santa, meeting him, scoffed at the fine gift. Lola, she said, had been seeing Turiddu Macca at night while her husband was away.

Now that Alfio was back, Turiddu no longer loitered near Lola's balcony. Disconsolate, he spent his days and nights carousing with his friends at the tavern. On Easter eve Alfio went to the inn, where Turiddu and his friends were feasting. When Alfio refused the wine offered him, Turiddu knew that they must fight. Solemnly the two men exchanged the kiss which was Alfio's challenge to a duel, and Turiddu bit the carter's ear as a sign that he would meet his rival in mortal combat.

They agreed to fight at sunrise in a thicket of prickly pears not far from the village.

That night Turiddu told his mother that he might be going on another long journey. Taking the old clasp knife which he had hidden under the straw when he went soldiering, he started off down the road before daybreak. Mistress Nunzia, who had risen early with the excuse of feeding her chickens, watched him go. Meanwhile Alfio had left Lola in tears, for she realized what her husband intended and that she was to blame.

The two arrived at the appointed meeting place at sunrise. Turiddu frankly admitted that he was in the wrong and deserved to die. He declared, however, that he intended to kill Alfio like a dog, in order to spare his mother more grief and tears. The carter threw off his coat and dared Turiddu to strike his hardest with his knife. Turiddu took the first thrust in his arm before he stabbed Alfio in the groin. The wounded carter told Turiddu to open his eyes wide so that he would be ready for the next blow. Then Alfio picked up a handful of dust and threw it into his rival's face. Blinded, Turiddu shouted and leaped backward. While he was groping for his enemy, Alfio stabbed him in the stomach and the throat.

Mortally wounded, Turiddu fell among the prickly pears. With blood gurgling from his throat, he died before he could call his mother's name.

CELESTINA

Author: Fernando de Rojas (1475?-1538?)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Fifteenth century

Locale: Spain, probably Toledo

First published: Burgos edition, 1499; Seville edition, 1502

Principal characters:

CALISTO, a young nobleman

MELIBEA, his beloved

PLEBERIO, her father

ALISA, her mother

CELESTINA, a procuress

ELICIA, and

AREUSA, girls in Celestina's house
SEMPRONIO, and PÁRMENO, Calisto's servants

Critique:

Although written in dramatic form, with conventional division into acts, this work is regarded as a novel in dialogue because its excessive length and frequently shifting scenes make performance impossible on any stage. In the 1499 version the story consisted of sixteen acts, increased to twenty-one in 1502, and at a considerably later date to twenty-two. Some doubt has been cast upon the authenticity of certain of these additions. Although the work was published anonymously, Rojas is generally accepted as the author, the chief evidence being an acrostic poem containing his name to which one of his early publishers first called attention, as well as several legal depositions made about 1525. The writer declared that he found the first act and amused himself by completing the story at the rate of an act a day during a two-week vacation at the University of Salamanca. His purpose, besides providing pleasant philosophy and instruction to young people, was to warn against the tricks of bawds and designing servants. Originally called The Comedy of Calisto and Melibea, the novel was rechristened with the name of its bawdy chief character, the old go-between, Celestina. In spite of its cynical realism and frank descriptions of life among prostitutes, Celestina is essentially the story of an idealistic and romantic love. Along with their coarse language, even the servants cite philosophy and quote the ancient philosophers. The book has appeared in many editions and a number of translations, including the first translation into English of any Spanish book, and it has had a tremendous influence upon all succeeding writing in Spain.

The Story:

One day, while pursuing his stray falcon, Calisto entered a strange garden where he saw and fell in love with a beautiful young girl named Melibea. His eagerness to take advantage of her gentle innocence shocked her and she angrily drove him away.

Calisto went home desolate and ready to die, his only comfort being the melancholy tunes he played on his lute. One of his servants, Sempronio, let him suffer for a time before he suggested that his master seek the aid of Celestina, a procuress, with whose servant, Elicia, Sempronio himself was in love. At Calisto's command the servant hurried to Celestina's house to summon the old bawd. He and the procuress agreed to work together to cheat lovesick Calisto. The young nobleman had another servant, Pármeno, who had once worked in Celestina's house. He told his master of the bawd's evil reputation throughout the city and warned him against her.

Ignoring the warning, Calisto welcomed Celestina and offered her gold to act as a go-between in his suit. While he was upstairs getting the money for her, Celestina tried to win Pármeno to her side by assuring him that she was interested in his welfare because of her fondness for his mother. She also promised to help him in winning the affections of Areusa, whom he coveted. Pármeno, knowing her tricks, was not entirely convinced.

Calisto, unable to control his impatience to make Melibea his own, sent Sempronio to hurry Celestina in her efforts. Refusing to consider Pármeno's suggestion that he court Melibea honorably instead of trusting a notorious go-between, he did, however, order his horse so that he could ride past her house. He rode away after further criticism of Pármeno for trying to cross his desires, harsh words which made the servant regret his decision to remain faithful to his young master.

house, he found her making a love charm. While she was busy, he and Elicia made love. Then Celestina, who had weighed the threat to her life from Melibea's father against the gold that grateful Calisto would pay her, went to talk to Melibea. Lucrecia, a servant in the household, saw the go-between coming and warned Melibea's mother against Celestina, but Alisa thought the woman no more than a vender of sewing materials, hair nets, and feminine make-up. Trustingly she asked Celestina to stay with Melibea while she herself went to visit a sick sister.

Celestina first told Melibea that she had come in behalf of a sick man. After purposely confusing the girl, she finally explained that all Calisto wanted was a rope belt that had been taken on pilgrimages to Rome and Jerusalem and a copy of a prayer by Saint Polonia, supposed to cure toothaches.

Ashamed of what she thought had been unjust suspicions of the old bawd, Melibea gave her the rope girdle and promised to copy off the charm so that it would be ready by the next day. Before she left the house Celestina won Lucrecia to her side by promising to sweeten the maid's breath and to make her a blonde. Going to Calisto's house, the procuress boasted of her success, and the grateful lover promised her a new cloak. By that time Pármeno had decided to accept Celestina's offer and help her in her scheme. He suggested that he accompany her home. On the way he demanded that she make arrangements to have him spend the night with Areusa. Celestina took him to her house, where Areusa was in bed, and persuaded the girl that Pármeno would comfort her during her sweetheart's absence.

The next day, while the servants were dining at Celestina's house, Lucrecia arrived with word that her mistress was ill and wished to see the procuress. The bawd went at once to Pleberio's house, where she discovered that Melibea's disease was lovesickness for Calisto. Celestina promised to cure the malady by having Calisto call at Melibea's door at midnight.

When she reported this latest development to Calisto, her news won his regard so completely that he gave her a gold chain. Having no intention of dividing it with her partners, she refused to agree when Sempronio and Pármeno demanded their share. While they quarreled, she screamed for the police. The servants silenced her forever, but her screams had been heard. Sempronio and Pármeno tried to escape through a window but were injured in the fall. The authorities beheaded them on the spot.

In the meantime Calisto had gone to Pleberio's house, where he found Melibea eagerly awaiting him. While the lovers talked through the door, his cowardly attendants, who were supposed to be guarding him, ran away from imaginary enemies. The confusion awoke her parents, but Melibea explained that Lucrecia had made the noise while she was getting a drink for her mistress.

The next morning Calisto awoke happy, only to be saddened by news of Sempronio's and Pármeno's fate. The thought of seeing his beloved in her garden that night was enough to make him forget what had happened, however, except for a fleeting thought that Celestina's bawdery was now punished.

With another servant to carry a ladder, he went that night to the garden and climbed over the wall. Melibea was waiting for him. When the time for parting came, hours later, she lamented the loss of her maidenhood. Calisto mourned only the shortness of their time together.

Grieved by the loss of their servant sweethearts, Elicia and Areusa were determined to revenge their deaths. By pretending to be in love with Sosia, another of Calisto's servants, Areusa learned that the lovers were meeting secretly each night in Pleberio's garden. Because he was eager for her favors, Sosia was willing to join in the plot. Neither he nor the girls were strong enough for violence, however, and so they played up to a scoundrelly soldier and murderer named Centurio. Elicia, who had taken over Celestina's house after the old bawd's death, had Areusa offer herself to Centurio if he would go into the garden and kill, or at least beat up, Calisto. At first the bully agreed, but prudent reconsideration convinced him that he would be unwise to meddle in the affair. Instead, he arranged to have several friends go to the garden and make a noisy but harmless commotion.

Pleberio and Alisa, meanwhile, talked over plans to marry off their daughter. Overhearing their conversation, and conscience-stricken because she had spent every night of the past month with Calisto, Melibea almost confessed her wrongdoing to her unsuspecting parents.

Once more Calisto went to the garden with his servant and ladder and made his way over the wall. A short time later Centurio's friends arrived and pretended to get into a fight with Sosia in the street outside. Calisto was aroused by the disturbance. In spite of Melibea's fears he started hastily over the wall in order to go to the aid of his servant.

He fell from the wall and was killed. Lucrecia, frightened by the vehemence of her mistress' sorrow, awoke Pleberio and Alisa. Melibea, meanwhile, had climbed to the roof of the house. There she reflected upon the effect her actions would have on her parents. Her resolve to die unweakened by their pleadings, she compared herself to many parricides of antiquity, confessed her misdeeds, and bade them farewell. Then she leaped to her death. Pleberio carried her shattered body into the house, where he and Alisa sat alone in their grief.

CÉSAR BIROTTEAU

Author: Honoré de Balzac (1799-1850)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1837

Principal characters:

CÉSAR BIROTTEAU, a perfumer

CONSTANCE, his wife

CÉSARINE, their daughter

ANSELM POPINOT, assistant in the perfumery

FERDINAND DU TILLET, a discharged assistant

PILLERAULT, Constance's uncle

Critique:

Opinion has always differed greatly as to the place of The Rise and Fall of César Birotteau among Balzac's novels. As with much of his work, the action is frequently slowed by long retrospective accounts of the past, and the preoccupation with the legal details of bankruptcy has proved boring to many readers. Some of the main characters, shown by their creator in a flat light, tend to represent types rather than to become real people. But at the same time the novel is marked by scenes of inspired writing. César in the end is an honorable man, and we have a good deal of sympathy for his trials.

The Story:

César Birotteau was a strong peasant lad employed by Ragon in his perfumery. He ran errands, cleaned and nailed boxes, and submitted to the gibes and impositions of the other employees. Often he was tired out after the day's work, but his strong constitution and peasant stubbornness made him persist in learning his trade. His life was a little easier after Ursule, the Picard cook, began to look after his needs.

César, influenced by Ragon and his wife, became a Royalist. As a member of the guard he fought in some of the street skirmishes against Napoleon. When he was wounded in the thigh, rumor said that Bonaparte himself had fired the shot. This wound was César's claim to distinction; he never wearied of telling the tale of his military exploits.

César was twenty years old when he met Constance Pillerault, a shopgirl in a nearby store. By patient attendance and much admiration César won her hand with the approval of her uncle and guardian, a well-to-do ironmonger. His own modest savings and her dowry enabled him to buy a controlling interest in the perfumery. By the time he was twenty-one the peasant boy possessed a wife and a business, and when his daughter Césarine was born he counted himself a happy man.

In spite of his rather narrow outlook, César was an honest businessman who treated his employees well. Only once did he have any trouble. Du Tillet, his chief assistant, tried to seduce Constance and then stole three thousand francs. César himself made up the loss and discharged du Tillet. Although he tried to temper justice with kindness, he made a deadly enemy in du Tillet.

Working with Vauquelin, a chemist, César discovered a new bleaching agent and began to market his discovery both as a paste and as a lotion. By judicious advertisements of his perfumes and cosmetics he began to prosper. With increasing sales and with Constance to guard the cash register, César soon had the reputation of being a rich man. Anselm Popinot, his new assistant to replace du Tillet, was lame, but he was a hard worker and much attracted to Césarine.

Again by chance César learned that hazel oil had been used by the ancients in dressing the hair, and Vauquelin assured him that the oil was harmless as long as it was applied to the scalp. César saw in his new discovery an opportunity to increase his sales further. He set up a new company, with Popinot in charge, to extract the oil from hazelnuts and to enter the oil in competition with the Macassar hair-dressing popular at the time. Because of Popinot's shrewdness and industry, and his willingness to stint himself for his employer, the new company prospered.

After the Restoration, César was made a deputy-mayor; from that time on he thought of himself as a public figure. His self-esteem grew even greater when he was decorated with the Legion of Honor. To celebrate these honors he decided to remodel his house and give a grand ball. Constance was opposed to the great expense. She had vague premonitions of disaster from César's dreams of magnificence, but she finally allowed her husband to go ahead with his plans. The ball was a great social success and César thought little of the cost as he listened to the compliments of his guests. He was too puffed up with his own importance to realize that most of the government officials and minor nobility were laughing at him behind his back.

The ball marked the end of his rise to wealth. Du Tillet, meanwhile, looked for a way to get even with his former employer. Since his discharge he had become a shady financier and had acquired a reputation for moneymaking. Although no one suspected it, the money had come from the Roguins. Roguin, the notary, and his wife had been estranged for some time, and the foolish husband had become infatuated with a famous courtesan, La Belle Hollandaise. By making love to both the wife and the courtesan, du Tillet got funds from each, money originally earned by Roguin.

Du Tillet set up Claparon, a dissolute drummer, as a dummy banker and began to work out his plot. Against the advice of his wife, César was induced to join Roguin and Ragon in a land speculation venture, but the money paid to Claparon eventually reached the pockets of du Tillet. Un fortunately César got no receipt for the three hundred thousand francs he turned over to Roguin for investment in the scheme.

Because the ball and the remodeling had cost César more than he had expected, he was hard pressed to meet his bills. Then Roguin absconded with part of the money which was supposed to have been invested in the land speculation. It was the final blow to César's financial standing. He began a dreary round of bankers and money-lenders, but no one would lend him money. Du Tillet hypocritically pretended sympathy for his plight and gave him a letter of recommendation to a famous banker. But he signed his name in such a way that the banker knew that the recommendation meant nothing. Du Tillet, meanwhile, had bought cheaply César's holdings in the land speculation.

At last César was forced to accept the inevitable. He told the whole story to his wife and began to go through the proceedings of bankruptcy under the guiding hand of old Pillerault. He gave up all his assets, even his two watches, and his wife surrendered her jewelry. When the long process was over, the creditors were happy to realize sixty cents on the dollar. His disgrace was not as great as du Tillet had hoped it would be, but as long as he morally owed money César refused to wear the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor.

He got a position in the government and lived with Pillerault. All his salary went to pay back the remaining forty percent of his debts. Constance went to work as a bookkeeper with Popinot, whose business was prospering. Césarine found a job with a draper. The two women also saved their salaries to pay off the debts.

Popinot and Césarine had spoken of their love, but César would not agree to a wedding until he had repaid all he owed. Popinot worked all the harder to increase his profits, for César was still a silent partner in the hazel oil concern.

At last came the day when César was completely free of all financial obligations. It was a proud day for him. The news got to the king, who was much affected by César's honesty. He gave the former perfumer six thousand francs from the royal purse as a mark of favor.

Célestin, one of César's old assistants, was now running the perfumery. He had kept the Birotteau's apartment intact, and Constance was secretly arranging to move her family back into their old rooms. Also in secret the banns for Popinot's and Césarine's wedding had been published. When the whole legal tangle was straightened out and César had been readmitted to full citizenship, Pillerault went with him to the Exchange. There César was congratulated on every hand as a really honest man. Du Tillet was forced to stand by and hear fulsome praise for the old enemy he had helped to ruin.

Old Pillerault then took César back to his old home. There they found a ball in progress. Constance and Césarine were welcoming the same guests they had invited so long ago.

The shock was too much for César. As he was cordially greeted by the distinguished guests, his mouth filled with blood and he collapsed. Constance called for the doctor and the priest, but already a film was covering her husband's eyes. Constance pillowed his head on her breast while the priest held his hand. A blood vessel in his lungs had burst and the aneurism stopped his breath. So died a commercial martyr.

Critique:

The Cherry Orchard is Chekhov's best-known play. In this work his characters are not tragic in the usual sense of the word because they are incapable of any great heroic action. But for what they are he sees them clearly and sees them whole, in their frustrations, jealousies, and loves. In addition to his subtle characterizations, he has caught in Madame Ranevskaya's household a picture of the end of an era, the passing of the semi-feudal existence of Russian landowners on their country estates.

The Story:

When Madame Ranevskaya's little son, Grisha, was drowned only a year after the death of her husband, her grief was so overwhelming that she was forced to go to Paris in order to forget, and she remained away for five years. The Easter before her return to her estate in Russia, she sent for her seventeen-year-old daughter Anya to join her. To pay the expenses of her trip and that of her daughter, Madame Ranevskaya had been forced to sell her villa at Mentone, and she had nothing left. She returned home to find that her whole estate, including a cherry orchard, so famous that it was mentioned in the Encyclopedia, was to be sold at auction to pay her debts. Madame Ranevskaya was heartbroken, but her old friend Lopakhin, a merchant whose father had once been a serf on her ancestral estate, proposed a way out. He said that if the cherry orchard were cut down and the land divided into lots for rental to summer cottagers, she would be able to realize an income of at least twenty-five thousand roubles a year.

Madame Ranevskaya could not endure the thought that her childhood home with all its memories should be subjected to such a fate, and all the members of her family agreed with her. Her brother Gaev, who had remained behind to manage the estate, was convinced that there must be some other way out, but none of his ideas seemed feasible at the moment. It would be fine, he thought, if they all came in for a legacy, or if Anya could be wed to a rich man, or if their wealthy aunt could be persuaded to come to their aid. But the aunt did not entirely approve of Madame Ranevskaya, who, she felt, had married beneath her.

The thought that Gaev himself might do something never occurred to him; he went on playing billiards and munching candy as he had done all his life. Others who made up the household had similar futile dreams. Varya, an adopted daughter, hoped that God might do something about the situation. Pischin, a neighboring landowner, who had been saved financially when the railroad bought a part of his property, advised a policy of waiting for something to turn up.

Lopakhin, who had struggled hard to attain his present position, was frankly puzzled at the family's stubborn attitude. He had no illusions about himself; in fact, he realized that, compared with these smooth-tongued and well-mannered aristocrats, he was still only a peasant. He had tried to improve himself intellectually, but he fell asleep over the books with which he was supposed to be familiar.

As he gazed at the old cherry orchard in the moonlight, the cherry orchard which seemed so beautiful to Madame Ranevskaya, he could not help thinking of his peasant ancestors, to whom every tree must have been a symbol of oppression. Trofimov, who had been little Grischa's tutor, and who was more expressive than Lopakhin, tried to express this thought to Anya, with whom he was in love.

The cherry orchard was put up at auction. That evening Madame Ranevskaya gave a ball in the old house, an act in keeping with the unrealistic attitude of her class in general. Even her aged servant, Fiers, supported her in this view by his loyalty to her and her brother. Lopakhin arrived at the party with the news that he had bought the estate for ninety thousand roubles above the mortgage. When he announced that he intended to cut down the orchard, Madame Ranevskaya began to weep. She planned to return to Paris.

Others were equally affected by the sale of the cherry orchard. Gaev, on the basis of the transaction with Lopakhin, was offered a position in the bank at six thousand roubles a year, a position he would not keep because of his laziness. Madame Ranevskaya's servant, Yasha, was delighted over the sale because the trip to Paris would mean for him an escape from the boredom of Russian life. But for Dunyasha, her maid, the sale meant the collapse of her hopes of ever marrying Yasha, and a lifelong bondage to Yephodov, a poor, ineffectual clerk. To Varya, Madame Ranevskaya's adopted daughter, it meant a position as housekeeper on a nearby estate. To the landowner, Pischin, it was the confirmation of his philosophy. Investigators had found valuable minerals on his land, and he was now able to pay his debt to Madame Ranevskaya and to look forward to another temporary period of affluence. Fiers alone was unaffected. Departure of the family was the end of this old servant's life, for whatever it had been worth, but he was more concerned because Gaev, his master, had worn his light overcoat instead of a fur coat when he escorted the mistress, Madame Ranevskaya, to the station.

CHILDREN OF THE GHETTO

Type of work: Novel

Type of plot: Ethnocentric realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: London

First published: 1892

Principal characters:

HANNAH JACOBS, a beautiful young Jewess

REB SHEMUEL JACOBS, her father, a rabbi

DAVID BRANDON, in love with Hannah

MELCHITSEKEK PINCHAS, a poor poet and scholar

RAPHAEL LEON, a young journalist

THE REVEREND JOSEPH STRELITSKI, minister of a fashionable synagogue

DEBBY, a seamstress

Critique:

Children of the Ghetto, A Study of a Peculiar People is a story of the Jews of London, a novel which at the time of its publication uncovered a new vein of English fiction. The ghetto, as here presented, was a separate community continually struggling with the influx of destitute Poles, and the fierce, surging life within—a life both comic and tragic—was regulated by the canons of strict orthodoxy. In one sense this work is not a novel. There is no central plot, only a series of loosely grouped episodes, and the numerous characters are only vaguely connected in many instances. Although Zangwill wrote from a parochial point of view, the book is valuable for its descriptions of seething life, its study of racial strivings and discontents, and its warm, sympathetic character sketches.

The Story:

Moses Ansell accepted poverty as the natural condition of the chosen people. A pious man, he observed all the rituals of his religion, but even his meek wife, before she died, realized that he should have spent less time in prayer and more time working. His family consisted of Esther, a serious young girl, two smaller sons, a little daughter, and their complaining grandmother. The Ansell's lived in one room in the ghetto. When the mother died, Benjamin, an older son, had been put in an orphanage.

One night Esther returned from the soup kitchen with a pitcher of soup and two loaves of bread. At the doorway of their room she fell and the soup spilled. The hungry family snatched at the bread. Becky Belcovitch, from the floor below, came to complain that the soup had leaked through the ceiling. When the Belcovitches heard what had happened, they sent up their own rations to the Ansell's.

Malka Birnbaum was the cousin of Moses' dead wife. Occasionally, when the Ansell's grew too hungry, she would give Moses a few shillings and berate him for his pious ineptitude. Malka had two daughters, Milly and Leah, by her first husband. Milly was married. Leah had become engaged to Sam Levine, a commercial traveler.

At the feast of redemption for Milly's infant son, Sam pretended that he had forgotten to give Leah a present. He took from his pocket an expensive ring and held it up for all to admire. Playfully he slipped it on the finger of Hannah Jacobs, the beautiful daughter of Reb Shemuel, while he repeated the words he had memorized for his marriage to Leah. The horrified company realized at once what Sam was too secular to understand; he and Hannah were married according to the law. Hannah and Sam arranged for the ritualistic formality of a divorce after his next trip.

As compensation, Sam and Leah took Hannah to the Purim ball. There Hannah was greatly taken with David Brandon, a young South African immigrant who no longer observed orthodox practices. Hannah already had an earnest suitor, an impoverished poet and scholar named Pinchas. Although Reb Shemuel listened favorably to his bid for Hannah's hand, the indulgent rabbi refused to force his daughter to marry anyone she did not love.

Sugarman, the marriage broker, had a daughter, Bessie, who was in love with Daniel Hyams, but there was no talk of marriage because Daniel supported his aged parents. When the father saw that Daniel remained unmarried because he could not keep up two households, the old man pretended to receive word from a brother in America. With borrowed money the two old people took steerage passage for New York.

Sugarman, seeing that Becky Belcovitch was of an age to marry, thought he could arrange a match with Shosshi Shmendrik, a street hawker. Bear Belcovitch, her father, gave his consent. Becky, having other ideas, tried never to be at home when Shosshi came courting.

One day Shosshi stationed his barrow in front of Widow Finkelstein's store. Because he started to leave without paying his sixpence rent, the determined widow harangued him in the street and continued the argument at his house. When she admitted to owning two hundred and seventeen golden sovereigns as well as her shop, Shosshi fell in love with her. Their marriage was a great success.

The disconsolate Pinchas met Wolf, a Jewish labor leader. When starving sweatshop workers struck for higher wages, Pinchas persuaded Wolf to let him address the strikers. In a speech filled with Messianic delusions, he asked them to support his candidacy for Parliament. In disgust the workers threw him out.

Occasionally Benjamin Ansell came to see his family, but he did not get on well with them. Only Esther, who had dared to look into a New Testament, sympathized with him. Word came from his school that the boy had pneumonia. In his dying delirium Benjamin spoke only Yiddish, and Moses, sitting by his bedside, rejoiced that his son died a real Jew.

When Hannah and David planned to marry, Reb Shemuel was apprehensive of her suitor's orthodoxy. David assured the rabbi that his family was orthodox and that he himself was a cohen, a priest. But Reb Shemuel declared they could never marry. Hannah had been divorced, and the law forbade a cohen to take a divorced woman. Hannah and David planned to run away to America. But after she had accompanied her father to the Seder services, Hannah realized the old ways were too strong for her to break. Heartbroken, she renounced David forever.

Ten years later wealthy Mrs. Henry Goldsmith entertained at a Chanukah dinner. Most of the guests were artists and intellectuals who had drifted away from the strict practices of Old Jewry. Among them was Raphael Leon, a young journalist. One topic of conversation was Mordecai Josephs, a new novel scandalous to West End Judaism, written by an unknown author named Edward Armitage. Sidney Graham, a young dilettante, praised the novel but criticized the crudity and immaturity of the writer. Raphael noticed that a shy, dark girl followed the conversation closely but said nothing.

The girl was Esther Ansell. Mrs. Goldsmith, after packing old Moses and the rest of his brood off to America, had adopted Esther and educated her. A graduate of London University, Esther was trying to decide upon a career. Unknown to all, she was Edward Armitage, the author of Mordecai Josephs.

Raphael's interest in her continued after he became editor of a Jewish paper, The Flag of Judah, financed by Mr. Goldsmith. Pinchas, the neglected poet, aspired to become a contributor. Raphael, unwilling to compromise between his principles and the wishes of his sponsor, was unhappy in his work.

At the theater Esther encountered Leonard James, the snobbish, vulgar brother of Hannah Jacobs. A short time later Leonard went to see Esther. They quarreled and he reminded her that her family had always been Schnorrers, beggars. Esther, feeling that he might be right, decided to abuse the generosity of the Goldsmiths no longer. When Raphael called, she told him her decision and announced that she was Edward Armitage.

Dissatisfied with himself, Raphael had an interview with the Reverend Joseph Strelitski, a fashionable minister who was, like Esther, of humble origins. Regarding himself as a hypocrite, a slave to wealth and outmoded ritual, Strelitski intended to resign his pastorate and go to America. Encouraged by his and Esther's examples, Raphael felt relieved when Mr. Goldsmith fired him and made Pinchas editor of the paper.

Esther, meanwhile, had returned to the ghetto to stay with Debby, a seamstress she had known years before. Surrounded by friends of her childhood, she felt herself drawn by family ties; she would go to America. She was glad when her publisher told her that her novel promised to be a success, for she would not go to her family empty-handed. On a ship loaded with Jewish emigrants she and Strelitski sailed for America. But there was no deep sadness in the parting when Esther said goodbye to Raphael. He would come to her later.

CHITA

Author: Lafcadio Hearn (1850-1904)

Type of plot: Exotic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Louisiana coastal waters

First published: 1889

Principal characters:

FELIU VIOSCA, a fisherman

CARMEN VIOSCA, his wife

CHITA, a foundling

DR. JULIEN LA BRIERRE, her father

Critique:

Hearn's method of telling a story, his purpose, and his literary style are always distinctive. The style is always abrupt, an almost disdainful attitude on the part of the writer, as if he scorned any communication between himself and the reader. Chita: A Memory of Last Island is more, however, than a straight narrative. It is both poetry and story, for grained into the plot development is the exotic and dramatic description of the islands of the Louisiana coast and of a devastating hurricane that occurred there in the middle of the nineteenth century.

The Story:

Southward from New Orleans one passes settlements of many nationalities and races, Western and Oriental. Beyond lies an archipelago, the islands of which are Grande Pass, Grande Terre, and Barataria. Still to the south lies Grande Isle, a modern bathing resort, the loveliest island in the Gulf of Mexico. Last Island, forty miles west of Grande Isle, is now desolate, but at an earlier time it was the most popular of the group and a fashionable resort. The hotel there was a two-story timber structure with many apartments, a dining-room, and a ballroom. One night the sea destroyed it.

On the northwest side of each island are signs of the incessant influence of the wind and sea, for the trees all bend away from the water. All along the Gulf coast, and on the island beaches, are the ruins of hurricanes, skeletons of toppled buildings and broken tree trunks. The land itself is being eaten away.

The innocent beauty of summer on these islands is impossible to express. Years ago Last Island was immersed in the azure light of a typical July. It was an unusually lovely summer and the breathless charm of the season lingered on. One afternoon the ocean began to stir and great waves started to hurl themselves over the beaches, giving warning on Last Island that a hurricane was brewing. The wind, beginning to blow, continued for a few days to stir the water. A steamer, the Star, due that day, was not expected to arrive.

Captain Abraham Smith, an American, knew the sea and he knew his ship. Sensing that he might be needed, he had sailed for Last Island. As he approached he saw the storm rising. He ordered the excess weight of the Star tossed overboard to help her ride out the storm. On the island, however, the guests at the hotel continued to dance until they noticed water at their feet and the building began to be buffeted by the waves. Captain Smith spent the night rescuing as many as he could. Buildings were ripped apart, the shores were lashed by wind and wave, lakes and rivers overflowed, and by daybreak countless corpses floated on the stormy sea.

When the hurricane subsided, scavengers came to claim whatever plunder could be salvaged from the ruins and from the bodies of the dead.

On a tiny volcanic island lived Feliu Viosca, a fisherman, and his wife Carmen. On the night of the terrible storm Carmen was awakened by the noise. Afraid, she aroused her husband, whose calmness comforted her, and he ordered her to return to sleep. In her dreams her dead child, dark-eyed Conchita, came to her.

The next day the fishermen, gathered at the shore, stood watching the wreckage and the bodies floating past. A flash of yellow caught Feliu's eye. In a moment he had stripped and was swimming out toward a child, still alive, clinging to her drowned mother. Feliu managed to rescue the baby and swim back to shore.

The half-drowned child was taken to Carmen, whose skillful hands and maternal instincts nursed the little girl into a warm, sound sleep; there was hope she would survive. Her yellow hair had saved her, for it was the flash of sun on her tresses that had caught Feliu's eye.

Captain Harris, of New Orleans, along with several other men, was sailing up and down the coast in search of missing persons, dead or still alive after the storm. Ten days after the rescue of the girl, Harris came to Viosca's wharf. Hardly able to communicate with the men, Feliu told them the story of his heroism, but cautioned them that if they wished to question the child they must proceed gently, since she was still not fully recovered from shock.

The child's Creole dialect was not comprehensible to anyone there until Laroussel, a Creole, began to question her. In her broken speech she told him that her Creole name was Zouzoune, her real one Lili. Her mother was called Adele and her father Julien. Nothing more could be determined. Realizing that the child's relatives might never be found, Harris decided to leave her with Feliu and Carmen, who promised to give her excellent care. Laroussel gave the little girl a trinket that had caught her eye. Although other searching parties stopped to see Feliu's waif, the child's identity remained a mystery. Meanwhile, near another island, a pair of bodies drifting in the sea had been identified as those of Dr. Julien La Brierre and his wife Adele. The doctor had survived, however; six months later he was in New Orleans looking at his own epitaph and that of his wife.

Dr. La Brierre had grown up in New Orleans. In maturity, to please his father, he had studied medicine in Paris. After his return to New Orleans he had fallen in love and had been wounded in a duel with a rival named Laroussel. Following the death of his father and mother, Julien had married Adele, and Zouzoune was born.

On the lonely island the small child, now called Chita, had become a member of the Viosca family. Gradually she adapted herself to the ways of her foster parents.

Years later Dr. La Brierre was practicing in New Orleans, a lonely and kindly physician. One year Edwards, an elderly patient of his, went to Viosca's Point, which Captain Harris had recommended for the sick man's recovery. While there, Edwards suffered a stroke. Hurriedly summoned, Dr. La Brierre arrived too late to help his patient.

Before the doctor could set out for home, he too became ill. Carmen nursed him. In the vague consciousness that accompanied his malady, the doctor saw Chita, whose resemblance to his dead wife greatly excited him. In his delirium he called out to Zouzoune, to Adele, while Carmen tried to calm him.

Reliving the horror of the hurricane that had taken Adele and Zouzoune from him, the sick man died.

THE CHOUANS

Author: Honoré de Balzac (1799-1850)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: 1799

Locale: Brittany

First published: 1829

Principal characters:

MARIE DE VERNEUIL, natural daughter of a duke

THE MARQUIS DE MONTAURAN, leader of the Chouans

MARCHE-À-TERRE, a Chouan

FRANCINE, Marie's maid

CORENTIN, agent of the Republic

MADAME DU GUA SAINT-CYR, a royalist in love with Montauran

HULOT, soldier of the Republic

Critique:

The Chouans was the first of Balzac's novels to gain recognition. It shows much unevenness in structure and the characters are but shallowly motivated; the action scenes, however, are well written. An obscure chapter in French history comes to life in this imitation of Scott's historical novels. Although few readers of Balzac are likely to place The Chouans high among his works, the author himself had the novel reprinted as part of The Human Comedy to represent "Scenes of Military Life." As such, it has a definite place in Balzac's work, aside from the picture presented of the struggles of the young Republic.

The Story:

The French Republic, in the years after the Revolution, had many enemies. Abroad, the remaining monarchies watched with cold disapproval the new government; at home, the survivors of the old aristocratic regime intrigued with all the dissident groups at odds with the central government in Paris. In Brittany peasants and smugglers, who came to be called Chouans, finally joined the aristocrats in guerrilla warfare against the Republic.

To put down the outbreak, Hulot, who commanded the Republican garrison at Mayenne, was on his way from Fougères with his conscripted Bretons. He was uneasy, for the Chouans were active and they would make every effort to rescue their comrades. When the Chouans did attack, he was partly prepared. Although the conscripts all got away, Hulot's vigorous defense got his Republican troops safely back to Mayenne. A short time later Hulot was ordered to escort the mail coach from Mayenne to Montagne. Passengers in the coach were Marie de Verneuil and her pretty maid Francine, who had become objects of great curiosity when they stopped at the inn in Mayenne. With them was a third traveler, Monsieur Corentin, a small, secretive man whom Hulot suspected of being a secret agent for the Republic. At Alençon the two women accepted an invitation to breakfast with Madame du Gua and her supposed son, the Citizen du Gua Saint-Cyr. Marche-à-Terre, a Chouan skulking nearby in his rebel uniform of goatskin, observed the party with distrust and sent to Madame du Gua a message warning her to beware of Marie, whom he suspected of being a Republican spy.

Hulot was also uneasy. He was sure that Madame du Gua's son was really the Marquis de Montauran, called Gars, the fiery leader of the Chouans. At last he forced his way into the dining-room to question the man. Marie, attracted to the handsome young man, came to his aid by producing a paper, countersigned by the Paris ministry, which notified all local authorities to obey the bearer. Ordered to retire, the old soldier was furious at having to obey a woman. A loyal Republican, however, he let the son go and announced his intention to resign his commission.

Since all were bound for Fougères, the next day Madame du Gua and her son set out in a carriage with Marie and Francine. Marie's letter had procured them an escort of soldiers to guard them through the dangerous Chouan territory. Once while they were ascending a long hill, Marie and the son walked up behind the coach. Their bearing was almost lover-like, and Madame du Gua seemed strangely jealous for a mother. Marie had little success in learning who the son really was. She in her turn was reticent about her own past.

The Chouans under an aristocratic leader ambushed the coach but were driven off by the Republican guard. The Chouan chief took the opportunity to whisper a warning against Marie to young du Gua.

After the excitement Madame du Gua announced that they were close to the family estate at Vivetière, and she and her son invited their companions to spend the night at the chateau. When the son promised safety for Marie and Francine and supper for the guards, the whole party went to the castle. Once inside, Marie saw that the hall was filled with insurgents who had come to lay plans for continuing the war against the Republic. Marie then realized that Madame du Gua's supposed son was in reality the Marquis de Montauran, the famous Gars. She knew also that she had fallen in love with the handsome rebel.

In spite of Montauran's promise of safe conduct, the jealous Madame du Gua ordered an attack on the Republican guard. Under the fierce Marche-à-Terre the Chouans massacred the guards and took Marie and Francine prisoner. Marche-à-Terre, however, saved Francine, whom he recognized as his former sweetheart. He was also able to rescue Marie, after Madame du Gua had turned the girl over to the smugglers, and the two women were returned to Fougères in the coach.

In Fougères, Corentin rented a house for Marie and installed her as a great lady. She was tormented by her memories of Montauran and wondered if he really loved her. While walking near the city limits, she saw Madame du Gua and Montauran with a band of skulking Chouans. When Madame du Gua tried to kill Marie with a rifle shot, while Montauran looked on, Marie's love for him turned to hatred and a desire for revenge.

Marie tucked a jeweled dagger in her bodice and set out to kill Montauran. During her search she ran from some roving Chouans and took refuge in a cellar. In an abandoned scullery she found Marche-à-Terre and his band torturing a miser to get his gold. After helping the miser to escape, she was told of a nearby sanctuary, the cottage of Galpe-Chopine, who worked both for the Republicans and the Chouans. Galpe-Chopine's wife Barquette helped Marie to return to Fougères.

When Marie learned that the Chouans planned to give a ball, she resolved to attend. She induced Galpe-Chopine to guide her to St. James, where the aristocrats were gathering. By her great beauty Marie attracted the admiration of all the men, and when she told that she was the daughter of the Duke de Verneuil she removed the smirch on her reputation. Montauran, fascinated anew, escorted her from the ball.

Marie told Montauran her true story. Although she was only the natural daughter of the duke, she had been recognized by him. Unprovided for after his death, she had accepted the guardianship of a seventy-year-old friend of her father. Then, to her horror, she was accused of being the old man's mistress. After two years of adventures she became the wife of Danton. When he died she entered the service of the Republic. Her present mission was to win the love of Montauran and betray him to the government. Montauran, even after hearing her story could not restrain his love for her.

In Fougères, Corentin, now revealed as an agent of the Republic, determined to use Marie as a lure to draw Montauran to his death. The lovers finally decided to get married and flee the intrigues of France. A priest was procured and a small altar was set up in Marie's drawing-room. Then Marie sent word through Barquette to Montauran. Under cover of dense fog Montauran slipped into Fougères and the marriage ceremony was solemnized. But Corentin, who had been on the lookout, warned Hulot, commander of the Republican garrison, that the rebel leader could be captured easily. Hulot stationed a heavy guard around Marie's house, but because of the fog he could not be sure that Montauran was actually in the drawing-room.

In the morning Marie, seeing the guard, roused her husband. Montauran, in Chouan clothes, attempted to escape over the wall but was shot and captured. Marie, meanwhile, had put on Montauran's dress uniform and had gone out the street door. She too was shot down. The lovers, carried to the barracks, died there.

Disgusted with spies and intrigues, Hulot drove Corentin out of town.

Author: Alfred Victor de Vigny (1797-1863)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: France

First published: 1826

Principal characters:

HENRI D'EFFIAT, Marquis of Cinq-Mars and a conspirator against Richelieu

CARDINAL RICHELIEU, Minister of State

LOUIS XIII, King of France

ANNE OF AUSTRIA, Queen of France

MARIE DE GONZAGA, beloved of Henri Cinq-Mars

FRANÇOIS AUGUST DE THOU, fellow conspirator with Cinq-Mars

Critique:

Alfred de Vigny, poet and novelist, began this novel while he was still a lieutenant in the French army, before he settled down, after leaving military service, to make art, rather than war, his profession. However, the novel was not Vigny's only important contribution to French literature; he is also highly regarded for his poetry, much of which is written on themes of Christian religious tradition. His novel he based on true incidents in the history of the reign of King Louis XIII, and the novel parallels fact in the story of the conspiracy in which Cinq-Mars was involved. The characterization of Richelieu is an outstanding feature of the book. In this respect Vigny's writing differs from that of many twentieth-century historical novelists, most of whom hang a purely fictitious set of characters and a fictitious plot on the merest thread of historical background, bringing in, briefly, an actual person to give some semblance of reality to the story. Cinq-Mars has been called the first French historical novel.

The Story:

One June day in 1639, at the chateau of Chaumont in Touraine, young Henri d'Effiat, Marquis of Cinq-Mars, took leave of his family and set out, at the request of Cardinal Richelieu, Louis XIII's chief minister, to join the king's forces at the siege of Perpignan. Shortly after he left, a guest of his mother's, the Marshal Basompierre, was placed under arrest at Richelieu's order, and sent in chains toward Paris and the Bastille. Young Cinq-Mars tried to release the marshal, but the haughty old soldier refused to be rescued. As if his flouting of the king's officers were not enough for a day, Cinq-Mars returned under cover of night to the chateau to bid goodbye again to Marie de Gonzaga, the beautiful Duchess of Mantua, who was staying with Cinq-Mars' mother at the chateau. He returned to bid her farewell again because the two, despite the differences of their stations, were very much in love.

Finally leaving Chaumont, Cinq-Mars, accompanied by a few servants, set out for Loudun. Upon his arrival, he found the town in a turmoil because a local clergyman, a monk named Urbain Grandier, was under trial as a magician. Charges against the monk had been made by order of Richelieu, who wished to do away with the independent cleric. The Abbé Quillet, Cinq-Mars' former tutor, had taken the clergyman's part and was just about to leave Loudun in secret, fearful for his own life. At the execution of Grandier, Cinq-Mars discovered that the man's assassins, for they were but that, had given him a red-hot cross to kiss. Seizing the cross, Cinq-Mars struck the judge's face with it, thus earning the enmity of one of Richelieu's most trusted agents.

After the execution Cinq-Mars hastened on his way to Perpignan. In the meantime, however, Cardinal Richelieu was making plans to use Cinq-Mars as a tool in undermining the authority of the king. The report of his agents about Cinq-Mars' actions with regard to the king's officers and Richelieu's agents made no difference to the cardinal, who felt he could shape the young man to his own ends.

Shortly after his arrival at Perpignan, Cinq-Mars was asked to join in a duel between a monarchist sympathizer and a cardinalist sympathizer, and on the monarchist's side. Immediately after the duel he found himself in the thick of an attack on the walls of the besieged city, along with the members of the king's own guard. He behaved so valiantly in the struggle that the captain of the guard introduced Cinq-Mars to the king, much to the disgust of Cardinal Richelieu, who himself had planned to introduce Cinq-Mars to the monarch.

The king took an immediate liking to Cinq-Mars, who had suffered a wound in the battle, and he made the young man an officer in the royal guards. During the battle Cinq-Mars had befriended the son of the judge whom he had struck with the cross at Loudun, and thereby he made a new friend, for the son was a bitter enemy of his father and hated all that his father and Richelieu stood for. At Perpignan, Cinq-Mars also renewed a friendship with a young aristocrat named de Thou, who was later to stand as close to him as a brother.

Two years passed. At the end of that time Cinq-Mars had become the confidant of Louis XIII, an important officer in the court, and the open and avowed enemy of Richelieu. He hated the minister of state for what Richelieu was doing to France, but more important was the fact that Cinq-Mars was ambitious to win for himself honors and posts that might allow him to marry Marie de Gonzaga, who was being prepared against her will to become the Queen of Poland.

To accomplish his ends, Cinq-Mars had earned more and more of the king's confidence and had improved his influence with the nobility and the army. He also had gained the support of the Duke de Bouillon, who had been estranged from the king by Richelieu. De Bouillon was a strong support, for he had an army of his own in southern France. Cinq-Mars also gained the support of Gaston d'Orleans, the king's brother and another of Richelieu's enemies, and of Anne of Austria, the queen, who wished to protect her children, including the future Louis XIV, from the hatred and ambitions of Richelieu. The success of the plan to depose the minister lay in gaining the king's support for the plan and in securing aid from Spain. Cinq-Mars and his fellow conspirators were forced to deal with Spain on their own initiative, for neither King Louis nor his queen could assume responsibility for bringing Spanish troops into France. In addition, Louis XIII had for so long been under the influence of Cardinal Richelieu and his agents that he had little mind of his own and knew almost nothing of the problems, great and small, which daily beset those who guided the kingdom of France in those turbulent years of the 1640's.

Cinq-Mars, taking his chances, signed a treaty with Spain and sent a copy, concealed in a hollow staff, with a trusted messenger to Spain. Then he approached the king and secured the royal permission to revolt against Richelieu, after convincing the king that the revolt was not against the crown. Immediately afterward, as he was leaving the monarch's apartments, Cinq-Mars realized that an agent of the cardinal was on his way to seek an audience with King Louis. All Cinq-Mars could do was hope that the king would hold to the promise he had given the conspirators.

In order to insure his union with Marie de Gonzaga, Cinq-Mars had the duchess and himself affianced by a clergyman, an act which at that time was the equivalent of legal marriage. But in so doing Cinq-Mars revealed all his plans to the girl in the presence of the priest. Soon afterward he learned that the priest was not his own agent but a spy of Richelieu. Realizing that his plans were endangered, Cinq-Mars immediately went to Perpignan, which was to be the scene of the revolt.

Richelieu had all the time known what was afoot and had made his own plans. Having won over the armies, he knew he had nothing to fear in that quarter. He had also arranged that Marie de Gonzaga, in spite of her love for Cinq-Mars, was to become Queen of Poland. All that was left was to finish off Cinq-Mars and the other conspirators and prevent the treaty from reaching Spain. The messenger carrying the treaty was intercepted in the Pyrenees by the cardinal's agents and killed. In order to gain control of the conspirators, Richelieu pretended to resign his post as minister. King Louis realized within a few hours that he did not know enough about the affairs of the kingdom to rule France. He called back Richelieu and granted the minister's request to do as he pleased with the conspirators. Gaston d'Orleans was banished, while Cinq-Mars and de Thou were arrested at Narbonne, tried at Lyons by a secret court appointed by Richelieu, and beheaded. Marie de Gonzaga, pawn of the cardinal's political schemes, became Queen of Poland.

THE CLOSED GARDEN

Author: Julian Green (1900- )

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: 1908

Locale: France

First published: 1927

Principal characters:

ANTOINE MESURAT, a retired teacher

ADRIENNE, his daughter

GERMAINE, her invalid older sister

DR. DENIS MAURECOURT, a physician

MADAME LEGRAS, a neighbor

Critique:

It has been said that the inspiration for The Closed Garden—Adrienne Mesurat in the original edition—was a painting by Utrillo. Certainly the novel has the sunlit yet melancholy dullness we find in many of Utrillo's street scenes. Julian Green has also been compared with Emily Brontë for the intensity of his atmosphere and with Balzac for his realistic rendering of French provincial life. But these comparisons are true only in part. Green is himself first of all, with his own powers and compelling insights. In this novel there is a constant clashing of motives and wills among members of a single household; and the limitation of characters and scene gives added force to the story of Adrienne Mesurat, who falls in love with a man to whom she had never spoken, commits a crime of violence, and goes mad. Julian Green's mastery of his somber theme makes this novel a classic of its kind, just as the writer himself, born in Paris of American parents, is one of the most distinguished writers of his literary generation abroad.

The Story:

Adrienne Mesurat lived with her father, a retired writing-master, and Germaine, her invalid older sister, in a small, ugly villa in the country town of La Tour l'Evêque. The routine of the household was simple, for Antoine Mesurat lived only to indulge his own quiet tastes. Three meals a day, his morning and evening walks, his favorite newspaper, an occasional game of trente-et-un—these were his pleasures. In his tranquilly stubborn manner he was a complete domestic tyrant, and the idea that his daughters might be unhappy with their lot never crossed his mind.

There had been a time when callers came to the villa, for the Mesurats owned enough property to attract young men of the district. But old Mesurat considered his daughters superior to the sons of provincial tradesmen and lawyers and laughed complacently at their proposals of marriage. Finally the visits ceased. In the uneventful round of Adrienne's days a strange passerby in the street, local gossip her father brought back from his walks, and the succession of tenants who each summer rented the Villa Louise on the corner became items for speculation and comment. So matters might have gone on indefinitely if Adrienne had not, in the summer of her seventeenth year, fallen suddenly in love.

She had been gathering flowers beside a country road when a carriage passed her and she saw in it a slight man of middle age, who half lifted his hat as the vehicle went by. Adrienne recognized him as Dr. Maurecourt, a recent arrival in the town. A feeling of gratitude and adoration filled her because he had noticed her. For the rest of the summer she walked the same road every day, but the doctor never rode that way again.

At last Adrienne hit upon another plan. Each night, after Germaine had gone to her room and Mesurat had settled himself in the parlor for his evening nap, she would steal out of the house. From the corner on which the Villa Louise stood she could see the front of the Maurecourt dwelling, and the sight of its lighted windows gave her a deep feeling of happiness. Once she saw Maurecourt on the street. Later she felt that she had to see him again at any cost. One day, while cleaning, she discovered that she could also watch his house from the window of Germaine's room. As often as possible she went there and sat, hoping to see him enter or leave by his front door.

Germaine, surprising Adrienne in her bedroom, became suspicious. That night the older sister was awake when Adrienne returned quietly from her evening vigil. Mesurat, informed of what had happened, ordered Adrienne to play cards with him after dinner the next day. Under her father's suspicious gaze, she played badly. Enraged, he accused her of stealing out nightly to meet a lover. From that time on she was allowed to leave the house only when she went walking with her father. Again she saw Maurecourt on the street. Thinking that if she were hurt he would be called to attend her, she thrust her arms through the windowpane. Her father and sister bandaged her cuts, much to her despair.

Germaine's sickness grew worse. Mesurat, refusing to acknowledge her serious condition, insisted that she get up for her meals. One morning, after he had berated her at breakfast, Germaine confided her intention of leaving home, and she borrowed five hundred francs from Adrienne's dower chest to pay her fare to a convent hospital. Adrienne was glad to see her sister go; she hoped to occupy the room from which she used to watch Maurecourt's house. Mesurat, surprised and furious, was puzzled to know how Germaine had arranged for her flight and where she had secured money for her train fare.

In June, Madame Legras had become the new tenant of the Villa Louise. Adrienne and her father had met the summer visitor at a concert and Madame Legras had invited the young girl to call. After Germaine's flight Adrienne went to see her new neighbor. Madame Legras was affable but prying. Confused by questions about a possible lover, Adrienne had a strange attack of dizziness.

That night Mesurat angrily ordered her to produce her dower box. Seeing that five hundred francs were missing, he accused her of plotting with Germaine to outwit him. While he stood reviling her from the head of the stairs, Adrienne ran against him in the dark. He fell into the hall below. Dazed and frightened by her deed, Adrienne went to bed.

The cook stumbled upon Mesurat's body the next morning, and Madame Legras, aroused by the disturbance, summoned Maurecourt. Although there were some whispers that the old man's end might not be all it seemed, the verdict was one of accidental death. Germaine did not return for the funeral. Before long Adrienne, to her dismay, found herself lonelier than ever. A feeling of lethargy possessed her much of the time. When the prioress wrote asking for money in Germaine's name or lawyers sent legal papers for her signature, she disregarded them. Nothing seemed to matter except the time she spent with Madame Legras, who had assumed a protective attitude toward the girl. But at last Adrienne began to realize that Madame Legras suspected the truth about Mesurat's death, and her sly looks and pointed remarks seemed intended to lead the girl into a trap.

One day Adrienne decided to go to Montfort. There, walking the streets, she imagined that people were staring at her. She spent the night in Dreux, where a young workman accosted her. Later, frightened because she did not remember why she had gone away, she returned to La Tour l'Evêque after sending Maurecourt a card telling him of her unhappiness.

Shortly after her return she collapsed and had to be put to bed in the Villa Louise. Madame Legras, undressing her, found a love letter which she gave to the doctor when he came in response to her summons. That night Adrienne awoke and went back to her own home. Maurecourt went to see her there the next day. When she confessed her love, he told her that he was sick and soon to die. Overcome by his visit, she was barely able to rouse herself when Madame Legras appeared and demanded an immediate loan in order to pay some pressing debts. While she looked on helplessly, the woman emptied the dower chest of its gold coins. Then she removed the watch and chain Adrienne was wearing and dropped them into her purse.

A short time later, when the cook brought word that Madame Legras had left town very suddenly, Adrienne realized that the servant also knew her guilt. Dazed, she sat vacant-eyed when Maurecourt's sister called to reproach her for her shameless behavior. At nightfall she left the house and wandered toward the lighted square, where a fête was in progress. Suddenly she turned and ran toward the dark countryside. There some peasants found her a few hours later. She could not tell them her name. She was mad.

THE COCKTAIL PARTY

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888- )

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Mid-twentieth century

First presented: 1949

Principal characters:

EDWARD CHAMBERLAYNE, a lawyer

LAVINIA, his wife

JULIA, a meddling woman

CELIA, a sensitive young woman

PETER, in love with Celia

ALEX, a meddling man

SIR HENRY HARCOURT-REILLY, at first unidentified

Critique:

The Cocktail Party, a verse play, was an immediate success on Broadway. The style, the clever comedy, the sharp social criticism—all were factors in its ready acceptance. That Eliot's intelligent comedy should win a wide audience is another token of his place among men of letters. The penetrating social analyses concern the present fetish of psychiatry, the dullness of cocktail parties and those who give them, and the meaning of success. Although the play is a comedy, Eliot has used it to give new light on contemporary civilization.

The Story:

The Chamberlaynes were giving a cocktail party in their London flat. The atmosphere was somewhat strained because Lavinia, the hostess, was not there, and Edward, her bumbling husband, hastily invented a sick aunt to account for her absence. Alex, as usual, had an exotic story to tell, for he traveled widely and knew everyone. Julia, a sharp-eyed and sharptongued family friend, missed the point of his tale and wondered why Alex and the Maharaja were up a tree. Julia usually missed the point of stories she heard.

The assembly demanded that Julia give her inimitable imitation of Lady Kloomtz and the wedding cake. They had all heard the story before, except possibly Edward, who forgot stories, and an unidentified and unintroduced guest. Somehow Julia got off on a family who had a harmless son, and the story never did get told. The harmless son was a fascinating person: he could hear the cries of bats. Then Peter had to tell of a scenario which he had written and which, unfortunately, never was produced.

To Edward's relief, the guests prepared to leave. Only the stranger remained. He drank gin with Edward for a while, and Edward was compelled to confide in him. Lavinia was not really at her aunt's house; she had simply left with no explanation. The stranger pointed out that her leaving might be a blessing, since Lavinia was demanding and practical. But Edward was uneasy, without knowing exactly why he wanted Lavinia back. The stranger promised that the erring wife would return within twenty-four hours if Edward would ask for no explanations. He warned also that both Lavinia and Edward might be greatly changed. The stranger, full of gin, broke into song as he left the apartment.

Julia, returning for her glasses, had Peter in tow. The glasses were in Julia's bag all the time, and she departed again, leaving behind an agitated Peter. The young man wanted to confide in Edward. He had fallen in love with Celia after attending many concerts with her, and she had been very friendly. Lately, however, she had been unresponsive. He asked if Edward would intercede for him.

At this juncture Alex came gaily back. Edward was irritated. He asked Peter and Alex to lock the door when they left so no one else would wander in. Alex archly went to the kitchen, intent on whipping up a meal for the lone Edward. He succeeded in using up all the fresh eggs in some outlandish concoction.

At last, after answering the phone several times, Edward settled down in solitary comfort to play patience. Then the doorbell rang and in came Celia. She had divined that Lavinia had left Edward, and now she thought it would be a good time for Edward to seek a divorce so that he and Celia could marry. Edward agreed, but in spite of his repeated assurances of continued love, Celia was uneasy, for she sensed a change in him. Edward then confessed that Lavinia was coming back and that he almost wanted her back. He scarcely knew why, for until his wife left he had wanted only Celia. Celia was discomfited at her faint-hearted lover. When Julia returned once more, this time to invite Edward to dinner, Celia escaped into the kitchen. There, under pretext of getting a lunch for the lone Edward, she ruined Alex's concoction completely.

The next day the stranger returned. Again he warned Edward that by wanting Lavinia to return he had set in motion forces beyond his control. When she returned, she would be a stranger and Edward would be a stranger to her. But since Edward had made his choice he had to abide by it. After admonishing Edward to receive any visitors who might come, the mysterious stranger left by the back stairs.

Celia was the first to arrive. She had come at Julia's request, apparently in response to a telegram from Lavinia. While they were together, Celia had a chance to look at Edward carefully; he seemed to her only a rather comic middle-aged man. She could laugh now at her infatuation.

Peter arrived in response to Alex's invitation. Alex had also received a wire, ostensibly from Lavinia. He had time for some reproachful remarks to Celia and then announced he was leaving for Hollywood.

Lavinia herself arrived next, surprised to find Peter and Celia and disclaiming any knowledge of telegrams to Alex and Julia. When the latter two got there, the mystery deepened. At length the guests departed and Lavinia turned expectantly to Edward. But he had little to say. He reproached her for her overbearing ways, and she twitted him for being unable to make decisions. When she suggested Edward was on the verge of a nervous breakdown, he was angered but interested in the possibility. He resolved stoutly not to visit any doctor Lavinia might recommend, and stalked off to his club.

In Sir Henry's offices, preparations were being made to receive patients. The first was Edward, who was surprised to see that Sir Henry was his mysterious stranger. In the consultation Edward told why he had wanted Lavinia back: she had dominated him so long that he was incapable of existence without her. Sir Henry then brought in Lavinia, the better to have the whole problem threshed out.

During the conversation it was revealed that Lavinia had left because of Edward's disgraceful affair with Celia. Edward, somewhat shaken to learn that she had known of the affair, grew confident again when Lavinia confessed she had been infatuated with Peter. Sir Henry diagnosed their trouble as mutual fear: Edward was afraid he could not make successful love to any one and Lavinia was afraid she was completely unlovable. The doctor assured them that they had every requirement for a successful life together. They had a mutual fear and hatred of each other, and both were quite mediocre people. They left, moderately reconciled.

Julia arrived at the doctor's office to ask how successful her scheming had been. It had been she who had induced Sir Henry to step in, and Alex had abetted her.

Celia also came in for a consultation. She had vague feelings of guilt and sin and wanted to take a rest cure. After talking with her, Sir Henry recognized that she was an outstanding person, that her destiny called her. He advised her to be at ease and do whatever she had to do.

Two years later the Chamberlaynes were giving another cocktail party to many of the old crowd. They were smugly settled in their mediocrity and even made a pretense of being in love. To them the inanities of cocktail parties were their measure of social standing. Peter came in hurriedly. He had been a great success in America. He now had money and renown of a sort. His destiny had been a material one. Alex arrived next. He was just back from bearing the white man's burden on a tropical island. He reported Celia's death. Celia had been a nurse on the island. She had been killed in a native rebellion. Her destiny had called her to martyrdom for the love of humanity.

THE COLLEGIANS

Author: Gerald Griffin (1803-1840)

Type of plot: Domestic tragedy

Time of plot: Late eighteenth century

Locale: Ireland

First published: 1828

Principal characters:

EILY O'CONNOR, a beautiful girl of the lower classes

HARDRESS CREGAN, a spirited young man of wealth

ANN CHUTE, a young woman of the upper classes, in love with Cregan

KYRLE DALY, a college friend of Cregan, in love with Ann Chute

DANNY MANN, Cregan's villainous servant

MRS. CREGAN, Hardress Cregan's mother

Critique:

Gerald Griffin was a dramatist and poet as well as a novelist, but his chief claim to fame is The Collegians, which was extremely popular in the years immediately after its publication. The story is more familiar to Americans in drama form, having been dramatized by Dion Boucicault under the title of The Colleen Bawn, a play which capitalized upon the melodramatic qualities of the novel. Griffin attempted to do for the Irish and Ireland what Sir Walter Scott had done in portraying Scotland and the Scottish people, and like Scott, Griffin was intensely interested in the folk traditions, customs, and personalities of the people about whom he wrote. The pages of The Collegians are filled with items of Irish folklore and more than a little attention has been paid to capturing the language of the peasants.

The Story:

Hardress Cregan and Kyrle Daly had been companions in their college days, in spite of the fact that Kyrle was of the middle classes and Hardress was the son of an Irish gentleman. Their respective ranks were close enough, however, so that they could respect one another and not be ashamed of their friendship. After leaving college they maintained the same close relationship, for they lived not far from each other. In fact, Kyrle, who had begun the study of law, became a suitor for the hand of Hardress' cousin, Ann Chute, a suit in which Kyrle had the good will of his friend.

Hardress Cregan, a spirited young man, lived more for sports and good times; he was actually shy in the presence of women, although he was bold enough in the face of danger. He was also disdainful of people from the lower classes. As an example of his attitude for them, one morning Kyrle's family watched from a window of their house as Hardress ran down some fishermen with his yacht, when such action could have been averted by a slight shift of the yacht's tiller.

That same day Kyrle set out for Chute Castle to attend the races and to press his suit with Ann Chute. He did not know that on board Hardress' yacht was a young woman of the lower classes, Eily O'Connor, daughter of a rope-maker, whom Hardress had secretly married a month before. The young woman was beautiful, but Hardress was afraid to make his marriage public, for he knew that his mother expected him to make a marriage with a young woman of wealth and position. He had taken Eily on board his yacht and was sailing with her up the coast, where he intended lodging her in the cottage of his servant's sister, close to his family's home. She had consented to go with him and to stay away from her father's home only because Hardress had promised to acknowledge her publicly as his bride within a matter of days. Hardress knew that he was safe in settling her with the sister of his servant, Danny Mann, because Danny, a hunchback, was devotedly loyal to his headstrong master.

At Chute Castle that same afternoon Kyrle's suit for the hand of Ann was ended. The girl told Kyrle in definite terms that she could not marry him, although she loved no one else. That night Kyrle met Hardress at the cottage where the latter had taken Eily. Kyrle was too distracted to notice anything unusual in the fact that the girl was with his friend. Hardress promised to do everything he could to assist Kyrle in marrying Ann.

Ann, asked to stay at the home of Hardress' parents, accepted the invitation. A few days after her arrival she confided to a sick old huntsman that she was in love with Hardress. Just before the old man died, he told his master that someone was in love with the young man. He did not, however, tell who loved him, but Hardress' mother soon realized the love Ann had for her son. Approving of the match, even though the young people were cousins, she threw them together at every opportunity. When Hardress tried to avoid Ann, his mother upbraided him bitterly. Her attitude completely prevented the young man from revealing his marriage to Eily.

Eily, meanwhile, grew restive when her husband refused to acknowledge her as his bride, for even the people with whom she stayed did not know that Hardress was her husband. As the weeks went by she realized that she had outworn her welcome among the peasants with whom she was quartered. Above all, she found her husband acting very strangely when he visited her. The girl asked him the reasons for his strangeness and for his reluctance to admit to the world that she was his wife. When she did, he burst out in anger, pointing out that he had married below his station and was very sorry he had done so. It was then that he realized that he was in love with Ann. Leaving the cottage in a rage, he met his confidential servant, the hunchbacked Danny Mann. The servant was so devoted to his master that he promised to do away with the girl if Hardress wished her out of the way. His offer, a shocking one, brought Hardress to his senses, although he was still torn between his duty to his unacknowledged wife and his love for Ann.

At home the love for him that Ann openly showed, as well as his mother's wishes that he marry the girl, increased the young man's perplexities. Gradually his desire to marry Ann overcame his sense of duty to his secret bride.

In the meantime Eily decided to let someone know of her marriage. Leaving the cottage, she went to see an uncle, the parish priest in a village not far from where she was staying. She told her uncle that she was married, but obedience to her husband kept her from telling who the husband was. Upon her return to the cottage she met Danny Mann, who gave her a letter from Hardress. Finally yielding to temptation and resolving to be rid of Eily, he had commissioned Danny to spirit her out of Ireland and put her on a boat bound for Canada. In the letter he told his wife of his decision; Eily, still obedient to her husband, submitted to his wishes.

But Danny misinterpreted his master's commands and murdered the girl. Too late, Hardress realized what had happened, but in spite of the blood on his hands he determined to marry Ann. His hope was that Danny would disappear for good and that the crime would never be discovered. As plans were being made for the wedding, Hardress began to act rather strangely. No one knew of the crime that was preying on his mind; people put his strange actions down to cowardice and illness.

Quite by chance, a short time before the date set for the marriage, Eily's body was discovered. At the inquest nothing was learned of the girl's death. Although the coroner suspected foul play, it seemed as if Hardress' plans were to work out successfully. Then, on the day before the marriage, Danny returned and was captured by the authorities. For a time it seemed as if fate were with the criminals. Hardress was able to effect his servant's escape, but Danny continued to linger in the neighborhood, much to Hardress' dismay. Discovering the servant, he beat the hunchback unmercifully. In revenge, Danny went to the authorities and confessed his crimes, implicating his master. Hardress, a few hours before his wedding, was taken from his home and sent into exile as a criminal. Danny Mann was hanged.

A happy ending of the tragedy came when, some months later, Ann married Kyrle Daly, who she found was really a better man and more worthy of her love than wealthier and more spirited Hardress Cregan.

COLOMBA

Author: Prosper Mérimée (1803-1870)

Type of plot: Romantic adventure

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Corsica

First published: 1840

Principal characters:

COLONEL SIR THOMAS NEVIL, an Irish officer serving in the English army

LYDIA NEVIL, his daughter

ORSO DELLA REBBIA, a lieutenant in the French army

COLOMBA DELLA REBBIA, his sister

LAWYER BARRICINI, blood enemy to the della Rebbias

Critique:

A tale of vengeance, Colomba tells the story of the blood enmity between two Corsican families, one honorable, the other cowardly. Although primitive customs of the Corsicans are contrasted with the civilized manners of two British subjects, the savage Corsicans do not fall short in honor and courage. Adventure and romance form the background for this story of a girl who would not rest until she saw her father's death avenged.

The Story:

When Lydia Nevil and her father, Colonel Nevil, first met Lieutenant Orso della Rebbia, they were impressed with that young man's good looks and his obvious pride in his native Corsica. Although Colonel Nevil and Orso had been on opposite sides in the Napoleonic Wars, each admired the other's bravery and courage. The Nevils were on their way to Corsica when they met Orso, a trip they hoped would provide release from boredom for Lydia and good hunting for her father. Orso, a lieutenant under Napoleon, was going home on half pay now that the wars were over and his leader had been defeated.

A short time after the party arrived in Corsica, Orso's sister Colomba joined them. From her and Orso, the Nevils learned the story of the della Rebbia family. The father had been murdered from ambush and no one had paid for the crime. But Colomba firmly believed that Lawyer Barricini had been responsible for her father's death, the two families having been blood enemies for generations, and she demanded that Orso avenge the death. Orso, having been absent from Corsica for many years, did not feel the old passionate hatred of his kin, and he was satisfied that the law had rightly cleared Barricini, there being no proof that he was guilty of murder. Colomba, sharing the fiery passions of her ancestors, was determined that her brother should uphold the honor of their family. Lydia, on the other hand, pleaded with Orso to let the law settle such matters; she felt that to avenge the death would be to commit murder.

There had been evidence in the case, the bloodstained notebook of the murdered man, in which he had printed part of a name before he died. Barricini, as mayor of the village, had impounded the book, and when it was offered in evidence the name appeared to be that of a bandit in the district. Colomba believed that Barricini had torn out the original page and himself printed the bandit's name. No one believed her story but some peasant friends who were also bandits, and their testimony was of no value.

Orso and Colomba left the Nevils for a time and returned to their native village, the colonel and Lydia promising to visit them later. Not long after their return the prefect called on them and said that he had proof that Barricini was not guilty of the crime of which Colomba accused him. A thief, now imprisoned, had confessed that he had written a letter that had started the trouble between Barricini and the slain della Rebbia. Colomba, not impressed, said that Barricini, fearing that she would prevail upon her brother to seek out their enemy and kill him, had no doubt bribed the prisoner to make a false confession.

The prefect invited Orso to accompany him to the Barricini house, there to settle the matter peacefully. The prefect, who also had a letter for Orso from Lydia, promised that he would hand over the letter when the young man made the call. But the next morning Colomba told the prefect's servant that her brother had sprained his ankle; she asked the prefect to call at their home. When the prefect arrived, accompanied by Barricini and his two sons, Colomba confronted them with one of her friends, a bandit who said that he had been in prison with the thief supposed to have confessed to writing the letter. The bandit said that the prisoner had received many visits from Barricini's son and that the prisoner displayed a great deal of money for one so notoriously poor. Orso, convinced by this evidence, accused Barricini of forgery, perhaps murder. He struck one of the sons and promised to seek true vengeance later. The prefect, promising to investigate the whole matter, asked Orso to refrain from violence until the investigation was complete.

Orso wrote to Barricini's son, however, and challenged him to a duel with guns. Barricini promptly sent the note to the public prosecutor as evidence that Orso had threatened his family. Orso then wrote to Lydia, whose letter to him had stated that she and her father were on the way for their visit, and asked the Nevils not to come until she heard from him again. He wished to spare them the danger of a feud. Learning that his letter had not reached Lydia in time, he proposed to intercept the Nevils on their way to the village.

In order to stir her brother to violence, Colomba slit the ear of his favorite horse. Convinced by his sister that his enemies had done the deed, enraged Orso swore he would avenge his honor, for to slit the ear of an enemy's horse was a mortal challenge.

On his way to meet the Nevils, a friendly child warned Orso that his enemies were waiting to ambush him, but he refused to turn back. When he reached a thicket, he was attacked from two sides and injured in the arm. With one arm he discharged his heavy gun twice and killed both his attackers. Realizing that they were the two sons of Barricini, he knew that he would be arrested for murder. He took refuge with some bandits friendly to his family.

Lydia and Colonel Nevil, arriving in the village, learned of Orso's disappearance, and they joined Colomba in fears for his safety. At last the bandits sent word that Orso had escaped and was hiding with them. Believing in his innocence, Lydia convinced her father that Orso had only defended himself against his would-be assassins. In fact, Colonel Nevil told the prefect that he and Lydia had heard Orso's gun fire twice after two lighter guns had been fired. The colonel's reputation convinced the prefect that Orso had acted in self-defense.

Colomba and Lydia visited Orso in his hideout. As the two young people declared their love for each other they were interrupted by the arrival of the police. Orso fled again. Colomba and Lydia were seized and returned to the prefect. By that time the prefect had proof that Orso had acted in self-defense, which carried no charge of murder. He demanded, however, that Orso surrender to the authorities so that the affair could be settled legally.

After his surrender Orso was found innocent of any crime. He and Lydia married and went to Italy. Colomba and Colonel Nevil accompanied them. Although Colomba soon learned the dress and manners of polite society, she often longed for her wild life in Corsica. One day she saw an old man who had almost lost his senses. She learned that he was old Barricini, who had been forced to flee Corsica after Orso's vindication. Now he was a broken man, mourning the loss of his sons and his honor. He confessed to Colomba that he had indeed torn the page out of the notebook and substituted another name for his own. Colomba had no sympathy for the old man. She felt that his plight was due to his own evil and was glad that her father's blood was now completely avenged.

Critique:

The Comedy of Errors is a farce-comedy at times bordering on slapstick. The situations make the farce, the characters being only incidental to the plot. It required a nimble wit to place each character at the right place at the exact time to increase the confusion already existing in the story. Here Shakespeare had no subtle moral, no lyrical expression of love, no purpose of any kind but to entertain with scenes of hilarious confusion. The reader must enter wholeheartedly into the spirit of fun and gaiety or his time is wasted. Absent is the perfection of structure and characterization of Shakespeare's later works, but nowhere does he surpass The Comedy of Errors in simple, side-splitting fun.

The Story:

Aegeon, a merchant of Syracuse recently arrived in Ephesus, was to be put to death because he could not raise a thousand marks for payment of his fine. The law of the time was that a native of either land must not journey to the other on penalty of his life or the ransom of a thousand marks. But when Solinus, Duke of Ephesus, heard Aegeon's story, he gave the merchant one more day to try to raise the money.

It was a sad and strange tale Aegeon told. He had, many years ago, journeyed to Epidamnum. Shortly after his wife joined him there she was delivered of identical twins. Strangely enough, at the same time and in the same house, another woman also bore twin boys, both identical. The second wife and her husband were so poor that they could not care for their children, and so they gave them to Aegeon and his wife Aemilia, to be attendants to their two sons. On their way home to Syracuse, the six were shipwrecked. Aemilia and the two with her were rescued by one ship, Aegeon and the other two by a different ship. Aegeon did not see his wife and the two children in her company again. When he reached eighteen years of age, Antipholus, the son reared by his father, grew anxious to find his brother, and he and his attendant set out to find their missing twin. Now they too were lost to Aegeon, and he had come to Syracuse to seek them.

Unknown to Aegeon, his son and his attendant had just arrived in Ephesus. Antipholus and Dromio, his attendant, met first a merchant of the city, who warned them to say that they came from somewhere other than Syracuse, lest they suffer the penalty already meted out to Aegeon. Antipholus, having sent Dromio to find lodging for them, was utterly bewildered when the servant returned and said that Antipholus' wife waited dinner for him. What had happened was that the Dromio who came now to Antipholus was Dromio of Ephesus, servant and attendant to Antipholus of Ephesus. Antipholus of Syracuse had given his Dromio money to pay for lodging, and when he heard a tale of a wife about whom he knew nothing he thought his servant tricked him. He asked the servant to return his money. But Dromio of Ephesus had been given no money and professed no knowledge of the sum. He was beaten soundly for dishonesty. Antipholus of Syracuse later heard that his money had been delivered to the inn; he could not understand his servant's joke.

A short time later the wife and sister-in-law of Antipholus of Ephesus met Antipholus of Syracuse and, after berating him for refusing to come home to dinner, accused him of unfaithfulness with another woman. Not understanding a thing of which Adriana spoke, Antipholus of Syracuse went to her home to dinner, Dromio being assigned by her to guard the gate and allow no one to enter. Thus it was that Antipholus of Ephesus arrived at his home with his Dromio and was refused admittance. So incensed was he that he left his house and went to an inn. There he dined with a courtesan and gave her gifts intended for his wife.

In the meantime Antipholus of Syracuse, even though almost believing that he must be the husband of Adriana, fell in love with her sister Luciana. But when he told her of his love, she called him an unfaithful husband and begged him to remain true to his wife. Dromio of Syracuse was pursued by a kitchen maid whom he abhorred; the poor girl mistook him for Dromio of Ephesus, who loved her.

Even the townspeople and merchants were bewildered. A goldsmith delivered to Antipholus of Syracuse a chain meant for Antipholus of Ephesus and then tried to collect from the latter, who in turn stated that he had received no chain and accused the merchant of trying to rob him.

Antipholus and Dromio of Syracuse decided to get out of the seemingly mad town as soon as possible, and the servant was sent to book passage on the first ship leaving the city. But Dromio of Syracuse brought back the news of the sailing to Antipholus of Ephesus, who by that time had been arrested for refusing to pay the merchant for the chain he had not received. Antipholus of Ephesus, believing the servant to be his own, sent Dromio of Syracuse to his house to get money for his bail. But before that Dromio returned with the money, Dromio of Ephesus came to Antipholus of Ephesus, naturally without the desired money. Meanwhile Dromio of Syracuse took the money to Antipholus of Syracuse, who had not sent for money and could not understand what his servant was talking about. To make matters worse, the courtesan with whom Antipholus of Ephesus had dined had given him a ring. Now she approached the other Antipholus and demanded the ring. Knowing nothing about the ring, he angrily dismissed the wench, who decided to go to his house and tell his wife of his betrayal.

On his way to jail for the debt he did not owe, Antipholus of Ephesus met his wife. Wild with rage, he accused her of locking him out of his own house and of refusing him his own money for bail. She was so frightened that she asked the police first to make sure that he was securely bound and then to imprison him in their home so that she could care for him.

At the same time Antipholus and Dromio of Syracuse were making their way toward the ship that would carry them away from this mad city. Antipholus was wearing the gold chain. The merchant, meeting them, demanded that Antipholus be arrested. To escape, Antipholus of Syracuse and his Dromio fled into an abbey. To the same abbey came Aegeon, the duke, and the executioners, for Aegeon had not raised the money for his ransom. Adriana and Luciana also appeared, demanding the release to them of Adriana's husband and his servant. Adriana, seeing the two men take refuge in the convent, thought they were Antipholus and Dromio of Ephesus. At that instant a servant ran in to tell Adriana that her husband and Dromio had escaped from the house and were even now on the way to the abbey. Adriana did not believe the servant, for she herself had seen her husband and Dromio enter the abbey. Then Antipholus and Dromio of Ephesus appeared before the abbey. Aegeon thought he recognized the son and servant he had been seeking, but they denied any knowledge of him. The confusion grew worse until the abbess brought from the convent Antipholus and Dromio of Syracuse, who instantly recognized Aegeon. Then all the mysteries were solved. Adriana was reunited with her husband, Antipholus of Ephesus, and his Dromio had the kitchen maid once more. Antipholus of Syracuse was free to make love to Luciana. His Dromio was merely freed. Still more surprising, the abbess turned out to be Aegeon's wife, the mother of the Antipholi. So the happy family was together again. Lastly, Antipholus of Ephesus paid his father's ransom and brought to an end all the errors of that unhappy day.

CONFESSIONS OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM EATER

Type of work: Essays

Author: Thomas De Quincey (1785-1859)

Type of treatise: Confession and fantasy

Time of treatise: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England and Wales

First published: 1821

Principal characters:

THOMAS DE QUINCEY, the narrator

ANN, a prostitute

Critique:

This book is one of those works about which all educated people have heard but which few have read, in spite of the sensational subject, addiction to drugs. The modern reader has little patience with deliberate displays of erudition, with protracted sentimentality, with latinate periodic sentences, and with apostrophes to this abstraction or to that inanimate object. De Quincey was a conscious stylist in his attempt to give prose writing the imaginative and emotional qualities of poetry. But he was also prolix; and it is for this prolixity, perhaps, that he goes largely unread today. Still, Confessions of an English Opium Eater is worth reading: De Quincey forbore admirably here, hewing to or staying close to his theme throughout. As an inspiration to human beings who have succumbed to any pernicious habit and who despair of ever breaking free, the work is invaluable.

The Story:

When Thomas De Quincey was about twenty-eight years of age, intense stomach pains drove him to take opium for relief. These stomach pains were a legacy from hardships that he endured as an adolescent.

De Quincey's father had died when the boy was seven. Thomas, the joint responsibility of four guardians, was sent to school, where he became an excellent Greek scholar. Later, at the Manchester Grammar School, he was so superior to his teachers in Greek that he soon felt a desire to leave the school. His guardians being against this plan, however, he asked an old friend for money, received it, and planned to make his escape from a school which he felt had nothing to offer him intellectually.

The day of his escape came. When the groom of his hall was carrying his book-laden trunk down a narrow stairway, the man slipped and fell, the trunk clattering noisily to the floor below. Young De Quincey was sure he would be caught. But the incident, miraculously, did not arouse the curiosity of the resident master, and the youth was able to get away.

Seventeen-year-old De Quincey headed westward, walking through Wales, where, in Bangor, he took a room. His landlady was the ex-servant of a bishop's family. On one of her regular visits to the bishop's house, she disclosed that she was taking in lodgers. When she reported her disclosure to De Quincey, he took exception to the tenor of her remarks concerning him, moved out of her house at once, and found lodging in inns. That type of lodging being relatively expensive, the young man soon found himself reduced to eating only once a day, and this a meal of only coffee or tea. The mountain air of Wales and the walking made him abnormally hungry, so that his having to subsist off berries and charitable handouts hurt him physically. As time went by, he managed to earn a meager living by writing letters for the illiterate and by doing odd jobs. But the damage to his health had been done.

His travels then took him from Wales to London, where, utterly destitute and afraid to reveal himself to any friends of his family, he lived for several months on little more than a small ration of bread; also, at that time, he slept out of doors. At last, in cold weather, an acquaintance gave him shelter in a large, almost empty house, where De Quincey's companion was a ten-year-old girl. Pains in his stomach prevented his ever getting a proper night's sleep; consequently, he slept by fits and snatches both day and night. The master of the house was a legal representative of money-lenders, but despite the man's apparent lack of principles De Quincey found him generous in his way. The little girl appeared to be a servant in the large house, which was situated near Soho Square.

De Quincey walked the streets and often sat all day in parks, until Ann, a sixteen-year-old street-walker, befriended him. One night, when he had a violent attack of his stomach complaint, Ann spent part of her scant savings on wine and spices for him.

Soon afterward he met an old family acquaintance who gave him money, thus ending De Quincey's period of extreme poverty. Previously, he had been afraid to appeal to family friends for help for fear that his guardians would send him back to the grammar school. That he might have taken on literary work of some kind never occurred to him. Now, solvent for the moment, he made arrangements to get an advance on his patrimony, which would not be legally his until his twenty-first birthday.

After saying goodbye to Ann, he took a coach to Eton to get a signature that was required for an advance on his patrimony. At Eton he called upon an acquaintance, young Lord Desart, who invited him to breakfast. Finding that he could not keep down the food, he took wine to his great comfort. Lord Desart, who was only eighteen, was reluctant to sign for security, but he finally consented. De Quincey returned to London, where he found that Lord Desart's signature did not impress the money-lenders with whom he was negotiating for the advance. Again he was threatened with hardship; again, however, he was saved, for his reconciled relatives sent him to Oxford University. Meanwhile, before he left London, he searched unsuccessfully for Ann. She was nowhere to be found, and he never saw her again.

De Quincey, now nineteen, made frequent weekend trips to London from Oxford. One Sunday, while in the metropolis, he suffered agonies from neuralgic pains in the head, and a fellow student whom he encountered recommended opium for relief. He thereupon bought a small amount of laudanum, the tincture of opium, from an apothecary. He returned to his room and took the prescribed amount. The result seemed phenomenal to him; all his pain ceased, and he knew boundless pleasure. There was no intoxication, as from wine or spirits; there was only a protracted sense of being utterly at peace with the world and with himself. The opium uplifted the intellect rather than the animal spirits, and when its effect wore off there was no period of depression such as spirits induced.

As a college student, De Quincey's two great pleasures were to hear Grassini, an Italian soprano who often sang in London, or to take opium and afterward join the Saturday night crowds in the London markets. Even greater than these pleasures, however, was that of withdrawing himself at the time when the opium had reached its maximum effect on his mind, so that he could get the most complete enjoyment from his opium-induced dreams and visions.

De Quincey left Oxford. In 1812 he took a cottage, where he studied German metaphysics and continued to take opium once a week. His health was apparently never better. Even after eight years of taking opium, he was able to say that he had not become a slave to the drug; he was still able to control the amount taken and the intervals between doses.

But a recurrence, in 1813, of his old stomach disorder led him to take the drug every day. That he was already partially addicted was a secondary reason for his increased use of opium. For two years he took three hundred and twenty grains of opium daily, but at last he was able to reduce the amount to forty grains. Staying on that allowance, he experienced the happiest year of his life.

About that time a Malay, traveling afoot, stopped for a night at the cottage. De Quincey was impressed by the aspect and garb of the Oriental. Before the man left the next morning, De Quincey gave him enough opium, divided into three parts, to kill a man if taken all at once. The Malay clapped all three pieces into his mouth and departed. De Quincey felt concern for several days, but to his relief he never heard or read of the untimely death of a Malay in his part of Great Britain.

In his little cottage in the mountains of northern England, De Quincey, in the winter of 1816-1817, knew complete happiness in his experience with opium. Deep snows, heavy rains, a snug cottage, a roaring fire, a large collection of good books, plenty of tea, and daily consumption of laudanum brought him idyllic happiness.

But matters changed. Having become addicted to the daily taking of opium, it became impossible for him to reduce his daily allowance without bringing on abnormal perspiration and excruciating abdominal pains. He soon lost interest in reading and the study of mathematics and philosophy. A friend sent him David Ricardo's Principles of Political Economy and Taxation. The book aroused him from his lethargy long enough to write for publication on that popular subject. Then, unable to write a preface for his work, he shelved the project. He neglected household responsibilities. At night he lay awake in his bed, processions of visions passing through his mind. These visions consisted largely of scenes from the English Civil War and from ancient Rome. Soon he found it difficult to distinguish between the real and the unreal. Furthermore, other dreams and visions took him into frightful abysses. Constantly depressed, he lost all normal sense of space and time, and he often had the sensation of having lived through a millennium. Also, he found himself able to recall insignificant events of his childhood, details which he had never been conscious of remembering.

The opium dreams were periodic in subject matter: there were nights during which he dreamed historical scenes; then there was a period of architectural dreams—vast piles of buildings and enormous cities; these were followed by dreams of water—lakes, lagoons, vast oceans; and next a period of dreams in which countless human faces presented themselves in peculiar situations to his mind's eye.

In May, 1818, his dream visions took on an Oriental theme. At times he was in Egypt, then in China, or in India. Where in previous dream sequences he had known only spiritual horrors, in these Oriental ones he sensed physical horror from reptiles and frightful birds.

In the summer of 1819, De Quincey, still addicted to opium, dreamed of a graveyard in his own little valley. In the dream he arose and walked out of his cottage yard to enjoy the air. He thought he saw an Oriental city and, beneath a palm tree, Ann, the street-walker friend of his youth. She did not speak; the dream faded and he found himself walking with her in the streets of London. In 1820 one vision was so terrifying in its profundity and breadth that he awoke and declared that he would never sleep again.

Finally, he reasoned that he would surely die if he continued to take opium and that he might die in the attempt to break the habit. With so little choice, he decided to try, at least, to free himself from opium. He reduced his ration gradually and finally broke free, thus proving to himself that an addict may end a habit of seventeen years' duration.

CONINGSBY

Author: Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881)

Type of plot: Political romance

Time of plot: 1832-1840

Locale: England and Paris

First published: 1844

Principal characters:

HARRY CONINGSBY, a young nobleman

MARQUIS OF MONMOUTH, his grandfather

SIDONIA, a wealthy young Jew, Coningsby's friend

EDITH MILLBANK, Coningsby's sweetheart

OSWALD MILLBANK, Edith's father

MR. RIGBY, a member of Parliament

LUCRETIA, a young Italian noblewoman, later Lord Monmouth's wife

FLORA, a member of a troupe of actors

Critique:

Coningsby occupies a special position in literature because of its varied aims. Not only is it the literary history of young Harry Coningsby's fortunes, but it is an important political treatise as well. In it Disraeli traced the decline of the Whig and Tory factions and the developments which led to the birth of the Conservative Party. The characters may be readily identified with real personages of the time.

The Story:

Harry Coningsby was fourteen when he met his grandfather, the Marquis of Monmouth, for the first time. He had been placed in his grandfather's charge when he was still very young with the understanding that his widowed mother, a commoner, was never to see him again. He had been turned over, sight unseen, to the care of Mr. Rigby, a member of Parliament who sat for one of Lord Monmouth's ten boroughs.

Lord Monmouth, who preferred to live abroad, had returned to his native land in 1832 in order to help fight the Reform Bill. Hearing favorable reports of his grandson, he had ordered Mr. Rigby to bring the boy from Eton to Monmouth House. Unfortunately, young Coningsby was unable to put out of his mind thoughts of his mother, who had died when he was nine, and he burst into tears at the sight of his grandfather. Lord Monmouth, disgusted by that sign of weakness, ordered him to be led away. He thought to himself that the sentimental boy's future probably lay with the church.

Fortunately, the boy became friendly with the marquis' guests, Princess Colonna and her stepdaughter, Lucretia. The princess passed on such glowing descriptions of Coningsby to his grandfather that they were on excellent terms by the time he returned to school.

At Eton one of Coningsby's close friends was Oswald Millbank, a manufacturer's son. When Coningsby left Eton in 1835 he went to explore Manchester's factories before going to Coningsby Castle to join his grandfather. During his journey he visited the Millbank mills. Oswald was abroad, but he was hospitably greeted by his friend's father. At the Millbank mansion Coningsby met beautiful but shy young Edith Millbank and learned from her Whig father that he favored the rise of a new force in government—a natural aristocracy of able men, not one composed of hereditary peers.

Before departing for Coningsby Castle, young Coningsby was tempted to inquire about the striking portrait of a woman which graced the dining-room wall. His host, much upset by his question, made a brusque, evasive answer.

Lord Monmouth, backing Mr. Rigby for reelection to Parliament, had returned to his borough and scheduled an elaborate program of dances, receptions, and plays, to gain a following for his Conservative candidate. Princess Colonna and Lucretia were again his grandfather's guests. Coningsby had no need, however, to confine his attentions to them, for as Lord Monmouth's kinsman and possible heir he found himself much sought after. He found time also to encourage Flora, a member of the troupe of actors entertaining the marquis' guests. The girl was shy and suffering from stage fright.

Here Coningsby met Sidonia, a fabulously wealthy young Jew. Coningsby found his new friend impartial in his political judgments, not only because his fortune allowed him to be just but also because his religion disqualified him as a voter. Sidonia taught him, during their lengthy discussions, to look to the national character for England's salvation. He believed that the country's weakness lay in developing class conflicts.

Lucretia made a brief effort to attract Coningsby when she observed the favor in which his grandfather held him, but before long she found Sidonia, a polished man of the world, more intriguing. But Sidonia was not to be captured. He was attracted by others' intellects, and Lucretia could not meet him on his own level.

After his holiday Coningsby went to Cambridge for his last years of study. During his first year there King William IV died and the Conservative cause fell in defeat. Mr. Rigby was, as he had been for many years, the candidate from his borough, and with the marquis to back him his victory seemed certain until Mr. Millbank entered the field. The manufacturer and the marquis had been enemies for many years, and their feud reached a climax when Millbank not only bought Helling-sley, an adjoining estate which Lord Monmouth had long coveted, but also defeated his lordship's candidate.

Prepared for the worst, the defeated Mr. Rigby went to Monmouth House, where the marquis was in residence. He was pleasantly disappointed, however, for his employer's thoughts were not on him. Lord Monmouth was preparing to marry Lucretia, who, if she could not have the man she desired, was determined at least to obtain power and riches through marriage.

A year after the wedding Coningsby was invited to join his grandfather and his bride in Paris at Christmas time. Stopping at his banker's on his way through London, he was given a package of his mother's correspondence. In the packet was a locket, with an exact copy of the portrait he had seen at Millbank. It was a picture of his mother.

While visiting an art gallery in Paris with Sidonia, Coningsby again met Edith Millbank, who was traveling with her relatives, Lord and Lady Wallinger. Coningsby, who fell in love with her immediately, was distressed to hear reports that Sidonia intended to marry her. Finding the couple conversing on familiar terms one evening, he regretfully decided to withdraw from the scene. He returned to England.

Disappointed in love, Coningsby devoted himself to his studies for the remainder of his stay at Cambridge. Then, learning that Edith had not married and that Sidonia was no more than an old family friend, he went to Coningsby Castle in order to be near the Millbanks.

Coningsby spent every possible moment with Edith and her family during the next few weeks. When her father discovered the lovers' feelings, he asked Coningsby to leave. He would not, he explained, submit his daughter to the same fate the young man's mother had suffered at Lord Monmouth's hands. In this manner Coningsby learned that his mother had once been Mr. Millbank's fiancée.

Leaving Hellingsley, Coningsby went on a sea voyage from which he was called home by the marquis. Parliament faced another crisis, and Lord Monmouth had decided that Coningsby should stand as his candidate. Coningsby refused, for he was of the opinion that men should cut across party lines to establish recognition of the bond between property and labor.

The same day Lord Monmouth faced his rebellious grandson he separated from Lucretia, who had proved unfaithful.

The marquis died at Christmas of that year. Most of his fortune he left to Flora, who was his natural daughter. Coningsby was cut off with the interest on ten thousand pounds.

Deeply disappointed in his expectations, Coningsby gave up his clubs and most of his friends and began to study law. He had resigned himself to the prospect of years of drudgery when Mr. Millbank repented his decision. The manufacturer withdrew his candidacy in the 1840 election to back Coningsby as the Tory candidate. Mr. Rigby was his rival candidate, but he was easily defeated.

Not many months later Edith became Coningsby's bride and went with him to live at Hellingsley, their wedding present from Mr. Millbank. As a final blessing, though not an unmixed one, Flora, who had always been weak, died, leaving the fortune she had inherited to the man who had befriended her many years before at Coningsby Castle.

Author: Charles Waddell Chesnutt (1858-1932)

Locale: North Carolina

First published: 1899

Principal characters:

THE NARRATOR

ANNIE, his wife

UNCLE JULIUS, his colored coachman

AUNT PEGGY, the conjure woman

Critique:

The first important American novelist of Negro descent, Charles Chesnutt has given us pure folktale and regional romance in The Conjure Woman. Uncle Julius is a very real person, one who does not waste his stories on any occasion. Each tale has a motive, some for the benefit of Julius himself, others for the benefit of his white employers. His stories are fantasy in the purest form, but so delicately, so fancifully told that the reader grieves or rejoices, just as Uncle Julius wants him to. Charles Chesnutt has portrayed the old Negro retainer with fidelity and understanding.

for a suitable place to take her. He had been engaged in grape culture in Ohio, and when he learned of a small North Carolina town that seemed to offer what he needed in climate and suitable land, he decided to buy an old, dilapidated plantation and settle there. An untended vineyard was already on the place; with a little care and expense the vines would flourish once more.

On the day that he took his wife Annie to look at the plantation they happened upon an ancient Negro who called himself Uncle Julius. He advised them not to buy the plantation because it was goophered. Seeing they did not know that anything goophered was bewitched (conjured), the old colored man asked permission to tell them the story of the vineyard.

Many years before the war, when Uncle Julius was still a slave, the plantation owner had made many thousands of dollars from the grapes. Because the master could never keep the slaves from eating the rich grapes and stealing the wine made from them, he conceived the idea of having Aunt Peggy, a conjure woman living nearby, put a goopher on the vines. She made one that said that any Negro eating the grapes would die within a year. Most of the slaves stayed away from the grapes, but a few tried them in spite of the conjure—and they all died. When a new slave came to the plantation, no one remembered to tell him about the conjure, and he ate some of the grapes. So that he would not die, Aunt Peggy made him a counter-goopher. Then a strange thing happened. Every year, as the grapes ripened, this slave became so young and sprightly that he could do the work of several men, but in the fall, when the vines died, he withered and faded. This strange action went on for a year or two, until the master hit upon the idea of selling the slave every spring when he was so strong, and buying him back cheaply in the fall. By this transaction he made money each year.

One year the master hired an expert to prune his vines, but the expert cut them out too deeply and the vines were ruined. Soon afterward the slave who had bloomed and withered with the vines died also. Some said he died of old age, but Uncle Julius knew that it was the goopher that finally overcame him. Uncle Julius advised strongly against buying the land because the conjure was still on.

The Narrator bought the plantation, however, and it prospered. Later he learned that Uncle Julius had been living in a cabin on the place and sold the grapes. He always suspected that the story was told to prevent ruination of the old man's business. He gave Uncle Julius employment as a coachman, and so the former slave was well cared for.

At another time Annie wanted a new kitchen, and her husband decided to tear down an old schoolhouse on the place and use the lumber from it for the new building. Uncle Julius advised him against the plan. Strangely enough, that schoolhouse was goophered, too. The story was that a slave called Sandy was borrowed by others so often that his woman was afraid they would be separated forever. She was a conjure woman, and so she turned him into a tree. Each night she would turn him back into a man, and they would slip into her cabin until morning, when she would again change him into a tree. One day the woman was sent away from the plantation before she could change Sandy into a man. While she was away the master had the tree that was Sandy cut down to build a new kitchen. The slaves had a hard time felling the tree, which twisted and turned and tried to break loose from the chains. At last they got it to the sawmill. Later the house was built, but it was never much use. The slaves refused to work there because at night they could hear moaning and groaning, as if someone were in great pain. Only Sandy's woman, when she returned, would stay in the building, and she, poor girl, went out of her mind.

Uncle Julius advised against using goophered lumber for the new kitchen. It also seemed that Uncle Julius needed the old schoolhouse for his church meetings. The goopher would not bother the worshipers; in fact, the preaching would help Sandy's roaming spirit. There was nothing for the wife and her husband to do but buy new lumber for her kitchen. No one would want to use goophered wood.

When the Narrator was about to buy a mule to use in cultivating some land, Uncle Julius warned him against mules because most of them were conjured. Uncle Julius did, however, know of a horse for sale. After his employer bought the horse, which died within three months, Uncle Julius appeared in a new suit he had been admiring for some time.

One day, when Annie felt depressed and listless, Uncle Julius told her and her husband about Becky, a slave traded for a horse. Taken away from her child, she grieved terribly. Aunt Peggy, the conjure woman, turned the baby into a hummingbird so that he could fly down to his mother and be near her and soothe her. Later the conjure woman arranged to have Becky and her baby reunited. But Uncle Julius knew that she would never have had all that trouble if she had owned the hindfoot of a rabbit to protect her from harm. The story seemed to cheer Annie, and her husband was not surprised later to find Uncle Julius' rabbit's foot among her things.

When the Narrator prepared to clear a piece of land, Uncle Julius warned him that the land was goophered and told him a harrowing tale about a slave turned into a gray wolf and tricked into killing his own wife, who had been changed into a cat. Although the gray wolf was said to haunt the patch of land, it did not seem to bother a bee tree from which Uncle Julius gathered wild honey.

One day Annie's sister Mabel and her fiancé quarreled bitterly. Uncle Julius had another story for them about Chloe, a slave who ruined her life because she was jealous. Chloe listened to a no-account rival and believed his story that her lover was meeting another woman. When she learned that she had lost her lover because she allowed her jealousy to trick her, she sorrowed and died. Even the conjure woman could not help her. Mabel listened to the story and then ran to her fiancé, who just happened to be close to the spot where Julius had stopped their carriage. Later on the young man seemed to develop a special fondness for Uncle Julius. After the wedding he tried to hire the old Negro into his service, but Uncle Julius remained faithful to his employers. He thought they needed his advice and help.

THE CONSCIOUS LOVERS

Author: Sir Richard Steele (1672-1729)

Type of plot: Sentimental comedy

Time of plot: Early eighteenth century

First presented: 1722

Principal characters:

YOUNG BEVIL, a young gentleman of fortune

SIR JOHN BEVIL, young Bevil's father

INDIANA DANVERS, a girl befriended by young Bevil

LUCINDA SEALAND, engaged to young Bevil

MR. SEALAND, Lucinda's father

MR. MYRTLE, young Bevil's friend, in love with Lucinda Sealand

MR. CIMBERTON, a suitor for Lucinda Sealand's hand

Critique:

The Conscious Lovers, often called Steele's finest play, began the vogue of sentimental comedy and marked a departure from the comedy of manners popular during the late eighteenth century. In this drama the virtues of the true gentleman, as opposed to those of the wit and fop, are clearly demonstrated. The characters are frankly middle-class people instead of the nobility. The lovers are frank in their affections and the father is portrayed as the object of filial affection, whereas in earlier drama he had been the object of ridicule, often a bar to the enjoyment of a fortune. As a social reformer Steele advanced two doctrines: the abolishment of marriage as simply a contractual affair, and the absurdity of the barbaric practice of dueling. The latter doctrine he had presented earlier in a famous number of The Spectator. Steele, unlike earlier dramatists of the period, sought to give good examples to his audiences.

The Story:

Young Bevil, a gentleman of some fortune, was engaged to marry the daughter of Mr. Sealand. Although he was not in love with the girl, he had agreed to marry her at his father's request. On the day of the marriage, however, there was some doubt that the marriage would take place, for the bride's father had discovered that Bevil was paying the bills of a young woman he had brought back from France. Fearing that the young woman, called Indiana, was Bevil's mistress, Mr. Sealand did not want to see his daughter married to a man who kept another woman.

The fathers did not know that Bevil had sent a letter to Lucinda Sealand which gave her his permission to break off the marriage at that late date. Bevil had done so because he knew that Lucinda was really in love with his friend, Mr. Myrtle, and because he himself wanted to marry Indiana. Shortly after the letter was sent, Sir John's valet told young Bevil that the marriage would probably be broken by Mr. Sealand. Bevil then confided in the servant that Indiana was the daughter of the British merchant named Danvers, who had disappeared in the Indies soon after the ship in which Indiana, her mother, and her aunt had been traveling to join him had been captured by French privateers.

Shortly afterward Myrtle arrived at Bevil's apartment and told his friend that a third marriage arrangement was in the wind that day. Mrs. Sealand was trying to wed her daughter to Mr. Cimberton, a queer fellow with peculiar ideas about wives and a great deal of money; Mrs. Sealand was willing to overlook strange notions in favor of the fortune her daughter might marry. The only thing that prevented the marriage contract from being settled that day was the non-appearance of Cimberton's wealthy uncle. Bevil suggested to Myrtle that he and Bevil's servant Tom, an artful rascal, disguise themselves as lawyers and go to the Sealand house in an attempt to prevent the marriage or, at least, to find out what could be done to keep the contract from being signed.

Meanwhile Indiana's aunt was cautioning her against the attentions of Bevil. The aunt could not believe, despite Indiana's reports of Bevil's behavior, that the young man was helping Indiana and paying her bills without intending to make her his mistress. As they continued to argue, Bevil himself appeared. Indiana tried to learn in private conversation what his intentions were, for she loved him very much. He would only reply that he did everything for her because he found pleasure in doing good. Wanting him to love her, she felt rather hurt. Secretly, Bevil had promised himself that he would never tell her of his affection as long as his father had not given permission for a marriage to her.

At the Sealand house, in the meantime, Lucinda was subjected to the humiliation of an inspection by Mr. Cimberton, who in company with Mrs. Sealand looked at Lucinda as he might look at a prize mare he was buying for his stable. While they were talking over her good and bad points, Myrtle and Bevil's servant, disguised as lawyers, put in their appearance. They learned very little, except that Mrs. Sealand was determined to wed her daughter to Cimberton as soon as possible. Upon leaving the house, Bevil's servant received a letter from Lucinda for his master. Myrtle, who was of a very jealous disposition, suspected duplicity on Bevil's part and instantly sent him a challenge to a duel.

Myrtle appeared at Bevil's apartment a few minutes after his challenge. Bevil refused at first to be a party to a duel, but when Myrtle heaped many insults upon Bevil and Indiana, calling the latter Bevil's whore, his language so enraged Bevil that he said he would fight. A moment later Bevil regained control of himself. Realizing how foolish a duel would be, he showed Myrtle the letter from Lucinda, which only thanked Bevil for giving her permission to break off the wedding.

Sir John and Mr. Sealand met. Mr. Sealand refused to go on with the marriage that day until he had satisfied himself as to the relationship between Indiana and Bevil. Sir John agreed to wait until the investigation had been made.

Bevil and Myrtle decided to make one more attempt to terminate the possible marital arrangements of Mrs. Sealand for her daughter. Myrtle disguised himself as Cimberton's uncle and went to the Sealand house. There Lucinda discovered his identity, but she kept it from her mother and the unwelcome suitor.

At the same time Mr. Sealand had gone to Indiana's home. As soon as he entered the house Indiana's aunt recognized him as someone she had known before, but she decided not to reveal herself to him. Questioned, Indiana said that she had been befriended by Bevil but that he had made no effort to seduce her. Her deportment and her narrative assured Mr. Sealand that there was no illicit relationship between the two. When she had finished her story, telling of her lost father and the capture of herself, her mother, and her aunt by French privateers, he asked her father's name. She told him it was Danvers. Mr. Sealand then announced that Indiana was his long-lost daughter, and he identified some trinkets she had as those belonging to his first wife and their child. When Indiana's aunt appeared, identifying herself as Mr. Sealand's sister, he recognized her at once. He told them that he had changed his name after undergoing certain difficulties in the Indies.

Mr. Sealand readily agreed to a marriage between his new-found daughter and Bevil. At that moment Sir John, young Bevil, and a group from the Sealand house arrived. Sir John, hearing the news, was pleased at the prospect of a marriage between Indiana and his son. Bevil, anxious to aid his friend Myrtle, then requested that a marriage be arranged between his friend and Lucinda Sealand. Cimberton tried to intercede on his own behalf until Mr. Sealand informed him that only half his fortune would now go to Lucinda. Cimberton, who was more anxious for the money than the girl, departed in a huff, whereupon Myrtle, who was still disguised as Cimberton's uncle, threw off the disguise and claimed Lucinda for his bride.

CORIOLANUS

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Historical tragedy

Time of plot: Third century

Locale: Rome, Corioli, and Antium

First presented: c. 1609

Principal characters:

CAIUS MARCIUS CORIOLANUS, a noble Roman TITUS LARTIUS, and
COMINIUS, generals against the Volscians
MENENIUS AGRIPPA, friend of Coriolanus
TULLUS AUFIDIUS, general of the Volscians SICINIUS VELUTUS, and JUNIUS BRUTUS, tribunes of the people
VOLUMNIA, mother of Coriolanus
VIRGILIA, wife of Coriolanus

Critique:

The Tragedy of Coriolanus, a powerful study of a man's willful spirit and his inability to follow the advice of those who would help him, moves with a fluency not found in all of Shakespeare's plays. This faster tempo is the result, chiefly, of a terseness of line and a highly compact unity of plot. The play is devoid of prolonged soliloquy and subplot to divert the attention, with the whole action so closely geared to the title character that the play leaves but a single impression upon audience and reader alike.

The Story:

Caius Marcius, a brilliant soldier, was attempting to subdue a mob in Rome when he was summoned to lead his troops against the Volscians from Corioli. The Volscians were headed by Tullus Aufidius, also a great soldier and perennial foe of Marcius. The hatred the two leaders had for each other fired their military ambitions. Marcius' daring as a warrior, known by all since he was sixteen, led him to pursue the enemy inside the very gates of Corioli. Locked inside the city, he and his troops fought so valiantly that they overcame the Volscians. Twice wounded, the victorious general was garlanded and hailed as Caius Marcius Coriolanus.

On his return to Rome, Coriolanus was further proclaimed by patrician, consul, and senator; and he was recommended for the office of consul, an appointment whole-heartedly approved by the nobles. Because the citizens also had to vote on his appointment, Coriolanus, accompanied by Menenius Agrippa, went to Sicinius and Brutus, the plebian tribunes, to seek their approval.

The people had long held only contempt for Coriolanus because of his arrogance and inhumane attitude toward all commoners. Although coached and prompted by Menenius to make his appeal as a wound-scarred soldier of many wars, Coriolanus was not able to bring himself to solicit the citizens' approval. He could only request and demand their support, which he got from individuals approached at random on the streets.

But Brutus and Sicinius, as representatives of the common people, were not willing to endorse the elevation of Coriolanus to office. Voicing the opinions of many citizens in their accusations against Coriolanus for his abuses in denying the people food from the public storehouses and for his insolence, Brutus and Sicinius urged the citizens to rescind their votes for Coriolanus. They pointed out that his military prowess was not to be denied, but that this very attribute would result in further suppression and misery for the people. Coriolanus' ambitions, they predicted, would lead to his complete domination of the government, thereby destroying their democracy.

The repeated pleading by Menenius, Cominius, and the senators that Coriolanus relent and approach the tribunes civilly in order to realize his political desires gave rise to Volumnia's admonition that he take the measures advised and gain the election. Volumnia, appealing to his responsibility as a Roman, pointed out that service to one's country was not shown on the battlefield alone and that Coriolanus must use certain strategies and tactics for victory in peace as well as in war.

Coriolanus misconstrued his mother's suggestions. She had taught him arrogance, nurtured his desires in military matters, and boasted of his strength and of her part in developing his dominating personality. Because of her attitude, Coriolanus inferred that his mother in her older years was asking for submissiveness and compliance. Although he promised Volumnia that he would deal kindly with the people, it was impossible for him to relent.

Virgilia, his wife, who had never condoned his soldiership, lent her pleas to those of the group, but he spurned her appeal to his vanity as a capable political leader and to his responsibility as a father and husband.

Coriolanus' persistence in his derision and mockery of the citizens led to an uprising against him. Drawing his sword, he would have stood alone against the mob, but Menenius and Cominius, fearing that the demonstration might result in an overthrow of the government, prevailed upon him to withdraw to his house before the crowd assembled.

Coriolanus, mistaking the requests of his friends and family that he yield to the attitudes of the common people for denials of loyalty and devotion to him, displayed such arrogance that he was banished from Rome. Tullus Aufidius, learning what was happening, prepared his armies to take advantage of the civil unrest in Rome.

Coriolanus, in disguise for protection against the many who would avenge the deaths of those whom he had killed earlier, went to Antium to offer his services to Aufidius against Rome. When Coriolanus removed his disguise, Aufidius, who well knew the Roman's ability as a military leader, willingly accepted his presence and his offer to aid in the Volscian campaign. Aufidius divided his army in order that he and Coriolanus each could lead a unit, thereby broadening the scope of his efforts against the Romans. Aufidius foresaw in his plan the possibility of avenging his earlier defeats by Coriolanus. When they had taken Rome, Aufidius thought, the hatred the Romans held for Coriolanus would make easy his dominance over the arrogant patrician.

The Romans heard with dismay of Coriolanus' affiliation with Aufidius; their only hope, it was claimed, was to appeal to Coriolanus to spare the city. Although Menenius and Cominius blamed the tribunes for the banishment of Coriolanus, they went as messengers to the great general in his camp outside the gates of Rome. Unsuccessful in their efforts, Cominius returned to inform the citizens that Coriolanus, in spite of old friendships, would not be swayed in his intentions to annihilate the city. Coriolanus could not, Cominius reported, take time to find the few grains who were his friends among all the chaff that he intended to burn.

Menenius, sent to appeal again to Coriolanus, met with the same failure. Coriolanus maintaining that his ears were stronger against the pleas than the city gates were against his might. Calling the attention of Aufidius to his firm stand against the Romans, he asked Aufidius to report his conduct to the Volscian lords. Aufidius promised and praised the general for his stalwartness. While Coriolanus was vowing that he would not hear the pleas of another Roman, he was interrupted by women's voices calling his name.

The petitioners were Volumnia, Virgilia, and young Marcius, his son. Re-affirming to Aufidius his determination to demolish Rome, he told the callers he would not be moved, and he urged Aufidius to observe his unyielding spirit. Volumnia answered that their requests for leniency and mercy were in vain since he had already proclaimed against kindness; therefore, they would not appeal to him. She also declared that he made it impossible for them to pray to the gods; they could not pray for victory for Rome, because such supplication would be against him, and to pray for his success in the campaign was to betray their country. Volumnia suggested that she was not seeking advantage for either the Romans or the Volscians. Asking only for reconciliation between the two governments, she declared that Coriolanus would be a hero to both sides if he could arrange an honorable peace between them.

Moved by his mother's reasoning, Aufidius announced to Aufidius that he would frame a convenient peace between the two forces. Even Aufidius declared that he had been moved by Volumnia's solemn pleas and wise words. Volumnia, Virgilia, and young Marcius returned to Rome, there to be welcomed for the success of their intercession with Coriolanus.

Aufidius withdrew to Antium to await the return of Coriolanus and their meeting with the Roman ambassadors. But as Aufidius reviewed the incidents of the day, he realized that peace would nullify his plan for revenge against Coriolanus. Also, he was aware of the favorable regard the Volscians had for the Roman. He had to remove the man who had been his conqueror in war and who might become his subduer in peace. At a meeting of the Volscian lords Aufidius announced that Coriolanus had betrayed the Volscians by depriving them of victory. In the confusion he stabbed Coriolanus to death. Regretting his deed, he then eulogized Coriolanus and said that he would live forever in men's memory. One of the Volscian lords pronounced Coriolanus the most noble corpse that was ever followed to the grave.

THE CORSICAN BROTHERS

Author: Alexandre Dumas, father (1802-1870)

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: 1841

Locale: Corsica and Paris

First published: 1845

Principal characters:

ALEXANDRE DUMAS, narrator of the story and traveler in Corsica
LUCIEN DE FRANCHI, a Corsican at whose home Dumas spent a night
LOUIS DE FRANCHI, Lucien's brother, and a law student in Paris
EMELIE, a married woman with whom Louis is in love
M. DE CHATEAU-RENAUD, Louis' rival for Emelie's affections

Critique:

The story of Lucien and Louis, two brothers unlike in temperament and interests, yet held together by a bond which stretches even beyond the grave, is in the true romantic vein. The pace of the novel never lags; its colorfulness is in the florid, robust tradition of French romanticism.

The Story:

In March, 1841, Alexandre Dumas was traveling, with his horse and guide, on the island of Corsica. One day he arrived at the top of a hill overlooking the towns of Olmeto and Sullacaro; and in accordance with the custom followed by travelers on that island, he surveyed the scene before him in order to decide at whose house he would spend the night.

Hospitality was an ancient art on Corsica, where it was considered an honor to entertain a guest without recompense. From his vantage point Dumas decided upon a house which his guide informed him was the Sullacaro property of Madame Savilia de Franchi.

The weary traveler was cordially welcomed by Madame de Franchi and shown to the room of her absent son, Louis. She promised that her other son would soon be home and would pay his respects on his arrival. A few minutes later young Lucien de Franchi knocked at the guest's door.

Dumas gathered from the youth's conversation that there was little likeness between the twin de Franchi brothers in appearance or tastes. Lucien, browned and robust, was dressed in riding clothes. He could not, he said, be forced to leave his native mountains. Louis, he declared, was a student who had spent most of his time indoors with his books. In spite of variance in interests, Lucien continued, they were devoted to each other.

So that they might continue their conversation while he dressed, Lucien invited the guest to his room, a chamber in contrast with that of the absent Louis. The student's room was furnished in the modern French manner and filled with books. Lucien's furniture was all of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and the walls were hung with weapons of every type. Lucien exhibited two pistols, each bearing a similar date and inscription on its butt, which had belonged to his father and mother.

When the two men rejoined Madame de Franchi, she anxiously asked Lucien if he had anything to tell her about Louis. He replied that he had not. To the guest Lucien explained that the brothers, born attached and cut apart, experienced like impressions at the same time. Because he had felt melancholy for the past few days, he knew his brother must be in trouble. He knew Louis was not dead, however, for if he had been he would have seen his twin in a vision.

At dinner Lucien explained that he had to go out later, as he had been chosen mediator to bring to an end an ancient vendetta between the Orlandi and Colonna families. That evening Lucien was to meet with the leader of the Orlandi clan at a ruin about a league from town so that a reconciliation might take place the following day. He invited Dumas to accompany him.

In the moonlight they climbed a hill on which stood the ruins of an old house which had belonged to an ancestress of the de Franchis, a woman who some four hundred years before had become involved in a feud with the de Guidice family. The pistols in Lucien's room celebrated the end of the vendetta, concluded when his parents had simultaneously killed two brothers, the last of their hereditary enemies.

The head of the Orlandi clan agreed, after some urging, to bring his family to Sullacaro the following morning so that a peace treaty with the Colonna clan might be signed. After Lucien had shot a pheasant, he and his guest began their descent to the town.

The following morning Dumas was on hand to witness the conciliation of the Orlandi and Colonna families as they marched from either end of the town to stand before the church. After a pact had been signed before the village notary, the clan leaders attended mass together.

That afternoon Dumas was forced to leave for Paris. After exchanging his hunting belt for one of Lucien's daggers, he started for the coast. Lucien had given Dumas a letter for his brother, and Madame de Franchi had begged that he himself should deliver it. The author sought out the young man immediately on his arrival in Paris. Louis was not at home. In answer to a note left by Dumas, he came to call the next day. Dumas was surprised at the resemblance between Louis and his brother. In response to inquiries, the young man admitted that he had been suffering from a bitter private grief. Unfortunately, he was in a hurry and could not stay long that day. It was agreed that he and Dumas would meet the following night at an opera ball.

When he kept his appointment with his new friend, Louis appeared distraught and at first did not want to accompany Dumas to a supper party to be given after the ball by D—, a friend of the writer. When he understood, however, that a M. de Chateau-Renaud would be present and that this gentleman had a bet with his host that he would bring a certain unidentified personage with him, the Corsican declared he would go.

At the party Dumas and Louis discovered that de Chateau-Renaud had gambled on bringing a young married woman with him and on being able to present her before four o'clock. The couple arrived only a few minutes before the hour, the man forcing rather than escorting his companion. When she realized, from the few words which de Chateau-Renaud let slip to their host, that she had been the object of a bet, she insisted on leaving immediately and asked Louis to take her home. When the young man consented, he was challenged by de Chateau-Renaud. Although he had never handled a weapon, Louis accepted the challenge.

Later that day Dumas called on his young friend and agreed to serve as a second in the duel. Louis explained that Emelie, the young woman whose cause he had championed, had been entrusted to his care by her husband, a sea captain. Deeply in love with her, he had made every effort to conceal his passion. When, to his dismay, he realized she was carrying on an affair with de Chateau-Renaud, he had attempted to reprove her but had been accused of jealousy for his pains. Then, by chance, he had been invited to D—'s party, where Emelie had appeared as the result of de Chateau-Renaud's wager.

The duel, with pistols, was to take place next morning at nine. Dumas arrived at Louis' rooms at seven-thirty and found the young man writing a letter in which he informed his mother and brother that he was writing in a lucid interval, but that he would soon be dead of brain fever. He explained to Dumas that he had been visited by his father the previous night and been told that he would die. Not wishing his family to know the true circumstances of his death, he asked his friend to send the letter so that Lucien would not come to Paris seeking vengeance and so, perhaps, be killed.

The young Corsican died, as he had predicted. A bullet entered below his sixth rib, and came out just above his hip on the other side of his body. Dumas mailed the letter as he had promised.

Five days later he was surprised by a visit from Lucien, who could not yet have learned of his brother's fate. The Corsican declared he had been out riding the day his brother was killed, and at the moment of Louis' death he had felt as though a bullet had pierced him also. To Dumas' astonishment, he showed an inflamed mark below the sixth rib on his own body. The following morning he had set out for Paris, with his mother's blessing.

Two days later Lucien stood facing de Chateau-Renaud on the spot where his brother had fallen. An instant later de Chateau-Renaud lay dead, a bullet through his head, and Lucien shed his first tears since Louis' death.

THE COSSACKS

Author: Count Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: The Caucasus

First published: 1863

Principal characters:

OLYENIN, a Russian aristocrat

MARYANKA, a Cossack girl

LUKASHKA, a young Cossack, betrothed to Maryanka

UNCLE YEROSHKA, an old Cossack retired from service

Critique:

The Cossacks is one of Tolstoy's lesser known and shorter novels, but in it is one of the finest pictures of Cossack life and the Cossack people in all Russian literature. Against that primitive background Tolstoy placed two psychological problems. The first is that of a young man who wants to love and who wants to fit into society. The second problem is that of the difficulty of a primitive society in accepting the domination of a higher culture. In the reactions of a Russian aristocrat and a Cossack girl one sees quite clearly the same problems that occurred when a body of Russians appeared in a Cossack village to aid in defending the borders. The two groups could not at all times admire, respect, or conceive affection for one another, despite the fact that they were allied against a strong and determined foe.

The Story:

Olyenin, a young Russian aristocrat, decided to leave the society of Moscow and enter the army as a junior officer for service in the Caucasus. There were a number of reasons for his decision: he had squandered a large part of his estate, he was bored with what he considered an empty life, and he was in some embarrassment because of a love affair in which he could not reciprocate the woman's love.

Olyenin left the city after a farewell party one cold, wintry night. He and his servant, Vanyusha, traveled steadily southward toward the Caucasus, land of the Cossacks. The farther Olyenin went on his journey the better he felt about the new life he was about to begin. In a year's service he saw the opportunity to save money, to rearrange his philosophy, and to escape from a mental state which did not permit him to love. He was sure that in a new environment he could become less egocentric, that he could learn to love others as he loved himself.

Shortly after he joined his unit, he was one of a force sent out along the Terek river line to guard against depredations by the tribes who lived in the mountains and on the steppes south of the river. The troops were to reinforce the Cossacks who lived in the narrow strip of verdant land which bordered the river. Olyenin's unit was stationed in the village of Novomlin, a small settlement of houses and farms with a population of less than two thousand people, mainly Cossacks.

The Cossack men spent their time in hunting and standing guard at posts along the Terek river, while the women tended the homes and farms. When Olyenin's unit moved into the village, he, as an aristocrat, was not assigned duties with the troops, and so his time was largely his own.

The Cossacks did not like the Russian troops, for there were years of enmity and different cultures to be reconciled. Olyenin, quartered in the house of a Cossack ensign, soon learned that he was not welcome. They were accepting him and his servant only because the household had to take them in.

In the house lived an ensign, his wife, and their daughter Maryanka. The girl had been spoken for in marriage by a young Cossack, Lukashka, a hero in his village because he had saved a boy from death by drowning and had killed a mountain tribesman who had attempted to swim across the river during a raid. Olyenin quickly became infatuated with Maryanka. He did not know how to act in her presence, however, because he was bewildered by the possibility of a love affair between himself and the young, uncultured Cossack girl.

Olyenin made friends with Lukashka, whom he met at an outpost while hunting, and Uncle Yeroshka, an old Cossack whose days of service were over. In Yeroshka's company Olyenin went hunting almost every day. He disliked drinking bouts, gambling at cards with the other officers, and the pleasure they found in pursuing the women of the village whose husbands and sweethearts were away on duty. Olyenin was happier alone or with Yeroshka hunting in the woods along the Terek, where he could try to work out his emotional problems.

At last Olyenin began to feel that he could be happy through generosity to others. He discovered that he enjoyed giving a horse to Lukashka and presenting old Yeroshka with small gifts that meant little to Olyenin but a great deal to the old man. In addition, Olyenin won the respect of the Cossacks by his ability to shoot pheasants on the wing, a new feat to the Cossacks, who had never even seen it done before.

As time passed Olyenin became more and more aware of Maryanka's presence. When the girl's parents announced that she was formally engaged to young Lukashka, the announcement made Olyenin decide that he, too, was really in love with her. He turned over in his mind the possibilities that such a love would entail. He could not imagine taking the girl back to Moscow, into the society to which he had expected to return after his tour of duty, nor could he imagine settling down for life in the Cossack village. Although his stay there meant a great deal to him, he knew that he could never be happy following the primitive life he saw there, for he had too many ties, both social and material, in the world he had temporarily left.

While Olyenin helped Maryanka pick grapes in the vineyards, he had an opportunity to declare his love. Maryanka neither became angry nor repulsed him, although she gave him little encouragement. Later Olyenin, able to press his suit at various times, promised to marry the Cossack girl. She, on her part, refused to say that she would marry him, for she too realized the difficulties such a marriage would bring about. Unlike most of the Cossack girls, she was not free with her favors and refused to let either Olyenin or Lukashka share her bed. Lukashka, well aware of what was happening, was not worried; he felt that the situation would right itself because he was actually the better man of the two.

One day a small band of marauders from across the Terek appeared a short distance from the village. When the Cossacks, accompanied by Olyenin, made a sortie against them, the outlaws tied themselves together, so that they could not run away while they made a stand against the Cossacks. After the battle Lukashka, wounded by a gunshot, was carried back to the village, where it was discovered that he could not recover from his wound. Maryanka, faced with the death of the man her parents had chosen as her husband, realized that her life and people were widely separated from Olyenin and the culture for which he stood. Deciding that she could never have any lasting affection for the Russian, she told Olyenin bluntly of her decision. Olyenin requested a change of duty to another unit. Permission for the transfer having been granted, he and his servant left the village and the kind of life he never could learn to accept.

Principal characters:

NAN PRINCE, a student of medicine

MRS. THACHER, her grandmother

DR. LESLIE, her guardian

MISS NANCY PRINCE, her aunt

Critique:

Sarah Orne Jewett's A Country Doctor is a good example of the local color novel.

The plot is simple and subordinated to the description of the environment and the customs and habits of the people therein, but the novel is a highly successful and satisfying book.

The Story:

One cold winter night while Mrs. Thacher and two of her neighbors were sitting around the stove and gossiping about neighborhood activities, they were interrupted by a noise at the door. Adeline Thacher Prince had fallen on the doorstep. In her arms she held her infant daughter, Nan. Dr. Leslie was sent for at once but by the next day Adeline was dead. According to her wishes, Dr. Leslie became the little child's guardian, though she lived with her maternal grandmother.

Nan's mother had left home to go to work in a textile mill in Lowell. There she had fallen in love with a young man from Dunport, Maine, and after a short courtship she had married him. The marriage had been far from happy. Adeline had inherited a wild, rebellious tendency, and it was whispered in Dunport that she had eventually taken to drink. She resented, furthermore, the opposition of her husband's family to the marriage, especially the views of her husband's sister, Miss Nancy Prince. After Adeline's husband died, she tried for a time to support herself and the child. When she could do so no longer, she trudged back to Oldfields to die in her mother's home.

Little Nan seemed to exhibit some of her mother's characteristics, for she was mischievous and inclined to pleasure. Her grandmother often thought her a trial, but to Dr. Leslie she was something quite different. One day Nan retrieved a fallen bird with a fractured leg and applied a splint, as she had seen Dr. Leslie do to his patients. The doctor began to wonder if Nan had not inherited some tendency toward medicine which her father had had. He did not insist that she go to school. He thought that the training she received in the woods and the fields was far more beneficial than any she would obtain in the schoolroom.

When Mrs. Thacher died, Nan went to live with Dr. Leslie. Between the two there was a great feeling of affection. Nan, who continued to go out on calls with the doctor, exhibited much interest in his work. The time came at last for her to be sent to boarding-school. At first she was shy and rather backward in her studies, but after a while she made admirable progress. She would have been completely satisfied with her life if she had not wondered, from time to time, about the mysterious aunt of whom she had heard only rumors. Mrs. Thacher had never explained anything of the girl's family background to her, and Nan had conjured up the figure of a wealthy aristocratic relative who would one day send for her. Miss Prince, who had inherited a large estate, regularly sent money to Dr. Leslie to provide for Nan's upkeep. The doctor never touched a penny of it. When Adeline had died, Miss Prince had asked for the custody of the child, but Mrs. Thacher and Dr. Leslie had refused her request.

When Nan grew older, she told Dr. Leslie of her desire to study medicine. Although the doctor was aware of the difficulties she would face, he approved heartily of her interest. But the town of Oldfields did not, and many were shocked at the idea of a woman doctor. Nan continued her studies in the doctor's books, however, and acted as his nurse. That training she was to continue at a medical school in a nearby city.

When the time came for her to leave Oldfields, Nan wrote a brief note to her aunt, Miss Prince, and asked if she might visit her father's sister. Miss Prince, although she feared that Nan might be like her mother, consented to receive her niece. On Nan's arrival in Dunport, Miss Prince, genuinely pleased with her, helped Nan to make friends and openly acknowledged her young relative. But when Nan expressed her wish to study medicine, everyone was shocked, even Miss Prince, who in a large measure blamed Dr. Leslie for Nan's unladylike desire for a professional career. Nan, although made unhappy by her aunt's objections, remained adamant.

Her aunt and her friends, however, sought to lead her astray from her work. Miss Prince had a favorite friend, young George Gerry, to whom she intended leaving her money. When Nan grew fond of George, everyone hoped that they would marry. One day, during an outing, Nan and George stopped at a farmhouse, and Nan treated a farmer who had thrown his arm out of joint. Sometime later, George asked Nan to marry him. She refused, both because she wanted to become a doctor and because she was afraid that her inherited characteristics might cause her to be a bad wife.

At last she told her aunt that she would have to return to Oldfields. On her arrival, the doctor, who had been apprehensive that Nan might have been influenced by Miss Prince and her money, was pleasantly surprised. She was the same Nan she had been before, and all the more ambitious for a successful medical career.

Nan went away to study. When she returned, Dr. Leslie was older and needed more help in his practice. Nan settled down in Oldfields and slowly the community accepted her. Before many years passed she had succeeded Dr. Leslie in the affections of the men and women of the village.

PIERRE JOSEPH GENESTAS, a soldier

DR. BENASSIS, physician and mayor

LA FOSSEUSE, a social waif

Critique:

The plot of The Country Doctor is spare and concise. The various country folk appear only as incidental to the busy doctor's life, for the main narrative thread concerns only Genestas' visit and its consequences. For most readers the true interest of the novel lies in Benassis' present existence and the mystery of his past. Interesting as the people are, they appear only as sketches. Genestas himself is but half drawn. The reader would like to know more about La Fosseuse and Judith, but they are shadowy types. The good doctor, however, emerges as one of Balzac's real creations; his is a sympathetic portrayal. The book belongs to the unfinished series of novels, "Scenes of Country Life."

The Story:

Pierre Joseph Genestas had long been a simple soldier. He always did his duty well and silently; this lack of ostentation and his reserved nature made his promotion slow. He had followed Napoleon from Egypt to Moscow, but the monarchy showed him little gratitude or recognition for his services. Now he rode slowly along a mountain road in the direction of the Grande Chartreuse to seek out Dr. Benassis.

A rather sullen peasant woman gave him a drink of milk and pointed out Benassis' house, but when he got there the doctor was out. When he finally found the man he sought, Genestas came upon a strange scene. A cretin was on his deathbed in a miserable hovel. It seemed to Genestas that the whole village must have crowded around the humble cottage in a remote section of the town, for they regarded the dying cretin with superstitious awe. As the religious procession entered the hut, Genestas and the doctor took their leave, the soldier curious about what he had seen. Benassis told him that not long before he had been stoned in the same poor quarter of the town.

Eight years ago, when Benassis first came to practice in the village, the place had only seven hundred inhabitants; now there were two thousand. Once the district where the cretin died had been a settlement of mental defectives. Benassis, as the only health official in the town, had condemned the district and removed all but one of the cretins to an asylum. This change had been accomplished against the will of the village, but gradually the inhabitants had come to understand the doctor's unselfish wisdom.

Although the village was not far from Grenoble, the peasants could not trade with the big city because there was no road between the town and the village. Benassis' first project had been to build a road across the valley. Now it was a broad straight highway lined with Lombardy poplars, and the peasants' carts went constantly to Grenoble with produce.

Benassis, having been elected mayor, was shrewd enough to get the former mayor on his side. Many projects, all encouraged and financed by the mayor, brought jobs and money to the town. There were tile works, an osier-basket works, a mill, and many more farms. With selfless devotion the mayor had built up both the population and the prosperity of the village.

On the excuse that his old wounds needed attention, Genestas arranged to stay for a time with the mayor. When he was ready to go to bed the first night, he found his own room comfortable, even luxurious. By contrast, Benassis' room was monastic in simplicity. Genestas resolved to pierce the secret of this strange doctor mayor.

In the morning Genestas made the rounds with his doctor host. They visited two houses of mourning where the fathers had just died. Among the poorer folk death was a natural occurrence; among the richer people the father's death was a sign for much lamentation, many visitors, and elaborate mourning garments. The contrast emphasized the fact that Benassis was equally at home with all classes, and equally welcome.

From one house to another the pair continued that whole day. Everywhere the fields were carefully cultivated and the stock was cleanly housed. Laborers were busy clearing new land in the level spots and draining marshes. Everywhere the peasants gave credit to Benassis for inspiration.

Near evening the two men called on La Fosseuse, a strange but beautiful girl who lived alone. She was supported by Benassis, for she had no talent with which to earn a living. Left an orphan, she had been brought up in a rich household, but the family had cast her out when she was sixteen. For years she had been forced to beg. Her body was frail and her spirit was changeable. All she could do was sew, but her attention wandered often and she seldom did much work. Genestas was impressed by the great devotion La Fosseuse showed toward Benassis.

That evening at dinner Genestas met the priest, the notary, the former mayor, and the justice of the peace. These dignitaries also showed great faith in Benassis' leadership. Truly the doctor was a great man.

On impulse Benassis confided to Genestas the secret of his life. Benassis had been born into a rich family. His father had sent him to good schools and eventually to Paris to study medicine. At first Benassis was a willing student, but before long he lost interest in his studies. Because his strict father gave him only a small allowance, the gay life of Paris was far beyond his reach. He met a devoted young girl and lived with her in contentment. Under her influence he regained his zest for work.

When his father died, Benassis inherited a fortune. On his return to Paris he was determined to cut a social figure, and he quickly ran through the inheritance after casting off his devoted mistress. Two years later, learning that the girl was dying, he went to see her. He made her a deathbed promise that he would care faithfully for their son.

Soon afterward he fell in love with the young daughter of a very religious family. On the advice of an older man, Benassis kept secret the story of his dead mistress and his child, and the family came to look on him as a man of upright character and their own son. Finally his conscience forced him to tell the girl of his past; in sorrow she renounced him. It was a crushing blow to Benassis. The final misfortune came when his son died. In expiation Benassis had buried himself in the little village in the Grande Chartreuse and there devoted himself to the poor and miserable peasants of the region.

Genestas was much affected by the story. A bond of sympathy with the doctor led him to tell his own story.

Genestas, with one of his friends, had been quartered in the house of a Jewish family in Poland after the retreat from Moscow. Judith, the daughter, had attracted him greatly, but she married his friend. Shortly afterward, when the friend was killed in battle, he left Judith pregnant. Before his death, however, he asked Genestas to marry Judith and look after the baby. After much scheming Genestas got Judith to Paris, where her son was born. Genestas married her on her deathbed and took her son as his own.

The boy, Adrien, was living with a tutor. He was well educated but in poor health. Although he was sixteen, he looked twelve. Genestas wanted Benassis to take the boy into his own home and rebuild his health. After seeing Adrien, Benassis declared he was only run-down, not consumptive, as had been feared. Benassis let the boy run with the village hunter and soon he was strong and healthy. His care of young Adrien was only one of his many good works throughout the countryside.

Genestas was given a regiment at Grenoble, his first real command. One day he received a letter from Adrien; Benassis was dead. Tired out, he had succumbed to a chill. Genestas hurried to the village, to be told on his arrival that Benassis had already been buried. Sorrowing workmen were erecting over his grave a huge mound topped with a monument. Weeping, La Fosseuse lay beside the grave.

MR. HORNER, a gallant alleged to be impotent

MR. PINCHWIFE, a jealous husband

MRS. PINCHWIFE, his dissatisfied wife

ALITHEA, Mr. Pinchwife's sister, a society woman

HARCOURT, a gallant in love with Alithea

Critique:

This play is the epitome of the spirit of the reign of Charles II. The plot is presented with Restoration boldness, depending as it does on the supposition of Horner's impotence and his amorous adventures with various wives who have been gulled into believing that he is incapable of feelings for the opposite sex. While the main device of the play is frankly indecent, the handling of the theme, particularly in the dialogue, is brilliant. Clever dialogue and the whimsicality of Mrs. Pinchwife's naïveté save the drama from approaching pornography, however, and raise the play to the realm of art. Because of the deftness of the handling, the reader usually finds himself laughing, along with the characters, at the duplicity of the women and their lover.

The Story:

Mr. Horner, a gallant with a bad reputation for seduction pretended that he had been made impotent through disease and caused word of his misfortune to be spread throughout the town by his quack doctor. Immediately, men who had been afraid to let him meet their wives for fear of seduction hastened to assure him that he could come to their homes and escort their women anywhere.

Horner's old companions among the town gallants teased him unmercifully and at first the women would have nothing to do with him. Among his friends was Jack Pinchwife, who was vastly afraid of being made a cuckold. He had not even let it be known that he was married. His wife was a woman from the country; she, he thought, did not know enough about fashionable city life to think of taking a lover.

Pinchwife made the mistake, however, of escorting his wife to a play, where she was seen by Horner and some of his friends. When Pinchwife returned to his lodgings, his wife, tired of being kept locked in the house, asked her husband to let her go walking. A relative, a woman from the town, spoke for her as well. Pinchwife became angry with both: at his wife for wanting to go out and at his relative who had, he claimed, been corrupting her morals. Pinchwife foolishly told his wife what she was missing in town life—plays, dinners, parties, and dances—and so aroused her interest in all that he was attempting to keep from her for the sake of his own honor.

When a party of women came to take his wife to the latest play, Pinchwife refused to let her go or even to see the visitors. He gave out the excuse that she had smallpox. The excuse failed. At the same time Horner and some other gallants came to call.

The women were urged by their husbands to let Horner take them to the theater, but they, in disgust, refused, until Horner himself whispered to one of them that the rumor spread about his impotency was untrue. Mrs. Pinchwife was forgotten and left behind.

After some time Mrs. Pinchwife became melancholy because she wished to enjoy the gayety her husband told her about but refused to let her see. At last Pinchwife agreed to take her to a play if she would dress as a man. On the way to the play, accompanied by Pinchwife's sister Alithea, they met the sister's fiancé, a simpleton who let his friend, Harcourt, pay court to Alithea. She, realizing that her fiancé was a fool, tried to treat Harcourt coolly, even though her fiancé was angry with her for doing so.

Before they arrived at the theater they met Horner. Pinchwife, in spite of all he had heard about Horner's impotence, was worried lest Horner penetrate Mrs. Pinchwife's disguise. Horner, recognizing Mrs. Pinchwife, teased the jealous husband by kissing the young "gentleman" and telling "him" the kiss was for his sister, Mrs. Pinchwife. Horner, in addition, told the "young man" that he was in love with Mrs. Pinchwife.

The following morning Alithea was dressed to marry her fiancé. The bridegroom came with a parson, actually Harcourt in disguise. Harcourt was still determined to take Alithea for his own, if he could. After some discussion the marriage was put off for a day.

Meanwhile Pinchwife tried to force his wife to send a letter calculated to discourage Horner's attentions, but she substituted a love letter for the one her husband had dictated. After taking the letter, Pinchwife locked her in her room and told her to stay away from the window.

In his own rooms, Horner held a discussion with his quack doctor and told him how well his scheme to fool husbands was working. In proof, a well-bred woman came to his rooms, but the opportunity was lost when her husband followed her. A few moments later two other women arrived, much chagrined when they found Horner entertaining other visitors.

Pinchwife, knowing nothing of the substitution, delivered the letter. Upon his return home he found his wife writing another love letter to Horner. Angered, he drew his sword, but he was interrupted by the entrance of Alithea's fiancé.

Mrs. Pinchwife lied her way out of the situation by saying she was writing the letter for Alithea, who, she said, was in love with Horner. Pinchwife, knowing that Horner was of as good family and as wealthy as his sister's fiancé, thought that by marrying Alithea to Horner he could keep his wife away from the rake. When he agreed to take Alithea to Horner, his wife disguised herself in Alithea's clothing and presented herself as Alithea to be taken to Horner's lodgings.

Pinchwife unsuspectingly took his wife to Horner and left to get a clergyman to marry the couple. On the way he met his sister's fiancé, who was puzzled by Pinchwife's tale. When they met the real Alithea, all were confused.

Shortly after Pinchwife had gone, three women appeared at Horner's lodgings. During the visit all three discovered that Horner had enjoyed their favors, while they each thought he was hers alone. After they left, Horner got rid of Mrs. Pinchwife after some little trouble; she wanted to leave her husband and live with Horner.

Pinchwife, Alithea, Harcourt, and the fiancé all arrived to clear up the mystery of the disguised Alithea. The men accused Horner of double-dealing, and Pinchwife threatened the gallant with his sword. Mrs. Pinchwife, who had been loitering nearby, entered the room. To save the honor of all concerned, Alithea's maidservant took the blame for lying. The doctor came in unexpectedly and testified again to the impotency of Horner. His report put all husbands at their ease again. Only Mrs. Pinchwife, who had been unable to leave her husband or to have Horner's favors, was out of sorts.

COUSIN PONS

Author: Honoré de Balzac (1799-1850)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: The 1840's

Locale: Paris

First published: 1847

Principal characters:

SYLVAIN PONS, an elderly musician and amateur art collector

SCHMUCKE, Pons' friend and fellow-musician

MADAME CIBOT, portress at Pons' residence

MONSIEUR DE MARVILLE, Pons' cousin

MADAME DE MARVILLE, M. de Marville's wife and enemy of Pons

FRAISIER, a rascally attorney

REMONENCQ, a friend and accomplice of Mme. Cibot

Critique:

Cousin Pons, like other of Balzac's novels, is a study of Parisian society in the mid-nineteenth century. Like Balzac's other work, also, it is a study of human nature in that vein of naturalism more common to writers of a half-century and more later, writers like Zola, Dreiser, and Frank Norris. There are no terms with squeamishness for Balzac. Indeed, he makes the reader often feel as if there can be no such aggregation of people anywhere but between the covers of a book. The hatred of mankind for one another, the grubbing after unearned inheritances, and the inhumanity of man to man all stand out in the most glaring colors in Balzac's work. Balzac himself said that only in Paris could one find the characters that he needed for his fiction. The reader is inclined to hope that such a race of men, if it ever did exist, exists no more.

The Story:

Sylvain Pons was an ugly man who had no family at all except one cousin, Monsieur de Marville, a rich and influential government official. Through his relative, Cousin Pons, as the de Marvilles called him, was able to dine out at a rich man's home at least once a week. Those opportunities satisfied one of Pons' two pleasures in life, a delight in good food well served. Pons' job as conductor of the orchestra at a ballet theater and his series of private music pupils gave him the money to live and to satisfy his other delight in life, collecting works of art.

By the time he was in his sixties. Pons had built up a collection worth over a million francs, though neither he nor anyone else realized that it was so valuable. Pons' only friend was a musician in his orchestra, an old German named Schmucke. The two men lived together in an apartment filled with Pons' art treasures. Their lives were extremely simple; the portress at the house, Madame Cibot, cooked for them and cleaned the apartment, and their work kept them busy most of the time. The only flaw in their existence, as Schmucke saw it, was the fact that Pons went out to dinner once a week and sometimes twice.

Even that flaw was remedied when Madame de Marville, the wife of Pons' cousin, grew tired of having the old man in her home and made her attitude obvious to him. He then began taking all his meals at home with Schmucke. But Pons was too fond of dining out on rich food to be happy with the arrangement, and he missed the company that he had enjoyed for over forty years. So, with Schmucke's help, he determined to try to make peace with Madame de Marville by securing a rich husband for Cécile, the de Marvilles' daughter. The attempt ended in failure, and as a result their house and the homes of all the de Marvilles' friends were closed to Pons, who was regarded as vicious and hateful.

The shock of finding that his cousin and all his cousin's connections would no longer speak to him, much less have him in their homes, was too much for Pons. He fell ill, and nothing the doctor could do helped him. His friend Schmucke tried to keep their small establishment going with the aid of Madame Cibot, who acted as a nurse while Schmucke worked at the theater or gave music lessons.

Unfortunately for the two old men, Madame Cibot learned that the art treasures lying about the apartment were extremely valuable. At first she thought only of having Pons set up an annuity for her at his death, in return for her nursing care, but her avarice finally caused her to conceive the idea of getting the entire fortune into her own hands. She took into her confidence a small dealer in bric-a-brac named Remonencq, who in turn enlisted the aid of Elie Magus, a Jew with a passion for art. The Jew, with the help of the other two, gained admittance to Pons' apartment and made an estimate of the collection's value. At the same time he made an agreement to pay Madame Cibot over forty thousand francs if she would get Schmucke, who knew nothing of art, to sell four of his friend's pictures for money to pay Pons' doctor bills.

Poor Schmucke, who thought only of saving his friend's life, readily agreed to sell four masterpieces, whose value he did not know, for a fraction of their true value. After they had been sold, thinking that Pons would never notice, he simply hung four other pictures in their places. Madame Cibot, delighted at her success in fleecing the old men, decided to try to get all of the collection and enlisted the aid of the doctor, who was a poor man, and a rascally attorney named Fraasier. Fraasier, who knew of Pons' influential relatives, pointed out to Madame Cibot that the relatives would fight any attempt by the portress to get the old man's estate. He also convinced her that they were powerful enough to send her to the guillotine if they could prove her guilt. Feeling that her only chance of success lay with him, Madame Cibot agreed to do what the attorney told her to do.

The attorney went to Madame de Marville, who was also avaricious, and told her of Pons' wealth and Pons' determination to leave it to Schmucke. Madame de Marville immediately agreed to do anything she could to gain the fortune for herself, for all the family's wealth had gone into her daughter's dowry. She promised to have her husband get good appointments for Fraasier and the doctor, and she consented to set up an annuity for Madame Cibot. Her husband, when she told him, agreed.

Fraasier and Madame Cibot then began to lay plans to find a way into Pons' confidence. Unfortunately for their designs, Pons became suspicious of Madame Cibot. His suspicions were confirmed when he awoke one afternoon to find Elie Magus, his rival collector, examining the art objects on the walls and tables. Summoning what strength he had left, Pons left his sickbed and staggered to the other rooms, where he discovered that his paintings were gone. He realized immediately that someone had been attempting to fleece him at poor Schmucke's expense. That night, after Schmucke had confessed to selling the paintings, he and Schmucke discussed what they could do. Pons forgave Schmucke, for he well knew that the German had no idea of the cash values of the paintings or the more personal value they had for Pons himself.

Pons drew up a will naming Madame Cibot as one of his heirs, in an attempt to deceive her as to his real intentions. He even left the will where she would see it. The portress was pleased, although the will did not provide for as much as she wanted. Fraasier, who also saw the document, was pleased because it was a will that could easily be broken in court for the benefit of the de Marville family. Pons had hoped that they would react in that way, and the following day he secretly made a new will which left his fortune to the crown, with the stipulation that in return the government should give Schmucke a lifetime annuity.

When Pons died shortly afterward, his death left poor Schmucke in a dreadful state. The German musician knew little of the world, and his friend's death left him without judgment or willpower. All he cared about was dying quickly in order to meet his friend in heaven. Because of his state of mind, the plotters felt that they would have little trouble in taking the estate away from him.

The de Marvilles, bringing a suit to break the will, hoped that Schmucke, to avoid trouble, would accept a small annuity and let them have the bulk of the estate. They were right in their belief, but just as the papers were about to be signed a messenger brought Schmucke a copy of the charges made in court against the old man, charges that he had influenced his friend in an attempt to get the estate. The shock to Schmucke was so great that he died within a few days, allowing the estate to go unchallenged to the de Marvilles, who had denied their cousin and despised him during his last years.

Many people gained by the deaths of Pons and Schmucke. The de Marvilles recouped their fortune; Fraasier, the rascally attorney, received an office of trust for his part in the affair; the doctor who had tended Pons received a sinecure; Elie Magus, the Jew, had his coveted pictures, and Madame Cibot had her annuity. She also had a new husband, for Remonencq, her fellow conspirator, poisoned her husband and then married her. Everyone, except Schmucke, the man Pons had wanted most to help, had benefited from Pons' fortune.

THE CRADLE SONG

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Spain

First presented: 1911

Principal characters:

SISTER JOANNA OF THE CROSS, eighteen years of age

TERESA, aged eighteen

THE PRIORESS, aged forty

THE VICARESS, aged forty

THE MISTRESS OF NOVICES, aged thirty-six

SISTER MARCELLA, aged nineteen

SISTER MARÍA JESÚS, aged nineteen

SISTER SAGRARIO, aged eighteen

SISTER INEZ, aged fifty

SISTER TORNERA, aged thirty

THE DOCTOR, aged sixty

ANTONIO, aged twenty-five

Critique:

G. Martínez Sierra served an apprenticeship in the theater as an actor under Jacinto Benavente, a prominent Spanish playwright, ten years before he wrote any plays of his own. Though not his first written play, The Cradle Song, Canción de Cuna in the original, was his first definite success in Madrid in 1911, in New York in 1921, in London in 1926, and again in New York in 1927, when Eva Le Gallienne brought it to her Civic Repertory Theater. Since that time it has been considered a success wherever it has been presented. Martínez Sierra's wife, usually his collaborator, had more than her usual interest in this play because it was reminiscent of her home town, where her father was the convent doctor and where his sister, Sister Joanna of the Cross in the play, became a nun. The two acts of the play are divided by a poem covering a lapse of eighteen years. This is a play of laughter and tears, in which the stifling of the mother instinct is the theme before which the characters pale.

The Story:

When the Prioress, the Mistress of Novices, the Vicareess and the other nuns begged her, Sister Joanna of the Cross consented to read the poem she had composed in celebration of the birthday of the Prioress. The Vicareess was sure that praise for the poem would lead to pride, a sin, but Sister Joanna of the Cross disclaimed all but a small part of the birthday present. She had composed the lines, it was true, but Sister María Jesús had copied the verses, Sister Sagrario painted the border, Sister Marcella tied the ribbons, and the Mistress of Novices made the gift possible by giving them the parchment and the ribbon.

The mayor's wife sent the Prioress a canary in a cage. The bird so delighted the novices that they begged permission to talk among themselves until time for prayers. The doctor interrupted them on his daily round. He looked at a felon Sister Sagrario had on her finger, and turned to prescribe for Sister María Jesús, who was melancholy. He asked her age and, when she said eighteen, he asked to see her face. It was a pretty one and he commented that the Lord had not bad taste. But, for a prescription? One of two things for a girl of that age: the Prioress could write the child's mother to take her home and provide a good husband, or Sister María Jesús would have to take cold baths every morning and say five Pater Nosters with each.

While the doctor and the Prioress went to see a bedridden sister, the novices stayed to guard the front grille. As they were talking, a bell rang by the grille, and a basket was placed on the revolving box by which gifts were brought into the cloister. The novices could not resist looking in the basket. Sister Marcella's cry when she saw a baby lying there brought all the other nuns back to determine the trouble. The Prioress read a letter, which had come in the basket, asking that the nuns bring up the baby because her mother could not keep her properly. The Vicarress was horrified that the sisters would even consider keeping the little girl. The doctor, remarking that legally the nuns had no right to maternity, proposed that he adopt the baby and leave her to be brought up in the convent. There were still other problems to be faced—the matters of feeding and clothing and tending the child—but Sister Joanna of the Cross had an answer for each. The gardener's wife, who had a baby of her own at the time, could help on all counts. The Prioress, thinking that the baby was the best of all birthday presents, appointed Sister Joanna of the Cross the child's guardian.

In the eighteen years that passed, the nuns spent all their pent-up love on the girl Teresa. She was a gay child, loving the gardens of the cloister and the adoring sisters; but it was easy to see that she would not spend her life as a hermit, though she was utterly devout. In time she met a man, Antonio, whom she promised to marry.

The nuns made for her an elaborate trousseau, hand-embroidered and trimmed with lace and blue ribbons. While they worked on fancy chemises, petticoats, and dressing jackets, one of their number would read aloud meditations of various sorts. As they tried to meditate, they were interrupted continually by Teresa's happy singing in the garden where she was picking flowers for the altar.

Sister Marcella had temptations to melancholy which the Prioress offered to alleviate by sending her out in the garden for a little sunshine, but Sister Marcella said that the flowers, the blue sky, and the sun tempted her to deeper melancholy. The other nuns sighed in accord. The Vicarress, on a round of inspection, had found a mirror hidden under Sister Marcella's mattress. Mirrors being definitely forbidden to the nuns, Sister Marcella was under deep suspicion of the sins of pride and vainglory. In confusion, she explained that when her melancholy became too deep, she used the mirror to catch a sunbeam and make it dance among the leaves, while pretending it was a bird or a butterfly that could go wherever it pleased. When Teresa came in to tell how she had had to climb the acacia trees to get enough white flowers for the altar, Sister Marcella's eyes grew wide with envy.

Teresa was bubbling over when she came to gather up her things before leaving the cloister for good. The nuns counseled a more subdued manner for the occasion. But Teresa could not be restrained, though she was grateful for all the love and care they had given her who would otherwise have been an outcast and a beggar. The nuns wanted no thanks; the convent had been her home as well as theirs, even if she could not feel the desire to join them by entering their order.

While they gathered together the pieces of the trousseau to put into Teresa's trunk, the Vicaress grumbled about the Devil's hand on the fashion sheets the sisters had used as patterns; but even she relented enough to tell Teresa that she deserved all the nuns had done for her because she had always worked for them inside the convent and out. Then the Vicaress gave Teresa an itemized account of the money the doctor, as foster father, had given for the materials in her trousseau.

When the packing was finished, Teresa and Sister Joanna of the Cross were left together to await the coming of Antonio, the groom-to-be, and the doctor, who was to drive Teresa to the train. Teresa admitted that she had always considered Sister Joanna of the Cross her own mother, and asked her blessing. Sister Joanna of the Cross admitted that Teresa had been her whole happiness all the years they had been together, that Teresa's coming into the cloister had dissipated the melancholy which had followed her own separation from the family she loved.

When Antonio came to the curtained grille, he assured Sister Joanna of the Cross that he would take care of Teresa because he loved her dearly, but that he knew she would never forget the peace and calm of the convent. As the sister went for the others to meet Antonio, he told Teresa that he had found honor, self-respect, and sympathy for his fellow-man in loving her.

Hating to see Teresa go, the nuns tried to give Antonio instructions in her care. The Vicaress asked for and received his pledge that he would always respect the fear of God that Teresa would carry out of the cloister with her.

Antonio told them that he was taking Teresa to America. He begged the favor of being allowed to see the sisters before he left, and the Prioress allowed the curtains to be drawn.

Then the doctor came for Teresa and hurried her through her leave-taking. She begged him never to forsake the sisters and, with a final passionate embrace of Sister Joanna of the Cross, left the cloister with him.

PETER JENKYNs, their long-lost brother

MRS. JAMIESON, leader of society

LADY GLENMIRE, Mrs. Jamieson's sister-in-law

MARTHA, Miss Matilda's faithful servant

Critique:

For a whimsical and kind, yet humorous account of the habits and customs of genteel spinsters of nineteenth-century England, Cranford is unsurpassed. Only a very warm and gentle woman could have portrayed the little peculiarities of her sex with affection and sly humor, as did Mrs. Gaskell. There is something of Charles Lamb in her finely drawn characters, her humorous accounts of even the most trivial events. The writer shows great understanding and sympathy for the everyday problems of poor but genteel ladies. All in all, Cranford is a book to please even the most sober realist.

The Story:

Cranford was a small English village inhabited mostly by ladies. Few gentlemen took up residence there, and most of those who did seemed to disappear on various and mysterious errands. The doctor, the shopkeepers, and a few male servants were all of their sex who crossed the ladies' vision with any regularity.

Most of the ladies lived in "elegant economy," and the spending of money was considered vulgar and showy. There was no mention of anyone's being poor unless in privacy with one's dearest friend. Thus when semi-retired Captain Brown moved to Cranford and talked openly about being poor, it was quite an affront to the ladies. But the captain was so kind and considerate to everyone, whether more or less fortunate than he, that the ladies could not long resent his vulgar behavior and talk. He had two daughters. The elder, dying of an incurable illness, had a tongue sharpened by pain, but the kind women joined her younger sister in trying to make her last days pleasant and comfortable. Many a cup of tea and small delicacy found their way from the ladies' already poor stores to the suffering girl.

Their sorrow was great when the kind captain was killed while rescuing a small child from in front of a train. When his elder daughter soon followed him, all of the ladies were hard pressed to make suitable arrangements for the younger daughter, left alone. One day a former suitor appeared and took her for his wife. The village ladies rested happily in the knowledge that Captain Brown would be pleased with his daughter's security.

Until her death Miss Deborah Jenkyns was one of the more dominant spinsters in the town. She made all decisions for her younger sister, Miss Matilda, age fifty-five. Miss Matilda, affectionately called Miss Matty by all but her sister, knew that Deborah had the better mind and did not resent her sister's dominance. After Miss Deborah's death Miss Matty had almost to learn again how to live. Her particular friends were Miss Pole, Mrs. Forrester, and Mrs. Jamieson, who became the social leader of Cranford after Miss Deborah's death. Miss Mary Smith often visited Miss Matty and brought her the good advice of Mr. Smith, Mary's father and Miss Matty's financial adviser. Mary was surprised to learn that Miss Matty had long ago had a suitor whom she rejected in order to stay with her mother. Not long after Miss Deborah's death that gentleman returned to Cranford for a visit. Mary was disappointed that he did not renew his courtship of Miss Matty. Miss Matty grieved too, in secret, for she would never have admitted openly such vulgar sentiments.

Mary learned also that Miss Deborah and Miss Matty had once had a brother who had disappeared many years before, after being severely punished by their father for playing a practical joke on Miss Deborah. Peter Jenkyns was believed dead, although Miss Matty had heard rumors that he was living in India.

The genteel ladies were suddenly thrown into a flurry of excitement when they heard that Mrs. Jamieson's sister-in-law, Lady Glenmire, was to settle in Cranford. They spent long hours discussing how they should address her, for she was the first noblewoman they had encountered. Their worries were in vain, however, for Mrs. Jamieson subtly but firmly informed them that they would not be included in her guest list. At first the ladies were greatly hurt. Later Mrs. Jamieson was forced to relent and invite them to call, for most of the county gentility were away or otherwise occupied. Miss Matty, Miss Pole, and Mrs. Forrester first thought they would be engaged elsewhere for the fateful night, but their innate kindness, or perhaps their curiosity, preveiled, and they accepted the invitation. They found Lady Glenmire delightful and no more refined nor genteel than they themselves—a fact they, if not Mrs. Jamieson, considered not surprising.

Mrs. Jamieson departed Cranford for a time, leaving Lady Glenmire in charge of her home. And in that genteel lady's absence Lady Glenmire became engaged to the doctor of the town, a man not even recognized by the ladies except when his services were needed for bleeding. Thus, he was no higher socially than a shopkeeper. Even more exciting was the fact that the ladies at last knew someone who was to be married. They awaited Mrs. Jamieson's return with fear and anticipation. They were not disappointed. Mrs. Jamieson, deciding to cut Lady Glenmire, stated that she had always known her to be of low taste.

The engaged couple were married before Mrs. Jamieson returned. By that time a great tragedy had befallen Miss Matty. The bank in which her estate was deposited had to close its doors, and she was left with but thirteen pounds a year. She made no complaint; her biggest worry was whether Mrs. Jamieson would allow the ladies to continue their friendship with her. Mary Smith sent for her father to see what he could plan for Miss Matty. Miss Pole, Mrs. Forrester, and another friend careful that she should not know of their gift, gave up some of their own small incomes so that they could help their friend. Mary and Mr. Smith persuaded Miss Matty to sell tea, but it took a good deal of convincing to assure her that this would be a genteel way for a lady to supplement her income. Miss Matty's faithful maid, Martha, forced her young man to marry her sooner than he had anticipated so that they could rent Miss Matty's house and have her for a lodger. In that way Martha could continue to look after her old mistress without injuring Miss Matty's pride. Everyone was happy when Mrs. Jamieson returned and said that the ladies could continue to call on Miss Matty because her father had been a rector and his daughter, who had never married, was entitled to the position he had left her.

More good fortune followed. Mary Smith wrote to Miss Matty's brother in India. When he received the letter, Peter Jenkyns sold his property and returned to Cranford to keep his sister in comfort and in some prosperity. Peter also brought about a reconciliation between Mrs. Jamieson and Lady Glenmire, who now called herself a vulgar Mrs. instead of Lady. Once more there was peace in Cranford.

THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD

Author: Anatole France (Jacques Anatole Thibault, 1844-1924)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: France

First published: 1881

Principal characters:

SYLVESTRE BONNARD, a bibliophile

JEANNE, his ward

MME. COCCOZ, later the Princess Trépof, his benefactress

MLLE. PRÉFÈRE, a schoolteacher

HENRI GÉLIS, a student

Critique:

This gentle novel is the best known of France's work, and in many ways the most typical. In it we find the characteristic style—precise, elegant, gently ironic, and learnedly humorous. The old bibliophile becomes a real friend of the reader and Jeanne is a charming foil. The plot is tenuous. The chief pleasure in reading the book derives from the author's droll comments, the asides, the quips, and the keen observations. Parts of the novel have been widely quoted, especially France's remark that children learn only when they truly enjoy themselves.

The Story:

Bonnard was a retiring philologist, a Member of the Institute, and a bachelor. Thérèse, his maid, looked after him firmly; she was the real mistress of his domestic arrangements. Bonnard, his mind stuffed with antiquarian lore about the old abbeys of Paris, lived mostly in the past.

One day a sickly bookseller called and unsuccessfully showed him some cheap editions. Although he bought no books, Bonnard was moved by the thin, intense man. When he inquired of Thérèse she told him that the bookseller, M. Coccoz, lived up in the attic under a leaky roof with seldom even a fire, and his wife had just had a baby. Moved to pity, Bonnard sent up some logs for the indigent couple to burn.

Shortly afterward he heard that the husband had died. Thérèse sniffed virtuously at the gay widow who had far too many admirers. Bonnard saw the beautiful Mme. Coccoz only once on the stairs. She showed him her healthy baby and remarked on his kindness in sending firewood.

Ten years later Bonnard read in a catalogue of a manuscript of the Golden Legend, a work he wished very much to own. Finally he tracked it down, discovering that it was owned by one Signor Polizzi, who lived in Sicily. The Italian refused to lend the manuscript, but he invited Bonnard to come to Sicily to read it at his leisure. Although it was a long, hard trip for a shy man of letters, Bonnard set out for Sicily.

On the island he met Prince Trépop, a Russian, and his beautiful wife whom Bonnard never associated with the young widow he had met once on the stairs years before. They were rich travelers who had nothing to do but to look for match boxes for the prince's collection. The princess gently decried her nomadic existence, but she adored her husband.

Signor Polizzi's house was difficult to reach. Bonnard had to make the last part of the trip by mule litter. When he at last arrived, he found that Polizzi, a slippery jack-of-all-trades, had given the Golden Legend to his son, who had opened a shop in Paris. While Bonnard was making the long trip to Sicily, the manuscript had all the time been in a bookshop not far from his apartment. Furious at the unkindness done him, Bonnard poured out his bitter story to the sympathetic princess.

Back in Paris, Bonnard went to the son's shop; there was the manuscript. The son refused to quote a price on it because he was putting it up at auction. When the sale took place, Bonnard hopefully bid up to six thousand francs, but some one always outbid him. To his consternation he found that it was Polizzi who had successfully bid on the manuscript. The dealer was acting as agent for a client who had instructed him to buy back the manuscript at any cost.

Back in his apartment, while Bonnard was gloomily thinking of his troubles, a young boy was shown in. The youngster gave him a package from his mother and disappeared, but not before Thérèse had seen the carriage. The package contained a make-believe log. Inside was a card from the Princess Trépop and a profusion of violets. Under the flowers Bonnard found the manuscript. Just then Thérèse lumbered in to ask what Mme. Coccoz was doing in such a rich carriage and why she had stopped at their door.

M. de Gabry invited Bonnard to come to his country estate to catalogue the library he had inherited. Bonnard found the estate in run-down condition, but the library was extensive. He happily settled down to his long task.

In front of him on the desk was a tiny fairy who scolded him for his dry preoccupations and threw ink at him.

Bonnard awoke with a start and found that a sudden wind had upset his ink bottle. Mme. de Gabry listened to the story of his dream with much interest. A few days later Bonnard came back from a walk to find his dream fairy perched on a console in the hall. As he stared in astonishment, Mme. de Gabry came up to introduce Jeanne Alexandre.

Jeanne was a shy girl with red hands. After Mme. de Gabry had described the fairy to her, she made a like statuette to surprise Bonnard. The old man was much pleased by the gift, and when he heard something of Jeanne's story he was moved to emotions he had not felt for years. Jeanne was the granddaughter of Clémentine, a girl whom he had loved long ago. Now Jeanne's relatives were dead and she was staying a few days with Mme. de Gabry. Bonnard resolved to look after the girl for the sake of his dead Clémentine.

In Paris Mme. de Gabry went with him to Clémentine's grave and there listened to his nostalgic tale. When Bonnard, a young man, had loved her, Clémentine's mother was dead, and she lived with her choleric father, who was a map maker. They were renting rooms temporarily from Bonnard's father. Bonnard was afraid to disclose his love for Clémentine, but she seemed to know how he felt. One evening a great quarrel arose between Clémentine's father, a royalist, and Bonnard's uncle, who was a Bonapartist. After the quarrel Clémentine was taken away and Bonnard never saw her again.

After telling his story, Bonnard asked Mme. de Gabry how he could best help the orphan Jeanne. She reminded him that Jeanne had a guardian, Maître Mouche the notary, who would have to be consulted.

The honest bibliophile cared little for Maître Mouche's shifty ways, but the notary gave him permission to visit Jeanne each Thursday afternoon. Jeanne was in Mlle. Préfère's select school, where at first Bonnard was received with suspicion.

As soon as Mlle. Préfère learned, however, that Bonnard was a Member of the Institute, she was effusive. Immediately Jeanne began to receive better treatment than she had as a charity student.

During the vacation period Mlle. Préfère frequently brought Jeanne to Bonnard's apartment. The schoolmistress quickly made herself at home and soon had her favorite rocker and her shelf for her knitting. One afternoon, while Jeanne was in the kitchen, Mlle. Préfère proposed marriage to Bonnard, who was thunderstruck at the idea.

The next time he went to the school to see Jeanne, Mlle. Préfère received him coldly and forbade him to have anything to do with the girl. Bonnard complained to Maître Mouche, who upheld Mlle. Préfère. Then on a rainy day Bonnard waited outside the school wall until he saw Jeanne and passed her through the gate by a ruse. Amazed at his own daring in kidnaping a minor, he took her to the de Gabry house.

M. de Gabry undertook to settle the affair with Maître Mouche, but that worthy had disappeared after embezzling his clients' funds. Bonnard was legally appointed Jeanne's guardian and took her home with him.

A young student, Henri Gélis, called on Bonnard for help with his thesis. He soon had eyes only for Jeanne and eventually he proposed to marry her, even though she had no dowry. Bonnard made arrangements to sell his library so that his ward could have a respectable financial start in her married life. One evening, just before the books were sold, he guiltily took a book and hid it. He would have one volume left, at any rate.

After Jeanne and Gélis were married, Bonnard went to live in Brolles, a small village. There Jeanne and her husband visited him twice each year, and there also he kept the cradle of little Sylvestre, their child who had died. Bonnard often reflected that the parents were young and healthy. There would be more family.

THE CRITIC

Author: Richard Brinsley Sheridan (1751-1816)

Type of plot: Literary satire

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1779

Principal characters:

MR. DANGLE, a wealthy, stage-struck Londoner

MRS. DANGLE, his wife

MR. SNEER, Dangle's friend

SIR FRETFUL PLAGIARY, a dramatist

MR. PUFF, dramatist and journalist

Critique:

In Sheridan's time The Critic, Or, A Tragedy Rehearsed was probably best known for its bitingly satirical portrait of Sheridan's fellow dramatist, Richard Cumberland, who was the prototype of Sir Fretful Plagiary. Today the play is most important for the light it sheds on what Sheridan thought of the drama prevalent in his own time. By showing the reader the insipidity of the tragedy rehearsed within the play, the laughable defense of trite dramatic devices by its author, and the comments by the actors themselves, Sheridan lets the reader see what he thought of the state of drama during his age. Nor should it be overlooked that Sheridan's The Critic is one of a line of English plays which use plays within plays to satirize the times and the drama. Sheridan's play can be compared with such similar plays as Buckingham's The Rehearsal, Henry Fielding's Tom Thumb, David Garrick's Peep Behind the Curtain, and Shaw's Fanny's First Play.

The Story:

Mr. Dangle, a well-to-do gentleman of London, sat one morning with his wife at breakfast. While he read the newspapers, Mrs. Dangle complained that her husband's hobby, the theater, was making her house unlivable, with disappointed authors, would-be actors, musicians, and critics making it their meeting place. Dangle protested vigorously, but as he did so a stream of callers arrived to prove her point.

The first caller was Mr. Sneer. He and Mrs. Dangle got into a discussion on the morality of the stage and the proper material for comedies. Then Sir Fretful Plagiary, a dramatist, was announced. Before he entered, Dangle reported that he was a close friend but that he could not accept criticism of his work. Sir Fretful told how his new play had been sent to the Covent Garden theater, rather than to Drury Lane, because of the envy he had uncovered there.

Sneer, Dangle, and Sir Fretful Plagiary began to discuss the latter's new play. In the discussion all criticism of his drama was brushed aside in one way or another by the author, who ended up with a diatribe against all who would say anything against his work, including the newspapers. At the end of their talk, a group of musicians entered looking for Dangle's assistance in securing work with the theaters. They were led by an Italian who knew no English and a Frenchman who knew little English, but was to act as interpreter.

The Frenchman and the Italian tried to make Dangle understand what they wanted, but with little success. After a trilingual conversation, in which not one of the participants could understand the others, Mrs. Dangle took the musicians into another room for refreshment and so relieved her husband of their troublesome presence.

dramatist who had a play in rehearsal at the theater, entered. Puff was introduced to Sneer by Dangle as a puffing writer for the newspapers, whose job it was to praise anyone or anything for a price; he was, in short, an eighteenth-century press agent. He explained for the benefit of Mr. Sneer the various kinds of "puffs" he wrote: the direct, the preliminary, the collateral, the collusive, and the oblique. At the end of the conversation, the three agreed to meet at the theater to watch a rehearsal of Puff's new play.

Later the three met, and Puff informed his two friends, Dangle and Sneer, that the time of his play was the days following defeat of the Spanish Armada during the reign of Elizabeth. The under-prompter, appearing to notify the author that the rehearsal was ready to begin, said that the play had been somewhat shortened. The actors, informed that anything they found unnecessary in the tragedy could be cut, had taken full liberties with Mr. Puff's script.

When the curtain rose, two watchmen were found asleep at four in the morning. Sir Christopher Hatton and Sir Walter Raleigh appeared on the stage and began the exposition of the plot. They were interrupted at intervals by protestations and explanations by the author, who spoke to the actors on the stage and to his two friends observing the rehearsal.

In the second act of the play a love story between the daughter of the fort commander and a captured Spanish prince was introduced, again with continued interruptions by the dramatist, who was enraged at the liberties taken by the actors in cutting his lines and parts of scenes. He and his friends, Sneer and Dangle, continued to discuss dramatic art as the rehearsal continued and found various aspects of the play to point up their discussion. Puff was particularly proud of the second sight credited to the heroine, a device by which he was able to describe the defeat of the Spanish Armada without showing the sea fight on the stage.

He was also quite proud of a verbal fencing match between the heroine and the Spanish prince. When Sneer and Dangle found the repartee ambiguous, Puff explained that he had written the dialogue completely in fencing terms, an explanation which his friends found scarcely more intelligible.

Puff irritated the actors by directing them as the rehearsal progressed, and they, in turn, continued to irritate him by cutting out more lines. At their protestations that they could not act because of his interruptions, he replied heatedly that he had feelings, too, and did not like to see his play shredded by the players.

At the end of the love scene in the play, Puff began an argument with the under-prompter, who informed him that it was impossible to rehearse the park scene because the carpenters had not built the scenery. Puff angrily announced that they could cut his play as they would; he intended to print it in its entirety.

The next scene in the rehearsal of Puff's play was a sentimental discovery scene not connected with the main story. In reply to his friends' comments, Puff explained that there was no need to have a logical connection between the main plot and the subplot. Then came what Puff called the most perfect scene in the play. An actor entered, sat down, shook his head, arose, and went off the stage. The shaking of the head, according to Puff, said more than all the words he could have written.

In the last scene of the play the Spanish prince was killed in a duel, and his English sweetheart went mad. After her exit from the stage, a masque procession of all the British rivers and their tributaries passed over the stage, while an orchestra played Handel's water music.

Following the procession, Puff announced to his friends that the rehearsal was good, but that the actors were not yet perfect. To the actors he announced that another rehearsal would be held the next day.

CROTCHET CASTLE

Author: Thomas Love Peacock (1785-1866)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1831

Principal characters:

EBENEZER MAC CROTCHET, a country squire

YOUNG CROTCHET, his son

LEMMA CROTCHET, his daughter

SUSANNAH TOUCHANDGO, loved by young Crotchet

MR. CHAINMAIL, an antiquarian

CAPTAIN FITZCHROME, a young army officer

LADY CLARINDA BOSSNOWL, loved by Fitzchrome

Critique:

In Crotchet Castle, as in his other novels, Peacock ridicules the excesses and exaggerations in human behavior. His satire is never unkind; rather, it is the product of a mind that is tolerant of weaknesses but vexed by an overabundance of those weaknesses in an imperfect world. The plot is almost non-existent, and the people are caricatures; but in spite of these apparent defects the book gives a fairly accurate picture of nineteenth-century English country life.

The Story:

The squire of Crotchet Castle had descended from Scotch and Jewish ancestors, but he tried to hide this ancestry under the guise of an English country squire. His background having given him the ability to make money readily, he used his wealth to buy a manor and a coat of arms. His wife was dead, his son in London, leaving the squire alone with a daughter. Young Crotchet, who had inherited his father's love for money, had taken his father's gift of a large sum and turned it into enormous profits. His business dealings were shady, and many thought his day of reckoning would come. For the present, however, he was riding on a crest of success. He had been engaged to Miss Susannah Touchandgo, the daughter of a great banker, but when that gentleman had absconded with the bank's funds, leaving his daughter almost penniless, young Crotchet had deserted his love without a backward glance. Susannah had retreated into Wales, where in simple surroundings she taught a farmer's children for her livelihood.

Squire Crotchet's daughter Lemma had assumed some of the facial characteristics of her ancestors, a fact which was compensated for in the eyes of local swains by the size of her father's fortune. A suitor had not yet been selected for her, but there would be no problem in choosing one from the many who sought her hand and her purse.

Crotchet Castle was a gathering place for philosophers and dilettantes picked at random by Squire Crotchet. These would-be intellectuals engaged in long and tiresome disputes on all branches of philosophy and science. One of them, a Mr. Chainmail, longed for a return to the customs and morals of the Middle Ages, for he believed that the present was decidedly inferior to the past. He was violently opposed by others of the group who worshipped mammon. No one of the philosophers ever changed his views; each found much pleasure in expounding his own pet theory.

While strolling through the grounds one day, some of the gentlemen came upon a young army officer, Captain Fitzchrome. The captain, invited to join the group, accepted readily, for he was in love with one of the guests, Lady Clarinda Bossnowl. Lady Clarinda obviously loved the captain, but she had been promised to young Crotchet. The match was purely a business arrangement; he would exchange his money for her title. The captain pleaded with her at every opportunity, but she silenced him and her own heart by ridiculing his lack of funds. Lemma Crotchet, in the meantime, was pledged to Lady Clarinda's brother. The four young people spent many hours together, much to Captain Fitzchrome's sorrow.

One day the squire took his guests on a river voyage down the Thames. They visited places of learning and culture, but saw little of either except the buildings supposed to house those virtues. During the trip the captain finally gave up his hopes of winning Lady Clarinda, and he left the party without notifying anyone. He settled in a village inn, where he was later joined by Chainmail, the antiquarian, who had left the party in order to study a ruined castle in the neighborhood. Since the captain knew the way to the castle, he offered to guide Chainmail, but he was called back to London on business before they could undertake their expedition. Chainmail went on alone.

During his researches Chainmail caught a glimpse of a nymph-like creature who fascinated him so much that he could not rest until he had made her acquaintance. After many false attempts, he met her and learned that she was Susannah Touchandgo, the lady betrayed by young Crotchet. Chainmail found her perfect in every way but one. He knew she would share the simple, old-fashioned life he loved, but he had determined to marry a lady of gentle birth. Susannah, ashamed of her father's theft, would tell him nothing of her family background. In spite of her reluctance in this respect, Chainmail loved her and spent many happy hours at the farmhouse in which she lived.

Captain Fitzchrome returned. Learning of his friend's plight, he encouraged Chainmail to ask for the lady's hand, but the antiquarian could not change his views on his need for a wife of gentle birth. The situation was brought to a climax when they saw in the paper an announcement of the approaching marriage of Lady Clarinda and young Crotchet. Susannah was temporarily overwrought by the news, and in trying to comfort her Chainmail inadvertently proposed. Then Susannah told him of her father's crime. Chainmail could overlook that fact in his joy over the discovery that Susannah was of good blood. In a few days the two were married.

The following Christmas most of the friends gathered again at Crotchet Castle. Lemma Crotchet had married Lord Bossnowl, but Lady Clarinda Bossnowl had not yet married young Crotchet. The young man was a little dismayed at seeing Susannah married to Chainmail, for he still held her in affection. Lady Clarinda cast longing glances at the captain, even to the point of singing a song that was obviously intended for him. There was no sorrow in her heart, consequently, when young Crotchet disappeared. His firm had failed and he was penniless. It was assumed that he had crossed the Atlantic to join forces with Susannah's father, who had set up business there; the two rogues would make good partners.

Lady Clarinda would not again be put up for sale. She gladly accepted Captain Fitzchrome and his smaller but more stable fortune.

THE REVEREND STEPHEN KUMALO, a Zulu clergyman
GERTRUDE, his sister
ABSALOM, his son
MSIMANGU, his friend
MR. JARVIS, his white benefactor

Critique:

In South Africa today there is racial unrest more bitter than any now known in our own country. Cry, The Beloved Country is a beautiful and tragic story of that unrest, told with poetic loveliness. It is a story of personal tragedy, as well as a story of a national tragedy. This distinguished novel by a South African minister has quickly, and rightly, found a permanent place in twentieth-century literature. Dramatized, the story has been equally compelling as a play.

The Story:

The letter brought fear to the hearts of the Reverend Stephen Kumalo and his wife. To a Zulu, letters were rare and frightening. Once opened, they could never be closed again, their contents forgotten. Kumalo waited until he could control his fear before he opened the letter from Johannesburg telling him that his sister was a sick woman and needed his help. The trip would be costly for a poor Zulu clergyman, but he must go. Perhaps there he could also find their son Absalom, who had never been heard from since he left the village. They knew in their hearts that in Johannesburg Absalom had succumbed to the evil resulting from the white man's success at breaking up the tribes and compelling black men to work in the mines.

Taking their small savings, Kumalo journeyed to the city. He went first to the mission and met Msimangu, who had written the letter. Msimangu was a clergyman also, working for his people in the city as Kumalo worked in the country.

He sorrowfully told Kumalo that his sister Gertrude was a prostitute and a dealer in illegal liquor. She and her child were in want, even though she had once made much money from her trade. Kumalo located Gertrude, with the help of Msimangu, and found her willing to go with him to the temporary rooms he had found with a good woman. When his business was finished, she and the child would go with him to his home, away from temptation.

Before looking for his son, Kumalo visited his brother John, a successful merchant and a politician who was under surveillance by the police for his ability to stir up the blacks. But John was discreet; he took no chance of being arrested and losing his business. Many of the black leaders sacrificed everything to help their people, but not John. Expediency was his only thought. He had left the church and turned a deaf ear to his brother's pleas that he return to the good life.

Kumalo began his search for Absalom. With Msimangu, he searched everywhere, each place visited adding to his fear, for it was obvious that the boy had been engaged in stealing, drinking, and worse. Often they walked for miles, for the black leaders were urging their people to boycott the buses in order to get the fares reduced. Kumalo learned that Absalom had been in the company of his brother John's son, both of them in and out of trouble. The trail led to a reformatory, but the boy had been dismissed shortly before because of his good behavior. The white teacher of the reformatory joined Kumalo in his search because the boy's behavior reflected on his training. Kumalo found next the girl who, soon to bear Absalom's child, waited to marry him. The old man knew at once that should Absalom not be found, the girl must return to the hills with him and make her home there.

At last he found Absalom in prison. In company with John's son and another boy, Absalom had robbed and killed Arthur Jarvis, a white man who had befriended the blacks. Broken-hearted, the old man talked with his son. He could tell that the son did not truly repent but only said the right things out of fear. His one ray of goodness was his desire to marry the girl in order to give his unborn child a name. Kumalo wept for his son. But he wept also for the wife and children, for the father and mother of the slain man.

At the trial Absalom was defended by a lawyer found by Kumalo's friends. The plea was that the murder was not planned, that the boy had shot in fear. The judge, a good man, weighed all the evidence and pronounced a verdict of guilty; the punishment, death by hanging. John's son and the other boy were acquitted for lack of evidence. The verdict was a gross miscarriage of justice, but John was more powerful than Kumalo.

Before Kumalo left Johannesburg, he arranged for the marriage between his son and the girl. Then he started home, taking the girl and Gertrude's child with him. Gertrude had disappeared the night before they were to leave, no one knew where. She had talked to him of becoming a nun, but Kumalo feared that she had gone back to her old life; Gertrude liked the laughter and fun.

At home, the people welcomed their minister, showering love and blessings upon him. The crops were poor that season and people were starving. Kumalo prayed for his people and worked for them. Knowing that they must learn to use the land wisely, he was helpless to guide them. He went to their chief to ask for coöperation, but the chief was concerned only for himself and his family.

Hope came to the people in the form of a child. He was the grandchild of Mr. Jarvis, father of the man Absalom had murdered. Mr. Jarvis had always helped the black people, and after his son's death he gave all his time to the work started by the murdered man. He sent milk for the children and brought to the people an agricultural demonstrator who would help them restore fertility to the soil. Mr. Jarvis built a dam and sent for good seed. His grandchild became Kumalo's friend, and through him the white man learned of the needs of the people. Kumalo, whose son had killed his benefactor's son, was at first ashamed to face Mr. Jarvis. When they met, few words were exchanged, but each read the heart of the other and understood the sorrow and grief there.

The bishop came and told Kumalo that it would be best for him to leave the hills and the valley, to go where his son's crime was unknown. Kumalo grieved and stood silent. Before the bishop left there came a letter from Mr. Jarvis, thanking Kumalo for his friendship and offering to build his people a new church. The bishop felt ashamed. How little he understood this man and his people.

When the day came for Absalom's execution, Kumalo went into the mountains. There he had gone before when struggling with fear. Mr. Jarvis, knowing the torment that was in his soul, bade him go in peace. When the dawn came, Kumalo cried out for his son. He cried too for his land and his people. When would dawn come for them?

Critique:

Written during the Civil War, Cudjo's Cave mingles elements of propaganda with its historical setting and romantic theme. Because the novel displays deep sincerity, however, and a considerable degree of literary skill, it has enjoyed a popularity outlasting by many years the political issues which gave it birth. The book presents clearly and forcefully the problem of the rural population in Tennessee during that difficult time of decision at the beginning of the Civil War period. In that particular time and place the problem was peculiarly acute because Tennessee was a border state and its citizens had many reasons for indecision when faced by the realities of conflict between North and South. The writer, working close to actual history, dramatized effectively the guerrilla warfare fought among the people of Tennessee and Kentucky.

The Story:

In 1861, Penn Hapgood, a young Quaker, was the schoolmaster in the small Tennessee town of Curryville. Because he made no effort to conceal his anti-slavery convictions, he was unpopular among the hot-headed Secessionists of the community. The Unionists, on the other hand, had offered him a commission in the militia unit they were secretly organizing. Penn refused the commission offered him on the grounds of his religious faith.

His unpopularity grew after he aided Dan Pepperill, a poor white flogged and ridden on a rail because he had befriended a whipped slave. Penn's friend, a kindly young German named Carl, offered him a pistol to use in self-defense if he were attacked, but the schoolmaster saw no need to arm himself. A short time later a party of ruffians seized Penn and tarred and feathered him. Carl, unable to save his friend, searched for some Union sympathizers to defend Penn, but by the time the rescue party arrived at the schoolhouse the young teacher was not to be found. It was learned, however, that he had gone to his boarding-house, where his landlady, Mrs. Sprowl, had refused to let him in. She had acted on the orders of Silas Ropes, the leader of the mob.

Penn had found shelter in the home of a blind clergyman, Mr. Villars. The minister's household was made up of his two daughters, Virginia and Salina, old

Toby, a freed slave, and Carl, the young German. Old Toby and Farmer Stackridge, a staunch Unionist, tended to Penn and put him to bed in the clergyman's home. While he was still resting, Augustus Blythewood, a planter in love with Virginia, appeared at the house. Although she was little attracted to her suitor, Virginia entertained him graciously in order to conceal the fact that the fugitive was hidden nearby. Another caller was Lyssander Sprowl, the son of Penn's landlady. Salina, the older sister, and young Sprowl were married, but they had separated some time before.

Sprowl, having learned Penn's whereabouts, promised to lead the villagers to the schoolmaster's hiding place. The aroused townspeople accused Mr. Villars of hiding an Abolitionist. While they were threatening the old man, Penn disappeared from the house under mysterious circumstances.

A mob, aroused by Blythewood, seized old Toby and prepared to flog him in an effort to learn Penn's whereabouts. Carl managed to cut the Negro's bonds before the mob could carry out its threat. Toby, escaping, ran into Blythewood and recognized him. The planter then called off the mob and went to the minister's house, where he pretended great indignation at what had happened.

Penn, meanwhile, was safe in Cudjo's Cave, a hide-out known only to runaway slaves. Having heard the angry townspeople threatening Mr. Villars, he had in his half-delirious condition fled into an adjoining field before he fainted. When he came to, he found himself beside a fire in a cavern, with Cudjo and Pomp, two escaped slaves, ministering to his wants. They had befriended Penn because of the help he had given Pepperill several weeks before. Pomp, in particular, was a magnificent old fellow, almost heroic in his dignity and spirit. Both slaves had suffered at the hands of Blythewood and Ropes, the town bully. Through the two Negroes Penn sent word to Mr. Villars that he was safe. The clergyman sent Penn's clothes and food to the hidiers.

When he was able to travel, Penn decided to set out for the North. Near Curryville he fell into the hands of a small detachment of Confederate soldiers. Convicted at a drumhead trial, he was sentenced to be hanged unless he joined the army. He refused. Carl, who had helped his friend before, volunteered to enlist in Penn's place. Set free, Penn was again in danger from a group of townspeople led by Ropes and Sprowl, but with the aid of Farmer Stackridge he managed to elude his pursuers. Blythewood, hearing of his escape, was furious that Penn had slipped through his fingers.

Penn did not go far, however, for he was unwilling to leave the Villars family without protection. His fears were justified. When he returned secretly to the minister's home, he learned that Mr. Villars had been seized and carried off to prison. Penn himself was captured a short time later, and among his fellow prisoners he found the blind clergyman. Because Carl was one of the soldiers detailed to guard them, he and the minister were able to make their escape. Stackridge was guiding them to a place of safety in the mountains when they were again captured. As the soldiers were about to run Penn through with their bayonets, one of their number dropped dead. The others ran away. Pomp and Cudjo appeared and led the fugitives to Cudjo's Cave.

Augustus Blythewood proposed to Virginia Villars, but she, realizing his dislike for Penn, would have nothing to do with the young planter. Meanwhile Stackridge and a party of his Unionist friends were skirmishing with the Confederate soldiers in the woods nearby. Virginia, while searching for Penn, was captured by a Confederate soldier, but she was relieved when she discovered that her captor was Carl. Before the young German could lead her out of the forest, set afire by the skirmishers, he himself was captured by Ropes' men. After she had climbed to a rocky ledge, the fire having cut off her escape on both sides, she was rescued from her predicament by Penn and Cudjo, who conducted her to the cave. That night rain put out the forest fire. In the morning old Toby appeared at the cave. He was overjoyed to discover that his mistress and her father were both safe.

Lysander Sprowl, in the meantime, had taken possession of Mr. Villars' house and forced Salina to serve him there. When Toby returned with a note to tell Salina that her sister and her father were safe, the Negro tried to deceive Sprowl as to the fate of the fugitives, but Salina, who still loved her worthless husband, incautiously showed him Virginia's note. Sprowl brutally ordered Toby flogged in order to learn where Mr. Villars and Penn were hidden. Angered by Sprowl's cruelty, Salina set fire to her father's house and under cover of the confusion helped old Toby to make his escape.

Sprowl, encountering Carl, demanded that the young German lead him to the cave. Carl pretended to agree, but along the way he managed to hit the bully over the head with a stone. While Sprowl was still unconscious, Carl dragged him to the cave, where he was securely bound. Meanwhile old Toby and Salina made their way to the cave, and they arrived about the time Carl appeared with the wounded Sprowl. Pomp had also conducted to the cave the band of Unionists led by Stackridge. They prepared to turn their quarters into an underground fortress.

Before long a party led by Silas Ropes discovered the location of the cave. He and his men guarded the entrance in the hope of starving the occupants into submission.

Salina, ever changeable, loosened Sprowl's bonds so that he was able to escape. He went at once to the troops under Blythewood and arranged to have a squad of men sent to attack the cave. When Sprowl, at the head of the attacking force, reached the entrance of the cave, he found it defended by his wife. She fired at her husband, wounding him fatally, and was herself bayoneted by one of the Confederate soldiers. Virginia and her father were captured and taken before Blythewood.

The planter again pleaded his suit with Virginia, but she received his offers with contempt. While they argued, apart from the camp, Pomp suddenly appeared and told his former master that any sudden move would mean his death. Carl and Penn were covering Blythewood with their guns, and he was taken a prisoner to the cave. There Pomp compelled his former master to sign a safe conduct pass for the defenders and an order for the attackers to cease the fight.

Under safe conduct, the defenders left the cave. Mr. Villars, Virginia, Penn, and Pomp set out for Ohio. They left behind them in the cave the body of Salina, as well as those of Cudjo and Ropes, who had killed each other during an earlier attack. Pomp returned long enough to free Blythewood before joining his friends on their way to safety.

Penn and Carl went from Ohio to Pennsylvania, where they enlisted in the same regiment. Pomp served the Union as a colored scout. In many battles of the war Penn did heroic service, earning for himself the nickname of "The Fighting Quaker."

THE QUEEN, Cymbeline's wife
CLOTEN, the queen's son by a former husband
IMOGEN, Cymbeline's daughter by a former marriage
POSTHUMUS LEONATUS, Imogen's husband

ARVIRAGUS, Cymbeline's sons, reared by Belarius
CAIUS LUCIUS, a Roman ambassador

Critique:

Shakespeare apparently drew upon a number of sources for the plot of The Tragedy of Cymbeline. All historical accuracy of the play is debatable and actually unimportant. Cymbeline himself was a mythical character of tribal legend. The details of relationship among the characters are to be found in other romantic writings which appeared prior to Shakespeare's time and which were apparently adopted to clothe the skeletal international aspects of the story. Cymbeline presents a plot of political intrigue—both domestic and international—and personal emotional involvement. That the personal well-being of the characters takes precedence over military and political details gives the play its human-interest appeal. The apparition of Posthumus has the richness of detail found in similar scenes in Macbeth.

The Story:

Gullible Cymbeline and his conniving queen planned to have Imogen, his daughter, marry his stepson Cloten. Instead, Imogen chose the gentle Posthumus as a husband and secretly married him. Banished by the king in a fit of anger, Posthumus fled to Italy after promising that his loyalty and fidelity to his bride would always be above reproach. As a token of their vows Imogen gave Posthumus a diamond ring that had belonged to her mother, and Posthumus placed a bracelet of rare design upon Imogen's arm.

In Rome Posthumus met Iachimo, a vain braggart who tried to tempt Posthumus by appealing to his sensuality. Posthumus, not to be tempted into adultery, told Iachimo of his pact with Imogen and of the ring and bracelet they had exchanged. Iachimo scoffingly wagered ten thousand ducats against Posthumus' ring that he could seduce Imogen.

Iachimo went to Britain with letters to which he had forged the name of Posthumus. Because of these letters Imogen received him. Then Iachimo, by ambiguities and innuendo, played upon her curiosity regarding the faithfulness of her husband. Failing to win her favor in that way, he gained access to her bedroom in a trunk which, he had told her, contained a valuable gift, bought in France, intended for the Roman emperor; he had asked that the trunk be placed in her chamber for safekeeping. While Imogen slept, he noted the details of the furnishings in the room, took the bracelet from her arm, and observed a cinque-spotted mole on her left breast.

Back in Italy, Iachimo described Imogen's room to Posthumus and produced the bracelet, which he said Imogen had given him. Incredulous, Posthumus asked Iachimo to describe some aspect of Imogen's body as better proof of his successful seduction. Iachimo's claim that he had kissed the mole on Imogen's breast enraged Posthumus, who swore that he would kill Imogen. He sent a letter to Pisanio, commanding that the servant kill Imogen. He also sent a letter to Imogen asking her to meet him in Milford Haven.

Pisanio was to kill Imogen as they traveled through the Welsh hills.

On the journey Pisanio divulged the real purpose of their trip when he showed Imogen the letter ordering her death. Unable to harm his master's wife, Pisanio instructed her to dress as a boy and join the party of Caius Lucius, who was in Britain to collect tribute to the Emperor Augustus and who was soon to return to Rome. Then Imogen would be near Posthumus and could ultimately disprove Iachimo's accusations against her. Pisanio also gave Imogen a box containing a restorative, entrusted to him by the queen in case Imogen became ill during her trip. The contents, presumed by the queen to be a slow-acting poison, had been procured from her physician, who, suspecting chicanery, had reduced the drug content. The medicine would only induce long sleep. Taking leave of his mistress, Pisanio returned home.

Dressed in boy's clothing, Imogen, hungry and weary, came to the mountain cave of Belarius, who, banished from Cymbeline's court twenty years before, had kidnapped Guiderius and Arviragus, Cymbeline's infant sons. In Wales the two boys had been brought up to look upon Belarius as their father. Calling herself Fidele, Imogen won the affection of the three men when she asked shelter of them. Left alone when the men went out to hunt food, Imogen, emotionally spent and physically ill, swallowed some of the medicine which Pisanio had given her.

Cymbeline, meanwhile, had refused to pay the tribute demanded by Rome, and the two nations prepared for war. Cloten, infuriated by Imogen's coldness to his attentions, tried to learn her whereabouts. Pisanio, thinking to trick her pursuer, showed him the letter in which Posthumus asked Imogen to meet him at Milford Haven. Disguised as Posthumus, Cloten set out to avenge his injured vanity.

In Wales he came upon Belarius, Arviragus, and Guiderius as they hunted. Recognizing him as the queen's son, Belarius assumed that Cloten had come to arrest them as outlaws. He and Arviragus went in search of Cloten's followers while Guiderius fought with Cloten. Guiderius cut off Cloten's head and threw it into the river. Returning from their search, Arviragus found Imogen in a deathlike stupor. Thinking her dead, the three men prepared for her burial. Benevolent Belarius, remembering that Cloten was of royal birth, brought his headless body for burial and laid it near Imogen.

Imogen, awakening from her drugged sleep, was grief-stricken when she saw close by a body dressed in Posthumus' clothing. Still sorrowing, she joined the forces of Caius Lucius as the Roman army marched by to engage the soldiers of Cymbeline.

Remorseful Posthumus, a recruit in the Roman army, regretted his order for Imogen's death. Throwing away his uniform, he dressed himself as a British peasant. Although he could not restore Imogen's life, he would not take any more British lives. In a battle between the Romans and Britons, Posthumus vanquished and disarmed Iachimo. Cymbeline, taken prisoner, was rescued by Belarius and his two foster sons. These three had built a fort and, aided by Posthumus, had so spurred the morale of the fleeing British soldiers that Cymbeline's army was victorious.

Failing to die in battle, Posthumus identified himself as a Roman after Lucius had been taken, and was sent to prison by Cymbeline. In prison he had a vision in which Jove assured him that he would yet be the lord of the Lady Imogen. Jove ordered a tablet placed on Posthumus' chest. When Posthumus awoke and found the tablet, he read that a lion's whelp would be embraced by a piece of tender air and that branches lopped from a stately cedar would revive. Shortly before the time set for his execution, he was summoned to appear before Cymbeline.

In Cymbeline's tent, the king conferred honors upon Belarius, Guiderius, and Arviragus and bemoaned the fact that the fourth valiant soldier, so poorly dressed, was not present to receive his reward. Cornelius, the physician, told Cymbeline that the queen had died after her villainies. Lucius pleaded for the life of Imogen, still dressed as a boy, because of the page's youth. Pardoned, Imogen asked Iachimo to explain his possession of the ring he wore. As Iachimo confessed his dastardly cunning and lying to win the ring from Posthumus, Posthumus entered and identified himself as the murderer of Imogen. When Imogen protested against his confession, Posthumus struck her. Pisanio then identified Imogen to keep Posthumus from striking her again.

The truth disclosed, Belarius understood his foster sons' affinity for Imogen. Posthumus and Imogen, reunited, professed lifelong devotion to each other.

After Guiderius had confessed the murder of Cloten, Cymbeline ordered him bound, but he stayed the sentence when Belarius identified himself and the two young men. Cymbeline then blessed his three children who stood before him. A soothsayer interpreted Jove's message on the tablet left on Posthumus' chest. The lion's whelp was Posthumus, the son of Leonatus, and the piece of tender air was Imogen. The lopped branches from the stately cedar were Arviragus and Guiderius, long thought dead, now restored in the king's love. Overjoyed, Cymbeline made peace with Rome.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

Type of work: Drama

Locale: France

First presented: 1897

Principal characters:

CYRANO DE BERGERAC, poet and soldier

ROXANE, with whom Cyrano is in love

CHRISTIAN DE NEUVILLETTE, a clumsy young soldier

Critique:

Considered by many the most popular play of the modern French theater, Cyrano de Bergerac is also a perennial favorite with American audiences. Cyrano is more than a hot-tempered swordsman who gets into trouble because he resents people who make fun of his nose, and his name is more than a symbol for physical ugliness. Cyrano de Bergerac symbolizes magnanimity, unselfishness, beauty of soul.

The Story:

In the theater hall of the Hôtel de Burgundy, a young soldier named Christian de Neuvillelette anxiously waited for the beautiful Roxane to appear in her box.

Christian had fallen passionately in love with this girl whom he had never met. While he was waiting for her arrival, Christian became increasingly upset because he feared that he would never be able to summon sufficient courage to address her, for he believed she was as brilliant and as graceful as he was doltish and clumsy.

Also in the audience, waiting for the curtain to go up, was one Ragueneau, a romantic tavern-keeper and toss-pot poet, whose friends praised his verses to his face while behind his back they helped themselves to the pastries that he made. Ragueneau inquired of another poet concerning the whereabouts of Cyrano de Bergerac. The actor Montfleury, Cyrano's enemy and one of Roxane's suitors, was to star in the play, and Cyrano had threatened him with bodily injury if he appeared for the performance. Cyrano, however, had not yet arrived.

At last Roxane appeared. The play began, and Montfleury came out on the stage to recite his lines. Suddenly a powerful voice ordered him to leave the stage. After the voice came the man, Cyrano de Bergerac, one of the best swordsmen in France. The performance was halted abruptly.

Another of Roxane's suitors tried to provoke a fight with Cyrano by ridiculing de Bergerac's uncommonly big nose. Cyrano, sensitive about his disfiguring nose, became the insulter instead of the insulted. Words led to a duel. To show his contempt for his adversary, Cyrano composed a poem while he was sparring with his opponent, and when he had finished the last word of the last line, Cyrano staggered his man. Le Bret, Cyrano's close friend, cautioned the gallant swordsman against making too many enemies by his insults.

Cyrano confessed that he was exceptionally moody lately because he was in love with his lovely cousin Roxane, despite the fact he could never hope to win her because of his ugliness. While Le Bret tried to give Cyrano confidence in himself, Roxane's chaperone appeared to give Cyrano a note from his cousin, who wanted to see him. Cyrano was overcome with joy.

The place selected for the meeting between Cyrano and Roxane was Ragueneau's tavern. Cyrano arrived early, and, while he waited for his beautiful cousin, he composed a love letter which he left unsigned because he intended to deliver it in person. When Roxane appeared, she confessed to Cyrano that she was in love. Cyrano thought for a moment that she was in love with him. But he soon realized that the lucky fellow was not Cyrano himself, but Christian. Roxane asked Cyrano to take the young soldier under his wing, to protect him in battle. Cyrano sadly consented to do her bidding.

Later, when Christian dared jest with Cyrano concerning the latter's nose, Cyrano restrained himself for Roxane's sake. When he learned that Cyrano was Roxane's cousin, Christian confessed his love for Roxane and begged Cyrano's help in winning her. Christian was a warrior, not a lover; he needed Cyrano's ability to compose pretty speeches and to write tender, graceful messages. Although his heart was broken, Cyrano gave the young man the letter he had written in Ragueneau's tavern.

Cyrano visited Roxane to inquire about her love affair with Christian. Roxane, who had recently received a letter from Christian, was delighted by his wit. Cyrano did not tell her that he was the writer of the letter.

Shortly afterward Christian told Cyrano that he now wanted to speak for himself in his wooing of Roxane. Under her balcony one evening Christian did try to speak for himself, but he became so tongue-tied that he had to ask the aid of Cyrano, who was lurking in the shadows. Cyrano, hidden, told Christian what to say, and Roxane was so delighted by these dictated protestations that she bestowed a kiss on Christian.

A friar appeared with a letter from the Count de Guiche, commander of Cyrano's regiment, to Roxane. The count wrote that he was coming to see her that night, even though by so doing he was deserting his post. Roxane deliberately misread the letter, which, she said, ordered the friar to marry her to Christian. Roxane asked Cyrano to delay de Guiche until after the ceremony, a request which de Bergerac effectively carried out by making the count think that Cyrano was mad. After learning that Roxane and Christian were already married, the duped de Guiche ordered Christian to report immediately to his regiment.

In a battle which followed, Cyrano and the other cadets were engaged against the Spanish. During the conflict Cyrano risked his life to send letters to Roxane through the enemy's lines, and Roxane never suspected that the author of these messages was not Christian. Later Roxane joined her husband, and to him she confessed that his masterful letters had brought her to his side.

Realizing that Roxane was really in love with the nobility and tenderness of Cyrano's letters, Christian begged Cyrano to tell Roxane the truth. But Christian was killed in battle shortly afterward, and Cyrano swore never to reveal Christian's secret. Rallying the cadets, Cyrano charged bravely into the fight, and under his leadership the Spanish were defeated.

Fifteen years passed. Roxane, grieving for Christian, had retired to a convent. Each week Cyrano was accustomed to visit Roxane. But one day he came late. When he arrived, he concealed under his hat a mortal wound which one of his enemies had inflicted by dropping an object from a building on Cyrano's head. While talking about her dead husband, Roxane recited to Cyrano Christian's last letter, which she kept next to her heart. With Roxane's permission, Cyrano read the letter which he himself had written, even though it had grown so dark that neither he nor Roxane could see the words.

Suddenly Roxane realized that Cyrano knew the contents of the letter by heart, that he must have written it. With this realization came her conviction that for fifteen years she had unknowingly loved the soul of Cyrano, not Christian. Roxane confessed her love for Cyrano, who died knowing that at last Roxane was aware of his love and that she shared it with him.

Author: Hermann Sudermann (1857-1928)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Germany

First published: 1887

Principal characters:

PAUL MEYERHOFER, a simple farmer

MAX MEYERHOFER, his father

FRAU ELSBETH, his mother

ELSBETH DOUGLAS, a neighbor girl

Critique:

This novel, which has enjoyed widespread critical acclaim, is frequently read in language classes. It is an outstanding example of German romanticism. The three hallmarks of its epoch are the style colored by a kind of world-sadness, its completely rural setting, and its sentimental tone. Dame Care—Frau Sorge in the original—covers a wide span of years in its action, but it is gracefully concise without being abrupt. Sudermann exhibits a paternal sympathy for his characters; perhaps his greatest gift is his understanding of all classes of people.

The Story:

About the time their third son, Paul, was born, the Meyerhofers lost through forced sale their country estate, Helenenthal. Meyerhofer tried to keep his wife, Frau Elsbeth, in ignorance of what was going on, but she was so uneasy in her bed that at last he told her that a family named Douglas had bought his property.

Meyerhofer was a violent man, given to grandiose schemes to make wealth and endowed with a martyr complex. It suited him to move his family to a humble farm, within sight of Helenenthal, where they would be constantly reminded of their lost prosperity. Frau Elsbeth, who was a docile woman, shuddered at the prospect.

Mrs. Douglas, a kind-hearted woman, came to see the mother and her baby. She assured Frau Elsbeth that she could stay on at Helenenthal as long as the family wished. The two women became good friends. Mrs. Douglas acted as godmother for Paul, and Frau Elsbeth was godmother for Elsbeth, a daughter born to the Douglasses a short time later. In spite of their friendship, however, Meyerhofer took offense at a fancied slight and moved his family in bleak November to their farm on the moor.

In those poor surroundings Paul led a secluded childhood. His mother, sensing his retiring disposition, was kind to him; his father was brutal. He continually ridiculed his son by comparing him unfavorably with his two lively older brothers. Paul was frequently beaten by his heavy-handed father, and after the beatings his mother would comfort him. She often told him stories; the one he remembered best was a frightening tale. It was about Dame Care, a gray woman who laid great burdens on poor people. Some years after they moved, Frau Elsbeth had twin daughters, Katie and Greta.

About the time Paul was learning to whistle, bad times came to the farm. The mortgage was due and there was no money to pay it. Day after day Meyerhofer drove into town and came back very late, usually drunk. In spite of the awe she felt for her husband, Frau Elsbeth determined to seek help. She took Paul with her to Helenenthal on a memorable visit. There she explained her husband's dislike for the Douglas family and asked for their help. The amiable Mr. Douglas gave her the money to pay the mortgage. Paul played with Elsbeth while the grownups visited.

At school Paul did not succeed easily. He had to study a long time to get his work done and he had to memorize all the answers to problems. But his handwriting was very good. The Erdmann brothers, wild-eyed and saucy, made his life miserable for years. They often beat him, stole his lunch, and threw his clothes into the river.

The Meyerhofer property was surrounded by a peat bog. Always too busy to pay attention to his farm, Meyerhofer bought a used steam engine to harvest peat. He gave half his harvest as down payment to Levy, a sharp trader, and hired an engineer whom Levy had recommended. But the old engine would never run, and Meyerhofer learned that the supposed engineer was only a tramp hired by Levy for a few days' imposture. That winter, when Levy came to collect the other half of the harvest, the duped Meyerhofer drove him off with a whip. Levy, a shrewd man of business, went to a lawyer. Meyerhofer was compelled to give up his harvest and, in addition, pay a heavy fine.

After the older brothers had been sent away to school there was no money to educate Paul, who was sent to confirmation classes. He saw Elsbeth there, even sat near her. She was kind to the boy and went out of her way to speak to him. The Erdmann brothers teased them about the friendship and said that Paul was sweethearting. Hating ridicule, Paul seldom spoke to Elsbeth.

For five years Paul, toiling on the farm, got little help from his father. Once when he was out seeding a distant field, Paul saw Elsbeth. Delighted to see him again, she gave him a book of Heine's poetry, and she was impressed with his ability to whistle whole symphonies. Once after she had been abroad for a long time, a party was given on her return and Paul and his family were invited. The rest of the Meyerhofers went early in the day, but Paul went after dark so that no one would see his shabby clothes. He watched his two sisters having a merry time, and saw his father talking grandly with Mr. Douglas.

Out of sympathy for Paul, Mr. Douglas agreed to go in with Meyerhofer on one of his schemes. On the strength of Douglas' endorsement, Meyerhofer borrowed money recklessly. When he heard what was going on, Mr. Douglas came to the farm and told Meyerhofer to stop. Meyerhofer set the dog on him, but Mr. Douglas, though bitten, choked the savage beast. While Paul was apologizing to his neighbor, Meyerhofer attacked a servant, Michel, who had watched the scene. Michel picked up an ax. Paul took it away from him and threw it down a well. Then he carried his struggling father into the house. From that day on Paul was master in the household.

While Paul was wandering late one night near Helenenthal, he saw brilliant flames shooting from his farm buildings. Michel had fired the barn. Paul was able to save the house, the livestock, and the old steam engine, but everything else was lost.

Beaten in spirit, Frau Elsbeth died a lingering death. At the funeral Paul saw Elsbeth again. Since her own mother was incurably ill, she felt a strong bond of sympathy for Paul. Later Paul, with the aid of books on mechanics sent by his remote brothers, began to rebuild the steam engine which had been his father's folly. He worked so hard that he had little time to look after his sisters. One night he overheard them in the meadow with the Erdmann boys and learned that his sisters' honor had been smirched by his old enemies. Waiting in a deserted road for them at night, he forced them at pistol point to swear they would marry Katie and Greta.

Finally getting the old steam engine to work, Paul began to cut and market peat. As his trade increased he became a man of substance and traveled about Germany. He heard of Elsbeth from time to time and knew she planned to marry her cousin.

One night, eight years after their barn burned, Paul suspected Meyerhofer's intention to burn the Douglas barn. To distract his father from his mad deed, he set fire to his own house and barn and was seriously burned in the flames.

Paul was taken to Helenenthal. The searchers had found Meyerhofer dead of a stroke near the Douglas barn, a broken pot of petroleum by his side. Although it was Elsbeth's wedding day, she insisted on staying by Paul's bed. The vicar was sent away, and her cousin left. For many weary days Elsbeth watched over Paul.

After his recovery Paul was tried for the deliberate burning of his own house. Admitting his guilt, he blamed himself for always having been so timid and withdrawn. Now that he had lost everything, he felt himself free at last. Dame Care, who had been his nemesis all his life, had been routed.

Paul was sentenced to two years in prison. On his release Elsbeth and Mr. Douglas met him to take him home. Both Helenenthal and Elsbeth would be his.

THE DAMNATION OF THERON WARE

Author: Harold Frederic (1856-1898)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The 1890's

Locale: New York State

First published: 1896

Principal characters:

THERON WARE, a young Methodist minister

ALICE WARE, his wife

FATHER FORBES, a Catholic priest

CELIA MADDEN, a rich young Irish-Catholic girl

DR. LEDSMAR, Father Forbes' friend

MR. GORRINGE, a trustee of Theron's church

Critique:

The Damnation of Theron Ware was one of the first novels to deal with the problems of an American clergyman. While the book was in part an indictment of the hypocrisy of a particular denomination, it was not meant to be wholly so. The author intended to show that any individual was bound to fall who was not given a moral bulwark on which to lean in adversity. The novel condemns the minister's denomination only in so far as it did not prepare him to meet the beliefs of others and accept them, while still holding to the beliefs in which he had been trained. It is the training, not the denomination, which is taken to task.

The Story:

Theron Ware had gone to the annual statewide meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church with great expectation of being appointed to the large church in Tecumseh. He was greatly disappointed, therefore, when he was sent to Octavius, a small rural community.

To the minister and his wife, the town and its citizens did not appear formidable at first, but a hint of what was to come occurred the first morning after their arrival. A boy who delivered milk to Mrs. Ware informed her that he could not deliver milk on Sunday because the trustees of the church would object. Shortly afterward the trustees told the new minister that his sermons were too dignified and that Mrs. Ware's Sunday bonnet was far too elaborate for a minister's wife. Theron and his wife were depressed. Unhappy in his new charge, Theron decided to write a book about Abraham.

One day Theron assisted an injured Irish-Catholic workman and went home with him to see what help he might give. At the man's deathbed Theron observed the parish priest and a pretty young red-haired girl, Celia Madden, who assisted him. Upon becoming acquainted with these two, the minister was surprised to find that his earlier hostility to Catholics and the Irish was foolish. These people were more cultured than he, as he learned a few evenings later when he went to the priest for some advice in connection with his proposed book.

At the priest's home he met Dr. Ledsmar, a retired physician interested in Biblical research. Both the priest and the doctor knew a great deal about the actual culture of Abraham and his people. They tried to be tactful, but the young minister quickly saw how wrong he had been to think himself ready to write a religious book on any topic; all he knew was the little he had been taught at his Methodist Seminary.

Upon leaving Father Forbes and the doctor, Theron walked past the Catholic church. Hearing music within, he entered to find Celia Madden at the organ. Later he walked home with her and discovered that she was interested in literature and art as well as music. Once again that evening Theron was made to realize how little he actually knew. He went home with the feeling that his own small world was not a very cultured one.

Three months later there was a revival at Theron's church. Mr. and Mrs. Soulsby, two professional exhorters, arrived to lead a week of meetings which were designed to pay off the church debt and put fervor into its members. The Wares, who entertained the Soulsbys, were surprised to find that the revival leaders were very much like insurance salesmen, employing very much the same tactics. During the revival week Theron was nonplussed to discover what he thought were the beginnings of an affair between his wife and one of the trustees of his church, Mr. Gorringer.

In a long talk with Mrs. Soulsby, Theron told her that he had almost decided to give up the Methodist ministry because of the shallowness he had discovered in his people and in his church. Mrs. Soulsby pointed out to him that Methodists were no worse than anyone else in the way of hypocrisy, and that all they lacked was an external discipline. She also reminded him that he was incapable of making a living because he lacked any worldly training.

Theron's life was further complicated when he realized that he was beginning to fall in love with Celia Madden. Because of her interest in music, he had asked her advice in buying a piano for his home, and she had, unknown to him, paid part of the bill for the instrument. He also found time to call on Dr. Ledsmar, whose peculiar views on the early church interested him. He disgusted the old doctor, however, with his insinuations of an affair between Father Forbes and Celia.

In September the Methodists of Octavius had a camp meeting. Its fervor did not appeal to Theron, after his more intellectual religious reading and his discussions with Celia and Father Forbes, and he went off quietly by himself. In the woods he came upon a picnic given by Father Forbes' church. At the picnic he met Celia and had a long talk with her, kissed her, and told her of his unhappiness in his double bondage to church and wife.

Soon afterward he alienated Celia by telling her that he was afraid of scandal if he were seen talking with her. He also offended Father Forbes by reports that Dr. Ledsmar had spoken slightly of Celia. The priest told his housekeeper that he was no longer at home to Theron Ware.

One day Theron openly confronted his wife with his suspicions about her and Mr. Gorringer. She denied the charges, but her very denial seemed to speak against her in her husband's mind. In his unhappiness he went to see Celia. She was not at home, but her brother, who was dying slowly of tuberculosis, saw him. With the license of the dying he said that when Theron arrived in Octavius he had the face of an angel, full of innocence, but that in the eight months the minister had spent in the little town his face had taken on a look of deceit and cunning. Celia's brother continued by warning the minister that he should stay among his own people, that it was bad for him to tear himself from the support which Methodism had given him.

Leaving the Madden home, Theron learned that Celia was going to New York City. It occurred to him that Father Forbes was also going to the city that evening and perhaps they were traveling together. He went home and told his wife that urgent business called him to Albany; then he went to the station and boarded the train unseen. In New York he saw the priest and Celia meet, and he followed them to a hotel. After the priest had left the hotel, he went upstairs and knocked at Celia's door. She told him that she was busy and did not wish to see him, adding that she had noticed him following her earlier in the journey. While he pleaded with her, Father Forbes came in with some other gentlemen and informed Theron that they had come to New York to get another brother of Celia's out of a bad scrape.

Dismissed, Theron stumbled down the stairs. A few days later he arrived at the Soulsby house at dawn. He told an incoherent story of having tried to commit suicide, of stealing money from the church at Octavius, and of wandering alone about the city for hours while he tried to drink himself to death.

The Soulsbys took him in and sent for his wife. He was ill for months. After his recovery both he and his wife realized that he was never meant for the ministry. Through the Soulsbys, Theron was finally able to make a new start in a real estate office in Seattle. Theron knew he would make a successful real estate agent. Or if that failed, he could try politics. There was still time enough for him to be in Congress before he was forty.

THE DANCE OF DEATH

Author: August Strindberg (1849-1912)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: Sweden

First presented: 1901

Principal characters:

EDGAR, a captain in the Swedish coast artillery

ALICE, his wife

JUDITH, their daughter

CURT, Alice's cousin

ALLAN, Curt's son, in love with Judith

Critique:

The dramatic works of Strindberg have seldom been translated or produced in English-speaking countries, although his plays are known throughout Europe. Strindberg was especially interested in establishing a Swedish dramatic literature comparable to that of Ibsen in Norway. This particular play was written in two parts, in the way that Shakespeare wrote Henry IV in two parts; it is, in essence, a double play, the first part dealing with the mature adults and the second with their children. European critics have often referred to The Dance of Death as Strindberg's greatest dramatic achievement. The characters are real to the reader, shockingly so. And yet, beyond the intense realism, there is a fabric of symbolism, the meaning of which is nothing less than the vast sum of human relationships.

The Story:

For twenty-five years Edgar, a captain in the Swedish coast artillery, and his wife Alice had lived an unhappy existence. Their unhappiness was caused by Edgar's contempt for everyone else in the world; he thought of himself as a better being than others, even his wife, and he had made their marriage a tyranny. They lived on an island off the coast, where Edgar was the commanding officer of the artillery detachment. Living in an old prison, they avoided the other people of the island as well as officers of the post and their wives. Indeed, Alice was virtually a prisoner in her home. The only means of communication she had with the mainland was through a telegraph key, which she had taught herself to operate. Her skill she kept a secret, for her husband did not want her to have any means of communication with the outside world.

Alice's only hope of release from her husband's tyranny lay in the fact that he was ill and might die at any time. On their silver wedding anniversary Curt, Alice's cousin, arrived on the island to officiate as the quarantine officer. On his first visit to Edgar and Alice he learned about the life which they led, when Edgar suffered an attack and Alice gloated over her husband's illness. Curt, who had been divorced by his wife, also learned that Edgar had caused the divorce and persuaded the court to award the custody of the children to Curt's wife.

During the two days that Edgar lay ill, grave changes took place in the three people. Alice turned gray-haired; feeling that the time had come when she should admit her age, she had stopped tinting her hair. She also became an object of distrust to Curt, for she tried to make love to her cousin while her husband lay ill. Curt, unable to understand her actions, could not fully realize how much she hated her husband and how much she had suffered during the past twenty-five years. Edgar himself resembled a corpse after his illness; but he immediately tried, upon his recovery, to dominate the others.

On the third day after his attack the captain told his wife he was going to divorce her. In retaliation, she tried to have him convicted of the embezzlement of government funds, of which he was innocent. She also embraced her cousin Curt in her husband's presence, at which time Edgar tried to kill her with his saber. After that incident, both husband and wife subsided emotionally, admitting they had tortured each other enough. They both said they hoped that they could get along with each other peaceably, if not happily.

A few months later Curt's son Allan, a cadet stationed with Edgar's artillery company, fell in love with Judith, the daughter of Alice and Edgar. The parents, failing to realize the youngsters were serious in their affair, thought that Judith was making game of Allan at her father's request, for Edgar hated Allan because he was Curt's son. At the time Edgar was trying to arrange a marriage for Judith with a major in the regiment, a man older than Edgar. The lovers' quarrels of the two young people only served to heighten the illusion under which the three grownups labored.

Edgar, meanwhile, was also busy undermining Curt's position as quarantine officer. After gleaning information from Curt, he then published articles about quarantine management in periodicals and thus gained a reputation for himself in a field in which he was actually ignorant. After his retirement, the result of his illness, he planned to run for the national legislature, in opposition to Curt, who had expected to try for an office. Edgar completely discredited Curt with the voters by taking up a subscription for his rival, who, acting on Edgar's advice, had lost a great deal of money in an unwise investment. With deliberate malice, Edgar did everything he could to discredit Curt in the eyes of the world and to reduce him to abject poverty and dependence.

After Curt had lost his money, Edgar bought his house and its furnishings and then left the house exactly as it was, in order to make the loss more poignant to Curt. Then Edgar was made an inspector of quarantine stations, an appointment which made him Curt's superior in employment. Curt, accepting his reverses calmly and stoically, refused to lose his head, even though Alice tried to make him seek revenge. Alice still hoped that her ailing husband might die quickly, before he could completely ruin the lives of Curt, his son Allan, Judith, and Alice herself.

In the meantime the captain continued his plan to marry Judith to a man who could help to fulfill Edgar's ambitions. Instead of marrying her to the major, he arranged a marriage to the colonel of his old regiment, notwithstanding the fact that the colonel was more than forty years older than the girl. So far as anyone could suppose, the marriage was to take place; Judith herself seemed to be agreeable to the match. Alice made one last attempt to spoil the plan, but a letter she had written was intercepted by Edgar and returned by him to his wife.

Judith herself ruined Edgar's scheme by revealing her true love to Allan. To prevent the marriage, she called the colonel on the telephone, insulted him, and broke off the engagement. Then, with her mother's aid, she arranged to go to Allan at the military post to which Edgar had sent him. The failure of his plan was too much for Edgar. He suffered an apopleptic stroke, much to the delight of his wife, who saw revenge at last for all that she and the other members of the family had suffered at the sick man's hands. Unable to control her delight at Edgar's approaching death, she taunted him on his deathbed with the fact that he was hated and that his evil plans were finally going awry. His only answer, since he had lost the power of speech, was to spit in her face.

After Edgar's death, which occurred within a few hours, both his wife and her cousin admitted that death had changed their attitudes toward the dead man. Alice said she must have loved him as well as hated him, and she hoped that peace would rest with his soul.

THE DARK JOURNEY

Author: Julian Green (1900- )

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: France

First published: 1929

Principal characters:

PAUL GUÉRET, a neurotic tutor

ANGÈLE, a young laundress

MADAME LONDE, a restaurant proprietress

MONSIEUR GROSGEORGE, Guéret's employer

MADAME GROSGEORGE, his wife

FERNANDE, a young girl

Critique:

Like all of Julian Green's work, The Dark Journey is a bleak and somber book, impressive both in its realistic evocation of French provincial life and in its metaphysical overtones of human destiny. Shadows of disaster and doom brood over his pages; his characters, as in the case of Paul Guéret and Madame Grosgeorge, have premonitions of their fates, but they are powerless to help themselves. This novel, published in France under the title Léviathan, deals with the twin themes of violence and lust. Nothing is trivial, however, and little is vulgar. Instead, with impersonal detachment and classic gravity of style, the writer tells a story of disturbing but compelling vigor, in which violence and melodrama are only incidental to his vastly greater effects of cumulative passion and tragic finality.

The Story:

Paul Guéret was an incompetent, prematurely-aged tutor hired to instruct the sickly, backward son of a prosperous provincial family named Grosgeorge. Knowing himself a failure and tired of the wife whom he no longer loved, he had hoped that life would be better in Chanteilles; but within a month he was just as wretched there as he had been in Paris, where his feelings of self-pity and frustration had often driven him into sordid love affairs. In Chanteilles, bored by his dreary surroundings, he soon found himself infatuated with Angèle, a young girl who worked in a laundry. Hoping to become her lover, he began to write letters asking her to meet him. Sometimes he followed her at a distance when she delivered washing to her customers.

One night he accosted her at a footbridge on the outskirts of the town. Hating himself for his shabby clothes and stammering speech, he offered her a cheap ring stolen from his wife. Although she accepted the ring, the girl did not encourage his attentions. His abrupt yet furtive ardor both attracted and repelled her.

THE DARK JOURNEY by Julian Green. By permission of the publishers, Harper & Brothers. Copyright, 1929, by Harper & Brothers.

That same night Guéret went by chance to the Restaurant Londe in nearby Lorges. There Madame Londe, the proprietress, presided majestically behind her cashier's desk. A sly woman whose days were given over to spying and gossip, she delighted in alternately cajoling and bullying her patrons, who seemed to hold her resentfully in awe. When Guéret entered, she was disturbed because he was a stranger and she knew nothing about him. Refusing to let him pay for his dinner, she had him write his name in her account book. Her desire was to add him to her regular clientele.

Madame Londe's hold over her patrons was a sinister one, maintained through her niece, Angèle. Because the girl was indebted to her for food and a room, she forced Angèle to sell her favors to the habitués of the restaurant. With knowledge thus gained of the guilt and secret vices of her patrons, she was able to dictate to them as she pleased. Her own position as a procuress gave her no worry; her only concern was her lust for power over others.

Upset by his desire for Angèle, Guéret paid little attention to his duties as a tutor. André Grosgeorge was a poor student, but his mother shrewdly blamed Guéret for her son's slow progress. Madame Grosgeorge was a woman in whom the starved passions of her girlhood had turned to a tortured kind of love which found its outlet in cruelty and treachery. Because the husband whom she despised ignored her nagging tirades, she took special pleasure in beating her son and in humiliating Guéret.

Monsieur Grosgeorge felt sorry for the browbeaten tutor. Having guessed that Guéret was unhappily married, he bluntly advised him to find a mistress before he wasted his years in moping dullness. That, said Grosgeorge, was the course he himself had followed. One day he boastingly produced a note in which the writer asked Grosgeorge to meet her the next night. Guéret, staring at the letter, shook with suppressed rage. He recognized the scrawl as Angèle's handwriting.

Angèle, after several meetings with Guéret, became more independent in her attitude toward Madame Londe. Because his conduct was quite different from that of other men who sought her favors, she no longer wished to sell herself in order to act as her aunt's informant. During a quarrel Angèle, who refused to keep an assignation the old woman had arranged, threatened to run away. Madame Londe was worried. Afraid that she would lose her hold over her patrons, she began to train Fernande, a twelve-year-old girl, to take Angèle's place.

Guéret returned to the Restaurant Londe. During the meal he learned from the talk of the other diners that Angèle was Madame Londe's niece and that she had given herself to most of the men there. That night, driven to desperation by his knowledge, he broke into her bedroom. It was empty. When Madame Londe, aroused by his entry, screamed for help, he ran away and hid in a wood. On his way back to Chanteilles he met Angèle. In sudden, brutal fury he picked up a branch and struck at her until blood covered her face and head.

All that day he skulked beside the river. While he was sneaking back into town after dark, he met a feeble old man. Fearing capture, he seized the old man's stick and beat him to death. Filled with blind terror, he fled across the yards of unknown houses and through back streets of the town.

The neighborhood was shocked by the brutality of Guéret's crime, and for weeks the townspeople refused to venture into the streets at night. Angèle, disfigured for life, refused to give the name of her assailant and remained shut up in her room above the restaurant. Only Madame Grosgeorge scoffed at those who bolted their doors at dusk. Indeed, she seemed to relish the fact that the shabby, blundering tutor had scarred the face of her husband's mistress and violently disrupted the monotony of her own existence.

At last the hue and cry died down. Guéret, unable to stay away from Angèle, returned to the district. Madame Grosgeorge, out walking, saw him near the footbridge and called after him that she would meet him there the next evening. Guéret did not appear, although she waited impatiently for more than an hour. Later he came to her villa, and she, unknown to her husband, hid the fugitive in her private sitting-room. She promised that she would give him money and some of her husband's clothing before she sent him away in the morning.

But his presence in the house gave her such strange satisfaction that she refused to let him go as she had promised. The next morning she went to her sitting-room and tried to talk to him about his crimes. When his answers showed only that he was still in love with Angèle, Madame Grosgeorge felt cheated. She had admired him for his violence; now she despised him for his foolish passion. Again she locked him in the room while she tried to decide what to do. Little Fernande came to deliver some laundry. On impulse Madame Grosgeorge wrote a note telling Angèle that Guéret was in her house and asking that the police be called.

Madame Londe, always on the alert, intercepted the message and hurried to give the alarm. Angèle, learning what had happened, sent Fernande to warn the fugitive that he must escape at once. Madame Grosgeorge, meanwhile, had returned to Guéret. When he insisted that she let him go, she locked the door and threw the key out of the window. Then she told him that Angèle knew his whereabouts and that if he were betrayed the laundress would be to blame. Taking a revolver from her desk, she put it in her belt and calmly prepared to write a letter. Fernande ran into the garden. Guéret, leaning out of the window, asked her to pick up the key and unlock the door. A report sounded behind him. Madame Grosgeorge had shot herself.

Critique:

Death in Venice is a short novel of great psychological intensity and tragic power. To read it simply as the story of a middle-aged artist whose character deteriorates because of his hopeless passion for a young Polish boy and whose death is the final irony of his emotional upheaval is to miss almost all of the writer's intention in this fable. Here Mann brings together most of the conflicting themes which have occupied him in his longer works of fiction: being and death, youth and age, sickness and health, beauty and decay, love and suffering, art and life, the German North and the classic lands of the Mediterranean. The symbols are complex and numerous. One effective device is the reappearance of the same character on different crucial occasions in the narrative. As the stranger in the cemetery, for example, he is a summoner sent to lure Aschenbach from the discipline and devotion which are the standards of the writer's craft, but later, as the mysterious gondolier, he is Charon ferrying a lost soul on his last journey. In this work Mann examines understandingly and critically the solitary position of the artist in modern society, and he uses the theme of Aschenbach's infatuation to dramatize in symbolic fashion the narcissism which can be one of the fatal qualities of art.

The Story:

Gustave von Aschenbach was a distinguished German writer whose work had brought him world fame and a patent of nobility from a grateful government. His career had been honorable and dignified. A man of ambitious nature, unmarried, he had lived a life of personal discipline and dedication to his art, and in his portrayal of heroes who combined the forcefulness of a Frederick the Great with the selfless striving of a Saint Sebastian he believed that he had spoken for his race as well as for the deathless spirit of man. At the same time his devotion to the ideals of duty and achievement had brought him close to physical collapse.

One day, after a morning spent at his desk, he left his house in Munich and went for a walk. His stroll took him as far as a cemetery on the outskirts of the city. While he waited for a streetcar which would carry him back to town, he suddenly became aware of a man who stood watching him from the doorway of the mortuary chapel. The stranger, who had a rucksack on his back and a walking staff in his hand, was evidently a traveler. Although no word passed between the watcher and the watched, Aschenbach felt a sudden desire to take a trip, to leave the cold, wet German spring for the warmer climate of the Mediterranean lands. His impulse was strengthened by a problem of technique which he had been unable to solve in his writing. At last, reluctantly, he decided to take a holiday and leave his work for a time in order to find relaxation for mind and body in Italy.

He went first to an island resort in the Adriatic, but before long he became bored with his surroundings and booked passage for Venice. On the ship he encountered a party of lively young clerks from Pola. With them was an old man whose dyed hair and rouged cheeks made him a ridiculous but sinister caricature of youth. In his disgust Aschenbach failed to notice that the raddled old man bore a vague resemblance to the traveler he had seen at the cemetery in Munich.

Aschenbach's destination was the Lido. At the dock in Venice he transferred to a gondola which took him by the water route to his Lido hotel. The gondolier spoke and acted so strangely that Aschenbach became disturbed, and because of his agitation he never noticed that the man looked something like the drunk old scarecrow on the ship and the silent stranger at the cemetery. After taking his passenger to the landing stage, the gondolier, without waiting for his money, hastily rowed away. Other boatmen suggested that he might have been afraid of the law because he had no license.

Aschenbach stayed at the Hotel des Bains. That night, shortly before dinner, his attention was drawn to a Polish family, a beautiful mother, three daughters, and a handsome boy of about fourteen. Aschenbach was unaccountably attracted to the youngster, so much so that he continued to watch the family all through his meal. The next morning he saw the boy playing with some companions on the beach. His name, as Aschenbach learned while watching their games, was Tadzio.

Disturbed by the appeal the boy had for him, the writer announced his intention of returning home, but on his arrival at the railroad station in Venice he discovered that his trunks had been misdirected to Como. Since there was nothing for him to do but to wait for his missing luggage to turn up, he went back to the hotel. Even though he despised himself for his vacillation, he realized that his true desire was to be near Tadzio. For Aschenbach there began a period of happiness and anguish, happiness in watching the boy, anguish in that they must remain strangers. One day he almost summoned up enough courage to speak to the youngster. A moment later he became panic-stricken lest Tadzio be alarmed by the older man's interest. The time Aschenbach had set for his holiday passed, but the writer had almost forgotten his home and his work. One evening Tadzio smiled at him as they passed one another. Aschenbach trembled with pleasure.

Guests began to leave the hotel; there were rumors that a plague had broken out in nearby cities. Aschenbach, going one day to loiter on the Piazza, detected the sweetish odor of disinfectant in the air, for the authorities were beginning to take precautions against an outbreak of the plague in Venice. Aschenbach stubbornly decided to stay on in spite of the dangers of infection.

A band of entertainers came to the hotel to serenade the guests. In the troupe was an impudent, disreputable-looking street singer whose antics and ballads were insulting and obscene. As he passed among the guests to collect money for the performance, Aschenbach detected on his clothing the almost overpowering smell of disinfectant, an odor suggesting the sweetly corruptive taints of lust and death. The ribald comedian also had a strange similarity to the gondolier, the rouged old rake, and the silent traveler whose disturbing presence had given Aschenbach the idea for his holiday. Aschenbach was torn between fear and desire. The next day he went to a tourist agency where a young clerk told him that people were dying of the plague in Venice. Even that confirmation of his fears failed to speed Aschenbach's departure from the city. That night he dreamed that in a fetid jungle, surrounded by naked orgiasts, he was taking part in horrible, Priapean rites.

By that time his deterioration was almost complete. At last he allowed a barber to dye his hair and tint his cheeks, but he still refused to see the likeness between himself and the raddled old fop whose appearance had disgusted him on shipboard. His behavior became more reckless. One afternoon he followed the Polish family into Venice and trailed them through the city streets. Hungry and thirsty after his exercise, he bought some overripe strawberries at an open stall and ate them. The odor of disinfectant was strong on the sultry breeze.

Several days later Aschenbach went down to the beach where Tadzio was playing with three or four other boys. They began to fight and one of the boys threw Tadzio to the ground and pressed his face into the sand. As Aschenbach was about to interfere, the other boy released his victim. Humiliated and hurt, Tadzio walked down to the water. He stood facing seaward for a time, as remote and isolated as a young Saint Sebastian, and then he turned and looked with somber, secret gaze at Aschenbach, who was watching from his beach chair. To the writer it seemed as though the boy were summoning him. He started to rise but became so giddy that he fell back into his chair. Attendants carried him to his room. That night the world learned that the great Gustave von Aschenbach had died suddenly of the plague in Venice.

GEORGE WINTERBOURNE, killed in the war
MR. GEORGE WINTERBOURNE, his father
MRS. GEORGE WINTERBOURNE, his mother
ELIZABETH, his wife
FANNY WELFORD, his mistress

Critique:

With cynicism that is almost morbid in its brutality, Richard Aldington here tells the story of a soldier killed in World War I. It was the author's belief that the hero had deliberately allowed himself to be killed, so confused and miserable was the life which he had attempted to divide between his wife and mistress. The author, attempting to show that the shabby childhood through which the hero lived was responsible for his troubles, purports to tell only the truth. But the truth as he sees it is so bitter that in the telling Aldington condemns not only a generation but a whole society.

The Story:

When word was received that George Winterbourne had been killed in the war, his friend tried to reconstruct the life of the dead man in order to see what forces had caused his death. The friend had served with George at various times during the war, and it was his belief that George had deliberately exposed himself to German fire because he no longer wanted to live.

George Winterbourne's father had been a sentimental fool and his mother a depraved wanton. The elder Winterbourne had married primarily to spite his dominating mother, and his bride had married him under the mistaken notion that he was rich. They gave themselves up to mutual hatred, the mother showering her thwarted love on young George. She imagined herself young and desirable and was proud of her twenty-two lovers. Her husband conveniently went to a hotel when she was entertaining, but he prayed for her soul. All in all, they were the most depressing parents to whom a child could be exposed and undoubtedly they caused young George to hate them both. Soon after receiving word of their son's death, the elder Winterbourne was killed in an accident. Mrs. Winterbourne married her twenty-second lover and moved to Australia, but not before she had thoroughly enjoyed being a bereft mother and widow.

When he reached young manhood, George mingled with all sorts of queer people. He dabbled in writing and painting—the modern variety. Sexual freedom was his goal, even though he had experienced little of it. At an affair given by his pseudo-intellectual friends he first met Elizabeth. They were immediately compatible; both hated their parents and both sought freedom. At first Elizabeth was shocked by George's attacks on Christianity, morals, the class system, and all other established institutions, but she soon recognized him as a truly "free" man. In fact, it was not long before she adopted his ideas and went him one better. Free love was the only thing she could talk or think about. Thinking themselves extremely sensible, they saw no reason to marry in order to experience love as long as they were careful not to have a baby. Babies complicated matters, for the ignorant middle classes still frowned on such children. Unknowingly, George and Elizabeth were about as middle class as it was possible to be.

The two lovers planned carefully to have no sordidness cloud their affair. They did not talk of love, only sex. They were to take all the other lovers they pleased. That was freedom in an intelligent way. Elizabeth was even more insistent than George upon such freedom.

Finally, Elizabeth mistakenly thought that she was pregnant. Gone were the new freedoms, the enlightened woman; George must marry her at once, for female honor was at stake. All the old clichés were dragged out for poor old George. They were married, much to the horror of their families. When the mistake was discovered, supplemented by the doctor's statement that Elizabeth could not possibly have a child without an operation, back came freedom, stronger than ever. She became an evangelist, even though she detested the word, for sex. Marriage made no difference in their lives. They continued to live separately, meeting as lovers.

When Elizabeth had to make a trip home, George became the lover of her best friend, Fanny Welford, another enlightened woman. He was sure that Elizabeth would not mind, for she had become the mistress of Fanny's lover. Thus he was quite stunned when Elizabeth kicked up a row about Fanny. However, the girls remained surface friends, each one too free to admit horror at the other's duplicity.

War had been approaching fast while these friends had been practicing their enlightened living. George was drafted and sent quickly to France. The war poisoned George. Killing horrified him, and he began to imagine his own death. He was brave, but not from any desire to be a hero; it was just that the monotony of his existence seemed to demand that he keep going even though he was ready to drop from fatigue. The knowledge of the ill-concealed dislike between Fanny and Elizabeth began to prey on his mind. There seemed to be only two solutions: to drift along and accept whatever happened or to get himself killed in the war. It seemed to make little difference to him or anyone else which course he chose. His letters to his two women depressed each of them. Had he known their feelings he could have been spared his worry about them. Each took other lovers and gave little thought to George.

His own depression increased. He felt that he was degenerating mentally as well as physically, that he was wasting what should have been his best years. He knew that he would be terribly handicapped if he did live through the war, that those not serving would have passed him by.

George was made an officer and sent back to England for training. There he lived again with Elizabeth, but she left him frequently to go out with other men. Fanny, too, seemed to care little whether she saw him or not. Talk of the war and his experiences obviously bored them, and they made only a small pretense of being interested. He spent his last night in England with Fanny, Elizabeth being off with someone else. Fanny did not bother to get up with him the morning he left. In fact, she awoke lazily, then went to sleep again before he even left the flat.

Back at the front, George found that he was ill-suited to command a company. Although he did his best, he was constantly censured by his colonel, who blamed George for all the faults of his untrained and cowardly troops. George himself could think of little but death. During a particularly heavy German shelling he simply stood upright and let the bullets smash into his chest. Who knows whether his death was an act of heroism or one of complete and utter futility?

THE WOMAN

Critique:

Death of a Salesman represents a successful attempt to blend the themes of social and personal tragedy within the same dramatic framework. For the story of Willy Loman is also the story of false values sustained by almost every agency of publicity and advertisement in our national life. Willy Loman accepts at face value the over-publicized ideals of material success and blatant optimism, and therein lies his tragedy. His downfall and final defeat illustrate not only the failure of a man but also the failure of a way of life. The playwright's ability to project the story of his tragic, lower middle-class hero into the common experience of so many Americans who sustain themselves with illusions and ignore realities makes this play one of the most significant in the American theater in recent years.

The Story:

When Willy Loman came home on the same day he had left on a trip through his New England territory, his wife Linda knew that he was near the breaking point. Lately he had begun to talk to himself about things out of the past. That day he had run off the road two or three times without knowing what he was doing, and he had come home in fear. Willy, sixty-three, had given all his life to the company. He told himself they would just have to make a place for him in the New York home office. Traveling all week and driving futile miles had become too much for him.

Willy had had such hopes before Biff came home from his last job. Biff had always been the favorite, though Happy was the more settled and successful son. Biff was thirty-four now and still had to find himself, but Willy knew he would settle down when the time came. The boy had been the greatest football player his school had ever known. In a game at Ebbets Field he had been a hero. Three colleges offered him scholarships. Biff had not gone to college, had not done anything but bum around the West, never making more than twenty-eight dollars a week. It was hard to understand him.

During the next two days, Willy's whole life unrolled before him, today's reality intermingled with yesterday's half-forgotten episodes. Broken as it was, the pictures told the story of Willy Loman, salesman.

Perhaps the first mistake was in not following his brother Ben to Alaska—or was it Africa? Ben had wanted Willy to join him, but Willy was a salesman. Some weeks he averaged two hundred dollars. No, that was not quite true; it was nearer seventy. But he would make the grade, he told Ben, and so he stayed in New York. Ben went into the jungle a pauper; four years later he came back from the diamond mines a rich man.

Willy's boys were both well liked; that was important. Bernard, Charley's son, was liked, but not well liked. Bernard had begged to carry Biff's shoulder pads that day at Ebbets Field. Sometimes Willy had worried a little about the boys. Biff stole a football from school, and a whole case of them from the sporting goods store where he worked. He did not mean any harm, Willy knew. Willy even laughed when the boys stole a little lumber from a construction job nearby; no one would miss it. Willy and the boys used it to make the front stoop.

But that day at Ebbets Field seemed to be the last great day in Biff's life. Willy had left for Boston after the game, but surely that little Boston affair had not made the difference in the boy. Willy was with a woman when Biff burst in on him. Biff had failed math and could not take one of the scholarships unless Willy talked to the teacher and got him to change the grade. Willy was ready to leave for New York at once, but when Biff saw the woman in Willy's room, he left. Things were never the same afterward.

There was also Happy, who used to stand in Biff's shadow. Happy was a magnificent specimen, just like Biff, and there was not a woman in the world he could not have. An assistant merchandising manager, he would be manager someday, a big man. So would Biff. Biff needed only to find himself.

On the day Willy Loman turned back home he dreamed his biggest dreams. Biff would go back to that sporting goods store and get a loan from the owner to set himself and Happy up in business. That man had always loved Biff. And Willy would go to young Howard Wagner, his boss's son, and demand to be given a place in the New York office. They would celebrate that night at dinner. Biff and Happy would give Willy a night on the town to celebrate their mutual success.

But Biff failed to get the loan. That man who had loved Biff did not even recognize him. To get even, Biff stole a fountain pen and ran down eleven flights with it. And when Howard heard Willy's story, he told him to turn in his samples and take a rest. Willy realized he was through. He went to Charley for more money, for he had been borrowing from Charley since he had been put on straight commission months ago. Bernard was in Charley's office. He was on his way to plead a case before the Supreme Court. Willy could not understand it. Charley had never given his life for his boy as Willy had for his. Charley offered Willy a job, but Willy said he was a salesman. They loved him in New England; he would show them yet.

Willy stumbled in to the dinner they had planned, a failure himself but hoping for good news about Biff. Hearing of Biff's failure, he was completely broken. Happy picked up two girls, and he and Biff left Willy alone.

When Biff and Happy finally came home, Linda ordered them out of the house by morning. She was afraid because Willy had tried to kill himself once before. Giving vent to his anger and sense of defeat, Biff cursed Willy for a fool and a dreamer. He forced himself and Willy to acknowledge that Biff had been only a clerk in that store, not a salesman; that Biff had been jailed in Kansas City for stealing; that Happy was not an assistant manager but a clerk and a philandering, woman-chasing bum; and that Willy had never been a success and never would be. When Biff began to weep, Willy realized for the first time that his son loved him.

Willy, left alone after the others went upstairs, began to see Ben again, to tell him his plan. Willy had twenty thousand in insurance. Biff would be magnificent with twenty thousand. Willy ran out to his car and drove crazily away.

At the funeral, attended only by Linda and the boys and Charley, Charley tried to tell Biff about his father. He said that a salesman had to dream, that without dreams he was nothing. When the dreams were gone, a salesman was finished. Sobbing quietly, Linda stooped and put flowers on the grave of Willy Loman, salesman.

THE DEATH OF THE HEART

PORTIA QUAYNE, his sixteen-year-old half-sister

ST. QUENTIN MILLER, an author and a friend of the Quaynes

EDDIE, an employee of Quayne and Merrett

MAJOR BRUTT, a retired officer

Mrs. HECCOMB, Anna's ex-governess

Critique:

The travail of adolescence and its painful emergence into maturity are recorded with keenness and sympathy in Elizabeth Bowen's The Death of the Heart. Maturity's gain in awareness, she implies, is offset by childhood's loss in idealism and simplicity; adulthood involves compromises with one's heart and thoughts which the young find intolerable, at least at first. And so the arrival of Portia, with her innocent longings and candid curiosity, provides a kind of catalyst for an upper middle-class English household where compromise and boredom have long held sway. Portia's loneliness and her search for love and understanding are characteristic of her age, sex, and particular situation; but Miss Rowen never allows the individual to be submerged in the typical. Although the ending of the story is no more conclusive than life itself, it crystallizes some truths that are often elusive.

The Story:

Anna Quayne's pique demanded an outlet—she could no longer contain it all within herself. Therefore, while St. Quentin Miller shivered with cold, she marched him around the frozen park, delivering herself of her discontent. The trouble, of course, had started with Portia, for the Quayne household had not been the same since the arrival of Tom's sixteen-year-old half-sister. Not that Portia was all to blame; the business had begun with a deathbed wish. Who could expect dying old Mr. Quayne to ask Tom to take a stepsister he hardly knew, keep her for at least a year, and give her a graceful start in life? Anna herself, she went on to St. Quentin, hardly knew how to cope with the arrangement, though she had tried to accept it with outward tranquillity. Now she had stumbled across the girl's diary, glimpsed her own name, and been tempted to read. It was obvious that Portia was rather less than happy, that she was scanning the atmosphere of her brother's house with an unflattering eye.

While Anna was thus unburdening herself, the subject of her discussion returned home quietly from Miss Paullie's lessons. She was vaguely disturbed to learn from Matchett, the housekeeper, that Anna had commented upon the clutter in Portia's bedroom. Later she shared tea with Anna and St. Quentin when they came in tingling with cold; but the atmosphere seemed a bit stiff, and Portia readily acquiesced in Anna's suggestion that she join her brother in his study. Portia felt more at ease with Tom, even though he obviously found conversation with her awkward.

Portia knew, by now, that there was no one in whom she could readily confide. At 2 Windsor Terrace, Matchett offered a certain possessive friendship; at school, only the inquisitive Lilian took notice of her. Major Brutt was better than either of these; his eyes, in her presence, showed a fatherly gleam, and she liked the picture puzzle he had sent. Anna tolerated the major—he was her only link with an old friend, Pidgeon—but Major Brutt seldom ventured to call, and Portia saw him mostly in the company of others.

Another of Anna's friends whom Portia sometimes saw was Eddie. But Eddie was Anna's property and seemingly beyond the range of Portia's clumsy probing for companionship. Too, he was twenty-three and brightly self-assured. Anna found it amusing to have him around, though she often rebuked his conceit and presumption; she went so far as to find him a job with Quayne and Merrett. One day Portia handed Eddie his hat as he took leave of Anna; the next day he wrote to her. Before long they were meeting regularly and secretly.

Eddie, having no wish to alienate Anna, cautioned Portia not to mention him in her diary. But he reveled in Portia's uncritical adoration. They went to the zoo, to tea, ultimately to his apartment. Matchett, who found Eddie's letter under Portia's pillow, soon became coldly jealous of his influence. Even Anna and Tom became slightly restive, as they began to realize the situation. Meanwhile Portia was falling deeper and deeper in love. When Eddie lightly declared that it was a pity they were too young to marry, Portia innocently took his remarks as a tentative proposal. Though he carefully refrained from real love making, Portia felt sure he returned her love.

With the approach of spring, Anna and Tom revealed their intention of spending a few weeks in Capri. Since Matchett would houseclean while they were gone, they decided to send Portia to Mrs. Heccomb, Anna's old governess, who lived in a seaside house at Seale. Portia, dismayed by the prospect of separation from Eddie, was only partially consoled by his promise to write.

Eddie did write, promptly; so did Major Brutt, with the promise of another picture puzzle. And Seale, happily, turned out better than expected. Having none of Anna's remoteness, Mrs. Heccomb deluged her guest with carefree chatter. Her two grown-up stepchildren reacted somewhat more cautiously, since they were prepared to find Portia a highbrow. Finding her only shy, they quickly relaxed; the radio blared while they vigorously shouted over it about roller-skating, hockey games, and Saturday night parties. Portia gradually withdrew from her shell of loneliness. Within a few days she felt enough at home to ask Daphne Heccomb if Eddie might spend a weekend at Seale. Daphne consented to relay the request to her mother, whereupon Mrs. Heccomb affably approved.

Eddie's visit was not a success. His efforts to be the life of the party soon had Mrs. Heccomb wondering about the wisdom of her invitation. At the cinema his good fellowship extended to holding hands enthusiastically with Daphne. When Portia, distressed, uttered mild reproaches, he intimated that she was a naïve child. Walking together in the woods, on their final afternoon, Portia learned that Eddie had no use for her love unless it could remain uncritical and undemanding. Her vision of an idyllic reunion shattered into bits as she began to see his instability. Two weeks later her stay at Seale ended. Back in London, Matchett triumphantly informed her that Eddie had left word that he would be out of town a few days.

Walking home from school not long afterward, Portia encountered St. Quentin, who inadvertently revealed Anna's perusal of the diary. Upset, she sought comfort from Eddie once more. No longer gratified by her devotion, he made her feel even more unwanted; and the sight of a letter from Anna, lying on Eddie's table, convinced her that they were allied against her. As she left his apartment it seemed unthinkable that she could ever return to Windsor Terrace; her only possible refuge now was Major Brutt. To the Karachi Hotel, therefore, she went, surprising the worthy major as he finished his dinner. Surprise changed to alarm as she pleaded her case: would he take her away, would he marry her? She could relieve his loneliness, she could care for him, she could polish his shoes. Polishing shoes, the major affirmed, with as much serenity as he could muster, was a job women had little success with; with a little time and patience, her position would soon appear less desperate. He wished very much to call the Quaynes, for it was getting late and they would be worried. Portia felt that she had been defeated, but she could still choose ground on which to make a final stand. Very well, she finally agreed, he might call them, but he was not to tell them she was coming. That would depend, she finished enigmatically but firmly, on whether they chose to do the right thing.

The major had been right; the Quaynes were worried. After the telephone rang, their momentary relief was succeeded by real confusion. What, after all, would Portia consider the right thing for them to do? It would have to be simple, without fuss or feathers. With help from St. Quentin, they finally decided, and Matchett was sent in a taxi to fetch her.

Critique:

Boccaccio, Dante, and Petrarch were the leading lights in a century that is considered the beginning of the Italian Renaissance. Dante died while Boccaccio was a child, but Petrarch was the friend of his middle and later life. Dante's work was essentially of the spirit; Petrarch's was that of the literary man; Boccaccio's broke free of all tradition and created a living literature about ordinary people. His Decameron is his most famous work. This collection of one hundred tales is set in a framework much like that in the Arabian Nights' Tales, or in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, written later in the same century. A terrible plague was ravaging Florence. To flee from it, a group of seven girls and three young men, who had met by chance in a church, decided to go to a villa out of town. There they set up a working arrangement whereby each would be king or queen for a day. During the ten days they stayed in the country, each told a story following certain stipulations laid down by the daily ruler. The stories range from romance to farce, from comedy to tragedy. They are all told with a wit that carries them above the range of the licentious, a term sometimes used unjustly about the tales. It may be true that none of the plots was original with Boccaccio, but he wrote one hundred excellent stories, and many are the authors since his day who have borrowed from him.

The Stories:

PAMPINEA'S TALE ABOUT THE THREE TEDALDO YOUNG MEN

When Messer Tedaldo died, he left all his goods and chattels to his three sons. With no thought for the future, they lived so extravagantly that they soon had little left. The oldest son suggested that they sell what they could, leave Florence, and go to London, where they were unknown.

In London they lent money at a high rate of interest, and in a few years they had a small fortune. Then they returned to Florence. There they married and began to live extravagantly again, while depending on the monies still coming to them from England.

A nephew named Alessandro took care of their business in England. At that time there were such differences between the king and a son that Alessandro's business was ruined. He stayed in England, however, in hopes that peace would come and his business would recover. Finally he returned to Italy with a group of monks who were taking their young abbot to the pope to get a dispensation for him and a confirmation of the youthful cleric's election.

On the way Alessandro discovered that the abbot was a girl, and he married her in the sight of God. In Rome the girl had an audience with the pope. Her father, the King of England, wished the pope's blessing on her marriage to the old King of Scotland, but she asked the pope's blessing on her marriage to Alessandro instead.

After the wedding Alessandro and his bride went to Florence, where she paid his uncles' debts. Two knights preceded the couple to England and urged the king to forgive his daughter. After the king had knighted Alessandro, the new knight reconciled the king and his rebellious son.

FIAMMETTA'S TALE OF TANCRED AND THE GOLDEN CUP

Tancred, Prince of Salerno, loved his daughter Ghismonda so much that when she was widowed soon after her marriage he did not think to provide her with a second husband, and she was too modest to ask him to do so. Being a lively girl, however, she decided to have as her lover the most valiant man in her father's court. His name was Guiscardo. His only fault was that he was of humble birth.

Ghismonda noticed that Guiscardo returned her interest and they met secretly in a cave, one entrance to which was through a door in the young widow's bedroom. Soon she was taking her lover into her bedroom, where they enjoyed each other frequently.

Tancred was in the habit of visiting his daughter's room at odd times. One day, when he went to visit, she was not there and so he sat down to wait in a place where he was by accident hidden by the bed curtains from his daughter and her lover, who soon came in to use the bed.

Tancred remained hidden, but that night he had Guiscardo arrested. When he berated his daughter for picking so humble a lover, she defied him for letting so brave a man remain poor in his court. She begged nothing from Tancred except that he kill her and her lover with the same stroke.

The prince did not believe Ghismonda would be as resolute as she sounded. When her lover was killed, Tancred had his heart cut from his body and sent to her in a golden cup. Ghismonda thanked her father for his noble gift. After repeatedly kissing the heart, she poured poison into the cup and drank it. Then she lay down upon her bed with Guiscardo's heart upon her own. Tancred's own heart was touched when he saw her cold in death, and he obeyed her last request that she and Guiscardo be buried together.

FILOMENO'S TALE OF THE POT OF BASIL

Isabetta lived in Messina with her three merchant brothers and a young man named Lorenzo, who looked after all their business. Isabetta and Lorenzo fell in love. One night, as she went to Lorenzo's room, her oldest brother saw her. He said nothing until the next morning, when the three brothers conferred to see how they could settle the matter so that no shame should fall upon them or upon Isabetta.

Not long afterward the three brothers, setting out with Lorenzo, said that they were going part way with him on a journey. Secretly they killed and buried the young man.

After their return home the brothers answered none of Isabetta's questions about Lorenzo. She wept and refused to be consoled in her grief. One night Lorenzo came to her in a dream and told her what had happened and where he was buried. Without telling her brothers, she went to the spot indicated in her dream and there found her lover's body. She cut off his head and wrapped it in a cloth to take home. She buried the head in dirt in a large flower pot and planted basil over it. The basil flourished, watered by her tears.

She wept so much over the plant that her brothers took away the pot of basil and hid it. Because she asked about it often, the brothers grew curious. At last they investigated and found Lorenzo's head. Abashed, they left the city. Isabetta died of a broken heart.

PAMFILO'S TALE OF CIMONE, WHO BECAME CIVILIZED THROUGH LOVE

Galeso was the tallest and handsomest of Aristippo's children, but he was so stupid that the people of Cyprus called him Cimone, which means Brute. Cimone's stupidity embarrassed his father until the old man sent the boy to the country to live. There Cimone was contented until one day he came upon a sleeping girl, Efigenia, whose beauty completely changed him.

He told his father he intended to live in town. The news worried his father for a while, but Cimone bought fine clothes and associated only with worthy young men. In four years he was the most accomplished and virtuous young man on the island.

Although he knew she was promised to Pasimunda of Rhodes, Cimone asked Efigenia's father for her hand in marriage. He was refused. When Pasimunda sent for his bride, Cimone and his friends pursued the ship and took Efigenia off the vessel, after which they let the ship's crew go free to return to Rhodes. In the night a storm arose and blew Cimone's ship to the very harbor in Rhodes where Efigenia was supposed to go. Cimone and his men were arrested.

Pasimunda had a brother who had been promised a wife, but this girl was loved by Lisimaco, a youth of Rhodes, as Efigenia was loved by Cimone. The brothers planned a double wedding.

Lisimaco made plans with Cimone. At the double wedding feast, Lisimaco and Cimone with many of their friends snatched the brides away from their prospective husbands. The young men carried their loved ones to Crete, where they lived happily in exile for a time until their fathers interceded for them. Then Cimone took Efigenia home to Cyprus, and Lisimaco took his wife back to Rhodes.

FIAMMETTA'S TALE OF FEDERIGO AND HIS FALCON

Federigo degli Alberighi was famed in Florence for his courtesy and his prowess in arms. He fell in love with Monna Giovanna, a woman who cared nothing for him, though he spent his fortune trying to please her. Finally he was so poor that he went to the country to live on his farm. There he entertained himself only by flying his falcon, which was considered the best in the world.

Monna's husband died, leaving her to enjoy his vast estates with one young son. The son struck up an acquaintance with Federigo and particularly admired the falcon. When the boy became sick, he thought he might get well if he could own Federigo's bird.

Monna, as a last resort, swallowed her pride and called upon Federigo. She told him she would stay for supper, but Federigo, desperately poor as he was, had nothing to serve his love except the falcon, which he promptly killed and roasted for her.

After the meal, with many apologies, Monna told her host that her son, thinking he would get well if he had the falcon, desired Federigo's bird. Federigo wept to think that Monna had asked for the one thing he could not give her.

The boy died soon after and Monna was bereft. When her brothers urged her to remarry, she finally agreed to do so. But she would marry no one but the generous Federigo, who had killed his pet falcon to do her honor. So Federigo married into great riches.

FILOSTRATO'S TALE OF PERONELLA, WHO HID HER LOVER IN A BUTT

Peronella was a Neapolitan wool comber married to a poor bricklayer. Together they made enough to live comfortably. Peronella had a lover named Strignario, who came to the house each day after the husband went to work.

One day, when the husband returned unexpectedly, Peronella hid Strignario in a butt. Her husband had brought home a man to buy the butt for five florins. Thinking quickly, Peronella told her husband that she already had a buyer who had offered seven florins for the butt, and that he was at that moment inside the butt inspecting it.

Strignario came out, complaining that the butt was dirty. The husband offered to clean it. While the husband was inside scraping, Strignario cuckolded him again, paid for the butt, and went away.

FILOSTRATO'S TALE OF NATHAN'S GENEROSITY

There was once in Cathay a very rich and generous old man named Nathan. He had a splendid palace and many servants, and he entertained lavishly anyone who came his way.

In a country nearby lived Mitridanes who was not nearly so old as Nathan but just as rich. Since he was jealous of Nathan's fame, he built a palace and entertained handsomely everyone who came by. One day a woman came thirteen times asking alms. Furious when Mitridanes called her to task, she told him that she had once asked alms of Nathan forty-two times in one day without reproof. Mitridanes decided that he would have to kill Nathan before his own fame would grow.

Riding near Nathan's palace, Mitridanes came upon Nathan walking alone. When he asked to be directed secretly to Nathan's palace, Nathan cheerfully took him there and established him in a fine apartment. Still not realizing who Nathan was, Mitridanes revealed his plan to kill his rival. Nathan arranged matters so that Mitridanes came upon him alone in the woods.

Mitridanes, curious to see Nathan, caught hold of him before piercing him with a sword. When he discovered that Nathan was the old man who had first directed him to the palace, made him comfortable, and then arranged the meeting in the woods, Mitridanes realized that he could never match Nathan's generosity, and he was greatly ashamed.

Nathan offered to go to Mitridanes' home and become known as Mitridanes, while Mitridanes would remain to be known as Nathan. But by that time Mitridanes thought his own actions would tarnish Nathan's fame. He went home humbled.

PAMFILO'S TALE OF SALADIN AND MESSER TORELLO

In the time of Emperor Frederick the First, all Christendom united in a crusade for the recovery of the Holy Land. To see how the Christians were preparing themselves and to learn to protect himself against them, Saladin, the Sultan of Babylon, took two of his best knights and made a tour through Italy to Paris. The travelers were disguised as merchants.

Outside the little town of Pavia they came upon Messer Torello, who was on his way to his country estate. When they asked him how far they were from Pavia, he told them quickly that the town was too far to be reached that night and sent his servants with them to an inn. Having sensed that the three men were foreign gentlemen and wanting to honor them, he had the servants take them by a roundabout way to his own estate.

Meanwhile he rode directly home. The travelers were surprised when they saw him in his own place, but, realizing that he meant only to honor them, they graciously consented to spend the night.

The next day Messer Torello sent word to his wife in town to prepare a banquet. The preparations being made, both Torellos honored the merchants that day. Before they left, the wife gave them handsome suits of clothes like those her husband wore.

When Messer Torello became one of the crusaders, he asked his wife to wait a year and a month before remarrying if she heard nothing from him. She gave him a ring to remember her by. Soon afterward a great plague broke out among the Christians at Acre and killed many men. Most of the survivors were imprisoned by the sultan. Messer Torello was taken to Alexandria, where he trained hawks for Saladin and was called Saladin's Christian. Neither man recognized the other for a long time, until at last Saladin recognized a facial gesture in Torello and made himself known as one of the traveling merchants. Freed, Torello lived happily as Saladin's guest and expected daily to hear from his wife, to whom he had sent word of his adventures. His messenger had been shipwrecked, however, and the day closely approached when his wife would be free to remarry.

At last Torello told Saladin of the arrangement he and his wife had made. The sultan, taking pity on him, had Torello put to sleep on a couch heaped with jewels and gold. Then the couch, whisked off to Italy by magic, was set down in the church of which his uncle was abbot. Torello and the abbot went to the marriage feast prepared for Torello's wife and her new husband. No one recognized Torello because of his strange beard and oriental raiment until he displayed the ring his wife had given him. Then with great rejoicing they were reunited, a reward for their early generosity.

DINEO'S TALE OF THE PATIENT GRISELDA

Gualtieri, eldest son of the Marquess of Saluzzo, was a bachelor whose subjects begged him to marry. Though he was not anxious to take a wife, he decided to wed poor Griselda, who lived in a nearby hamlet. When he went with his friends to bring Griselda home, he asked her if she would always be obedient and try to please him and never be angry. Upon her word that she would do so, Gualtieri had her stripped of her poor gown and dressed in finery becoming her new station.

With her new clothes Griselda changed so much in appearance that she seemed to be a true noblewoman, and Gualtieri's subjects were pleased. She bore him a daughter and a son, both of whom Gualtieri took from her. In order to test her devotion, he pretended to have the children put to death, but Griselda sent them off cheerfully since that was her husband's wish.

When their daughter was in her early teens, Gualtieri sent Griselda home, clad only in a shift, after telling her that he intended to take a new wife. His subjects were sad, but Griselda herself remained composed. A short time later he called Griselda back to his house and ordered her to prepare it for his wedding, saying that no one else knew so well how to arrange it. In her ragged dress she prepared everything for the wedding feast. Welcoming the guests, she was particularly thoughtful of the new bride.

By that time Gualtieri thought he had tested Griselda in every possible way. He introduced the supposed bride as her daughter and the little boy who had accompanied the girl as her son. Then he had Griselda dressed in her best clothes and everyone rejoiced.

Decline and Fall mingles farce with grim tragedy. Episodic in form, with many of its scenes no more than a page or so in length, it is a penetrating yet hilarious study of disordered English society in the period between wars. Mr. Waugh insists that his books are not intended as satires, since the satirical spirit presupposes a stable and homogeneous society against which to project its critical exposure of folly and vice. For all that, the writer demonstrates in this novel, his first, a tremendous talent for comic satire. Paul Pennyfeather's misadventures reflect one phase of the contemporary mood of disillusionment. On the other hand, Grimes, a bounder and a cad, is timeless, a figure who would have been as much at home in the days of the Caesars as he was in the reign of King George V. Waugh's distortions and exaggerations have also the quality of fantasy, for in his pages the impossible and the believable exist on the same plane at the same time.

The Story:

At Scone College, Oxford, the annual dinner of the Bollinger Club ended with the breaking of glass. Reeling out of Sir Alastair Digby-Vaine-Trumpington's rooms, the drunken aristocrats ran to earth Paul Pennyfeather, an inoffensive divinity student, and forcibly left him trouserless before they went roaring off into the night.

Bollinger members could be fined, but the college authorities felt that Paul deserved severer punishment for running across the quadrangle in his shorts, and he was sent down for indecent behavior. His unsympathetic guardian, after informing him that under his father's will his legacy could be withheld for unsatisfactory behavior, virtuously announced his intention to cut off Paul's allowance.

Through a shoddy firm of scholastic agents Paul became a junior assistant master at Llanabba Castle, Wales. Llanabba was not a good school. Its head was Dr. Augustus Fagan, whose lectures on service were intended to cover up the inadequacies of his institution. He had two daughters, Flossie, a vulgar young woman of matrimonial ambitions, and Diana, who economized on sugar and soap. One of the masters was Mr. Prendergast, a former clergyman who suffered from doubts. The other was Captain Grimes, who wore a false leg and was, as he frankly admitted, periodically in the soup.

A bounder and a scoundrel, he put his faith in the public-school system, which may kick a man out but never lets him down. Grimes thought he had been put on his feet more often than any public-school man alive. His reluctant engagement to Flossie was his protection against the next time he found himself in trouble.

Paul was in charge of the fifth form. When he met his class for the first time, most of the boys claimed that their name was Tangent. An uproar arising between would-be Tangents and a few non-Tangents, Paul announced that the writer of the longest essay would receive half a crown. Mr. Prendergast wondered why Paul's classes were always so quiet. His own students behaved outrageously and made fun of his wig. Paul found young Peter Beste-Chetwynde the most interesting of his pupils.

Arthur Potts, one of the few men Paul had known at Scone, wrote that Alastair Trumpington, regretting Paul's dismissal, wanted to send him twenty pounds. Grimes, hearing of the offer, wired for the money in Paul's name.

Some parents planned to visit Llanabba Castle. Dr. Fagan decided to honor their visit with the annual field sports meet. Philbrick, the butler, objected to his extra duties. To Paul he confided that he was a crook who had taken the post in order to kidnap little Lord Tangent, but that he had reformed after falling in love with Diana. He told Mr. Prendergast that he was really Sir Solomon Philbrick, a millionaire shipowner, and he left Grimes under the impression that he was a novelist collecting material for a book.

The sports meet was not a gala occasion. Lady Circumference, Lord Tangent's mother, was rude to everyone in distributing the prizes. The Llanabba Silver Band played. Margot Beste-Chetwynde created a social flurry when she arrived with a Negro. Mr. Prendergast, the starter, accidentally shot Lord Tangent in the heel. Later he became abusively drunk. But Paul, without intending to, fell in love at first sight with Peter Beste-Chetwynde's beautiful widowed mother.

The term dragged to a close. Lord Tangent's foot became infected and he died. Grimes, landing in the soup once more, announced his engagement to Flosie, but the marriage turned out as badly as he had expected. Detectives arrived to arrest Philbrick on charges of false pretense, but their man had already flown. A few days later Grimes' clothing and a suicide note were discovered on the beach.

Paul, engaged to tutor Peter during the vacation, went to Margot's country house, King's Thursday. When she bought the place from her impoverished bachelor brother-in-law, Lord Pastmaster, it had been the finest example of Tudor domestic architecture in England. Bored with it, however, she had commissioned Otto Silenus, an eccentric designer, to build a modernistic house in its place. Silenus built a structure of concrete, glass, and aluminum, a house for dynamos, not people, but people went there anyway for endless house parties.

When Paul finally found enough courage to propose to Margot, she accepted him because Peter thought the young Oxonian would make a better stepfather than a rival suitor, Sir Humphrey Maltravers, Minister of Transport. During preparations for the wedding Paul learned that Margot still carried on her father's business, a syndicate vaguely connected with amusement enterprises in South America. Grimes turned up mysteriously in her employ. Potts, now working for the League of Nations, also took an unexplained interest in Margot's business affairs.

A few days before the wedding Margot asked Paul to fly to Marseilles and arrange for the passage of several cabaret entertainers to Rio de Janeiro. He did so without realizing that he was bribing the officials he interviewed. On his wedding morning Paul was having a final drink with Alastair Trumpington when a Scotland Yard inspector appeared and arrested him on charges of engaging in an international white-slave traffic.

Margot fled to her villa at Corfu and did not appear at the trial. Potts, a special investigator for the League of Nations, was the chief witness for the prosecution. Convicted of Margot's crimes, Paul was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. The first part of his sentence he served at Blackstone Gaol, where he found Philbrick a trusty and Mr. Prendergast the chaplain. Shortly after Prendergast was killed by a crazed inmate, Paul was removed to Egdon Heath Penal Settlement. Grimes was one of his fellow prisoners, but not for long. One day, while serving on a work gang, he walked off into the fog. Everyone supposed that he perished later in a swamp, but Paul believed otherwise. Grimes, whose roguery was timeless, could never die. Margot came to visit Paul. She announced her intention to marry Maltravers, now Lord Metroland and the Home Secretary.

Paul's escape from Egdon Heath was carefully contrived. On orders from the Home Secretary he was removed for an appendicitis operation in a nursing home owned by Dr. Fagan, who had forsaken education for medicine. After a drunken doctor had signed a death certificate stating that Paul had died under the anesthetic, Alastair Trumpington, who had become Margot's young man, put him on a yacht which carried him to Margot's villa at Corfu. Officially dead, Paul enjoyed the rest he thought he deserved. Some months later, wearing a heavy mustache, he returned to Scone to continue his reading for the church. When the chaplain mentioned another Pennyfeather, a wild undergraduate sent down for misconduct, Paul said that the young man was a distant cousin.

At Scone the annual dinner of the Bollinger Club ended with the breaking of glass. Paul was reading in his room when Peter Beste-Chetwynde, Lord Pastmaster since his uncle's death, came in, very drunk. Paul's great mistake, Peter said, was that he had ever become involved with people like Margot and himself.

After his departure Paul settled down to read another chapter in a book on early church heresies.

DEEPHAVEN

Type of work: Tales

Author: Sarah Orne Jewett (1849-1909)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Maine seacoast

First published: 1877

Principal characters:

KATE LANCASTER, her friend

THE CAREWS, and

THE LORIMERS, Deephaven's society

MRS. KEW, wife of the lighthouse keeper

CAPTAIN LANT,

CAPTAIN SANDS, and

DANNY, Maine seamen

MRS. BONNY, an elderly eccentric

MISS CHAUNCEY, an elegant woman

Critique:

Deephaven, Miss Jewett's first collection of tales and sketches, contains those characteristics of nature study and character drawing which the author used throughout her later work. This book, although unified in background and theme, is too diffuse in its effects to be called a novel; it is a series of sketches describing an idyllic summer in an almost forgotten town on the New England coast. It illustrates also Miss Jewett's belief that a writer must know the village well before he can know the world. Willa Cather, in her reminiscences of Sarah Orne Jewett, revealed that the older woman set her on the path to literary achievement by telling her to write about people and places that she knew best. When Miss Cather followed Miss Jewett's advice, books like O Pioneers! and My Antonia were the result. While Miss Jewett may not have reached Willa Cather's heights as a writer, she wrote pleasantly and nostalgically of familiar things; and Miss Cather never failed to pay her literary debt to her preceptor.

The Story:

Kate Lancaster's great-aunt, Katherine Brandon, had died, leaving to Kate's mother a charming old house and the family estate, including wharf rights, at Deephaven, a quaint sea town that had known better days. Since Kate's family was scattering for the summer, she asked Helen Denis, a friend, to spend the season with her in the old house on the Maine coast. They took with them two maids who came from that part of New England, and they left Boston without regret.

Riding with them in the stagecoach from the railway station was a large, weather-beaten, but good-natured woman who turned out to be Mrs. Kew, the wife of the lighthouse keeper. She was a keenly observant person but so warm-hearted that the girls knew that she meant her invitation to visit the Light, and by the end of the summer they knew that wherever she was there was always a home and a heart for them.

Great-aunt Brandon's house was a sedate and imposing one full of furnishings brought home by generations of seagoing ancestors. Its closets were filled with china and its walls were covered by family portraits. The girls rummaged the place from cellar to attic until they felt that they knew Katherine Brandon as well as if she were still alive. Then they started to learn their way around the shore, out to the lighthouse, through the town, and out into the country.

People who had known Katherine Brandon and Kate's mother felt themselves the girls' friends by inheritance and the girls were never lonely. Those people had held Katherine Brandon in great respect but with fond admiration. The girls tried to do nothing to hurt the Brandon name. Through Widow Jim Patton they realized that Kate's aunt had been a thoughtful, generous soul who remembered in her will her less fortunate neighbors.

To the girls it seemed as though the clocks had stopped long ago in Deephaven and that the people went on repeating whatever they had been doing at that time in the past. Even their faces looked like those of colonial times. The people attached a great deal of importance to the tone of their society, handed down from the fabulous times of Governor Chantrey, a rich shipowner and an East India merchant. Now there were few descendants of the old families left; these were treated almost with reverence by the others. Even the simple fishermen felt an unreasoning pride in living in Deephaven. There were no foreigners, and there were no industries to draw people from out of town.

The Carews and the Lorimers, old friends of Katherine Brandon, became friends of Kate and Helen. Mr. Dick Carew had been an East India merchant. Mr. Lorimer was the minister. The ladies were of the old order, inordinately proud of their mementos of the old days and always happy to tell reminiscences of earlier times.

Naturally, in a seacoast town, there were also old sailors, all of whom were called captain by the time they reached a certain age. When attacks of rheumatism did not keep them home, they gathered on the wharves. Huddled close together, for many had grown deaf, they told over and over again the tales of their distant voyages. The girls noticed that silence fell when anyone approached the group, but on one occasion they hid close by to hear the yarns the old men told.

Singly the old mariners were pleased to have a new audience, and before long Kate and Helen were friendly with many of the old men. While some of them told stories of marine superstitions and adventures, others told supernatural tales they swore were true. Captain Lent related the story of Peletiah Daw, to whom he had been bound out in his youth. Old Peletiah put more store by his wild nephew Ben than he did by his own sons. One night, when Peletiah was old and feeble, he cried out and begged his sons to cut down Ben, whom he had seen hanging from a yardarm. The sons thought their father was delirious, but a short time later a sailor came to tell them that Ben had died of a fever. Peletiah called the man a liar, but the sailor held to his story before the women. Outside, he told the sons that Ben had been hanged from the yardarm, just as the old man had said, and on the day Peletiah had cried out.

Kate and Helen came to know Danny, a silent, weather-beaten fisherman who spent most of his time cleaning fish but who told them shyly about a pet cat he owned. Another good friend was Captain Sands, who kept in a warehouse all the souvenirs of his sea voyages that his wife refused to have cluttering her house.

When they took Mrs. Kew with them to a circus in nearby Denby, they all had a hilarious time, although the circus turned out to be a droopy and dispirited performance. Their high spirits were dampened for a while when Mrs. Kew recognized the fat lady as a girl who had once been her neighbor in Vermont.

The girls learned to know people all over the countryside as far as their horses would carry them. The person they liked best was Mrs. Bonny, who they thought looked so wild and unconventional that they always felt they were talking to a good-natured Indian.

One family along the coast was so forlorn that the thought of them preyed on the girls' minds all summer. Neither the father nor the mother had health, and there were several little children with whom they had made friends. Early in the fall Kate and Helen went back along the coast to see them. Receiving no answer, they were standing undecided at the door when some neighbors came up to say that the mother had died a short time before. The father, after drinking heavily, was now lying dead, and the children had been parceled out as best they could be. Not daring to go to the funeral, the girls watched it from a distance. They felt that their everyday world was very close to the boundary of death.

Still closer to that boundary was Miss Chauncey of East Parish, a town even smaller and more forgotten than Deephaven. She was a splendid-looking, aristocratic old lady who had been mildly insane but harmless for years. Hers had been a rich and happy childhood until her father lost his fortune during the embargo early in the century. It was said that a sailor to whom he had broken a promise cursed her father and his family. One brother killed himself; another died insane. Miss Chauncey herself had been so ill that her guardian sold all her household goods to pay her hospital bills. Suddenly she became well, her mind unclouded. No one had told her that her house furnishings had been sold. Her shock at seeing the bare house unbalanced her mind again, but she remained harmless. She refused to leave the house and she never seemed to realize that it was bleak and empty. She was still an elegant woman, possessed of unusual worldly advantages; she lived, however, without seeing the poverty of her surroundings. Although she had no idea of time, she always knew when Sunday came. She read the Bible beautifully. Faith sustained her.

By fall Kate and Helen had become so attached to their friends in Deephaven that they postponed their return to Boston as long as possible. Helen thought that, though they might never return, they would always remember their completely happy summer in that old-fashioned village.

Critique:

James Stephens was a brilliant Irish writer of poetry and prose, whose best work was grounded in the early literature of his own country. Just as he attempted to bring Irish folklore to life in The Crock of Gold, so he tried to revitalize ancient Gaelic legend in Deirdre. In this novel he wrote of the beautiful and mystical Deirdre, of brave and handsome Naoise, and of strong and willful Conachúr, who was loved by all his people and who was almost great. But it is not only the people in the story that are remembered afterward; there are also memorable scenes, like the one of Maeve taking her goods and chattels back to her father's kingdom, or the fight in the Red Branch fortress, or the picture of Deirdre falling dead over Naoise's body just as Conachúr is ready to claim her. Deirdre is a novel of legend and fantasy, but there is also a core of realism at its center.

The Story:

The King of Ulster had a daughter who was called Assa, the Gentle. She loved knowledge and had many tutors. One day, returning from a visit to her father and finding her tutors killed, she buckled on her armor and set out to find the murderer. Henceforth her name was Nessa, the Ungentle. While she was bathing in the forest, Cathfa, the magician, saw and loved her. He offered to spare her life only if she would marry him. Their son was Conachúr mac Nessa. After a while Nessa left Cathfa, taking her son with her.

When Conachúr was sixteen, Nessa was still the most beautiful woman in the land. Fergus mac Roy, the new King of Ulster, was only eighteen, but he fell in love with Nessa as soon as he saw her. She promised to marry him only if Conachúr could be king for a year while she and Fergus lived away from court. Fergus agreed, but after the year was up Conachúr kept the throne and Fergus became one of his most trusted followers.

Nessa arranged a marriage between Conachúr and Clothru, daughter of the High King of Connacht. On a visit to her father, Clothru was killed by her sister Maeve. Conachúr's first son was born just before she died.

Bent on vengeance, Conachúr went to Connacht. There he saw Maeve and, changing his mind, married her against her wishes. When she went to Ulster with him, she took along great riches and also a guard of one thousand men.

During one of his journeys at a time when Maeve had refused to accompany him, he stopped at the house of Felimid mac Dall, his story-teller. That night Conachúr sent a servant to say that Felimid's wife should sleep with him. The servant returned to say that Felimid's wife could not accommodate him as she was then in childbed. Soon the men heard the wail of the newborn infant. Conachúr asked Cathfa, his father, to interpret the wail and other evil omens that men had seen recently. Cathfa prophesied that the child then born, a girl, would be called The Troubler and that she would bring evil and destruction in Ulster. When one of his followers suggested that Conachúr have the child killed immediately, he sent for the infant. But he decided it was not becoming a prince to evade fate, and he let the child live. Deirdre was her name.

Conachúr had Deirdre brought up at Emania by Lavarcham, his conversation-woman, who let the girl see no one but women servants and a guard of the oldest and ugliest swordsmen in Ulster. Lavarcham could adapt herself to any situation or group of people and, while acting as a spy for Conachúr, she also learned everything that had to be taught to Deirdre to prepare her for the place Lavarcham had decided she should have in the kingdom.

Lavarcham reported regularly to Conachúr so that, while he never saw Deirdre, the king knew how she progressed month by month. He refused to believe Lavarcham's glowing reports; besides, at that time, he was well satisfied with Maeve. On the other hand, Lavarcham reported at length to Deirdre about Conachúr until the child knew all his whims, his boldness, and his majesty.

Maeve, who had never forgiven Conachúr for marrying her against her will, finally decided to leave him. She was so unforgiving that she refused to leave behind one thread of her clothes or one bit of her riches. Since some of those riches included great herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, heaps of silver and jewelry, and pieces of furniture, she had to make careful plans to get everything away when Conachúr was not looking. She trusted no one entirely, but she had a spy, mac Roth, who was even more diligent than Conachúr's Lavarcham. He discovered that Conachúr was to take a trip to Leinster; he even followed Conachúr's company for two full days until he felt the group was far enough away to be unable to get back in time; then he returned to help Maeve in her flight. Only Lavarcham guessed that something might happen, but her messengers did not reach Conachúr before Maeve had fled.

Conachúr grieved for Maeve, but he was unable to bring her back to Ulster. In the meantime Lavarcham began to brood about the matter. The whole kingdom wanted the king to remarry, and Deirdre was sixteen. Lavarcham persuaded the king to come to see Deirdre.

Although Lavarcham had taught Deirdre all that she needed to know about Conachúr, she did not realize that the child thought of the king as an ancient and feared him a little. Nor did Lavarcham know that Deirdre, longing for people of her own age, had learned how to escape the guards around Emania.

Deirdre was first tempted to go beyond the walls to investigate a campfire. Around it she saw three boys: Naoise, who was nineteen; Ainnle, who was seventeen; and Ardan, who was fourteen.

They were the sons of Uisneac, who had married Conachúr's sister. Deirdre startled them when she first appeared in the light of the fire, but they all laughed and told so many good stories that she knew she would have to go back again. The younger boys insisted that Naoise would soon be the champion of Ulster, and Deirdre did not doubt it.

When Conachúr went to see Deirdre, he found her the most beautiful girl in Ulster, and he intended to marry her immediately. Lavarcham made him wait a week, after which he would have a three-month feast. Deirdre, in love with Naoise, was horrified at the idea of marrying one so old and huge, but several nights passed before she could make her way to the campfire again. At her pleading, the brothers took her out of the country.

Six years later Conachúr decided that Deirdre and the sons of Uisneac should be brought back from Scotland, where they had found refuge, but the boys would not return except under the protection of one of Conachúr's trusted men. Fergus and his sons were sent to Scotland with assurances of safety. Deirdre had a dream and begged Naoise not to leave, but he declared that Fergus was honorable.

When the travelers reached the coast of Ulster, Fergus was detained by one of Conachúr's men, and Fergus' sons took Deirdre and the sons of Uisneac under their protection. Arriving at Conachúr's court at night, they were lodged in the fortress called the Red Branch. Then Deirdre knew there would be trouble because Conachúr had not received them under his own roof.

Conachúr sent his men to batter down the doors and to bring Deirdre to him. The sons of Uisneac and Fergus made quick sallies, dashing out one door and in another, and killed so many of Conachúr's warriors that at last the king ordered the fortress set afire. As Deirdre and the boys fled, Conachúr asked Cathfa to stop them. Cathfa cast a spell which made the boys drop their arms, and they were captured. Conachúr had Fergus' and Uisneac's sons killed. When Deirdre kneelt over Naoise's dead body, she sipped his blood and fell lifeless.

Critique:

In terms of world literature, this novel is an anachronism. It appears in the form of letters, the epistolary form which, although prevalent seventy years before, was almost outmoded by the time of Madame de Staël. In addition, the tone of the novel is in the sentimental vein of many French and British novels of the first rank in the first half of the eighteenth century. The origin of the sentiment was undoubtedly Rousseau, for whom Madame de Staël had a very high regard. In Delphine there is constant reflection of the ideas of Rousseau and other advanced political thinkers and philosophers of the late eighteenth century, for such doctrines as the education of women, political equality, freedom of religious conscience, anti-clericism, and devotion to reason appear constantly in the letters written by Delphine to the other characters in the novel. The novel is, therefore, an index to the temper of Madame de Staël's circle at the time.

The Story:

Delphine d'Albemar was a rich young widow who had been married to her guardian after her father's death. Her husband, who had been her tutor in childhood, had instilled in her the best of sentiments and virtues. As a result of her education, however, she did not wish to submit to the dogmas of society or church. Although she was a member of the French nobility, she was a believer in revolutionary doctrine, a dangerous way of thinking in France during the years immediately preceding the French Revolution. In addition, she, unlike most women of her time and position, refused to let men do her thinking for her. After her husband's death, which occurred in her twentieth year, Delphine was emotionally, intellectually, and financially independent.

Shortly after her husband's death, Delphine proposed giving away a large part of her fortune to Matilda, a relative of her husband and the daughter of Delphine's close friend, Madame de Vernon. Despite the warnings of Mademoiselle d'Albemar, Delphine's sister-in-law, that Madame de Vernon was a very treacherous person, the gift was made so that Matilda could marry Léonce Mondeville, a Spanish nobleman. No one had met Léonce Mondeville, for the marriage had been arranged by Matilda's mother, a long-time friend of the proposed bridegroom's mother.

When Mondeville arrived in Paris, he met his future wife and Delphine. Much to Delphine's dismay, she fell in love with him and he with her. To Delphine, who had bestowed on Matilda the fortune which was making the marriage possible, it seemed that fate had played its worst trick of irony. For a time it seemed as if the two lovers might find a way out of the difficulty. As her confidante in the problem, Delphine took Matilda's own mother, Madame de Vernon. Matilda's mother had no intention of allowing so advantageous a match to slip through her and her daughter's fingers, and she plotted to turn Mondeville against Delphine.

Delphine, meanwhile, had been aiding Madame d'Ervin in a love affair with Monsieur de Serbellane. Because de Serbellane was seen going into Delphine's house late at night, scandal linked her name with his, although he had actually gone there to see Madame d'Ervin. A short time later Madame d'Ervin's husband surprised the two lovers in Delphine's home. When de Serbellane killed the husband in a duel, scandal named Delphine as the woman in the case. Delphine, desiring to keep her friend's honor, did not relate the true cause of the quarrel which had precipitated the duel. Anxious to clear herself with Mondeville, however, Delphine asked Madame de Vernon to act as her friend. Instead of telling what had really happened, the older woman told him that Delphine and de Serbellane were lovers and that Delphine was about to leave France to join de Serbellane in Italy.

Mondeville prepared to marry Matilda, although he did not love her. Although Delphine realized that someone had misrepresented her to her lover, she could find no way to prevent the marriage. Only after the marriage had taken place did Delphine learn that Madame de Vernon's duplicity had caused the rift between herself and Mondeville. At that time, anxious not to hurt Matilda, Delphine promised herself not to see Mondeville and to try to forget her passion for him. Unfortunately, they continued to love one another greatly. A few months later Madame de Vernon, on her deathbed, confessed her guilt.

Feeling themselves cheated, the lovers decided to continue seeing each other, even though their course was dangerous to their honor and unfair to Matilda. Society was soon whispering that Delphine and Mondeville were lovers. Actually, there was nothing immoral in their affair, but society assumed the worst.

De Valorbe, a friend of Delphine's late husband, learned of the state of affairs and resolved to marry her in order to remove her from a compromising situation. His intention aroused Mondeville's jealousy, even though Delphine protested that she did not love de Valorbe and would never marry him. One night de Valorbe went to Delphine's house in the hope that she would hide him from the police. Mondeville saw him there and challenged him to a duel. De Valorbe, hoping to escape from the country before he was imprisoned on political charges, refused to fight. A witness set scandal going once again. Soon everyone believed that the two men had accidentally met while both going to assignments with Delphine, and so her name was publicly dishonored. In addition, de Valorbe's refusal to meet Mondeville placed him in disgrace.

Learning at last that her husband and Delphine were in love, Matilda went to Delphine and revealed that she was to have a child. Delphine, moved by Matilda's pleas, decided to leave France. She went to Switzerland and became a pensionary at a convent which was under the direction of Mondeville's aunt. De Valorbe followed her there and caused her name to become common gossip. When he offered to clear her name by marriage, Delphine refused his proposal and decided to remain in the convent. De Valorbe, moved to distraction, caused his own death, but before he died he cleared Delphine's reputation with Mondeville.

Word came to Mondeville's aunt that Matilda was dying. She, in league with Mondeville's mother, persuaded Delphine to become a nun. They were able to have the pope waive the required year's novitiate. By the time Mondeville went to the convent to claim Delphine, she had already taken her vows.

Meanwhile the republican government had taken over in France and had disallowed the vows of religious orders. Friends persuaded Delphine that she should renounce the vows and return to France to marry her lover. She left the convent, only to discover that public opinion condemned her action. Rather than make her lover live a life of misery, she refused to marry him.

Mondeville went to join the royalist forces fighting against the republican French government, but before he could join them he was captured and sentenced to death as a traitor. Delphine tried unsuccessfully to secure his pardon. When she failed, she took poison and then joined him when he went to the execution ground. She died on the spot where he was to be executed. At first the soldiers refused to shoot Mondeville. Having no desire to live, he taunted them until they picked up their muskets and killed him. Friends took the bodies of Delphine and her lover and buried them side by side, so that they, kept apart in life, might be close in death.

Critique:

Delta Wedding is the chronicle of a remarkable family living in Mississippi in the early 1920's. The Fairchilds seemed to draw excitement to them just by doing nothing. Although the plot centers around the preparations for the wedding of one of the Fairchild daughters to a man considered in all ways her inferior, the main theme of the story is in reality the portrayal of this unusual family and a regional way of life. Through the eyes of a child we see the cousins and aunts and great-aunts, all criticizing the others but uniting against any outsider. Life on the Delta is a thing apart from that in other sections of the country, and Eudora Welty has shown in her novel a superb picture of this segment of America.

The Story:

Nine-year-old Laura McRaven made her first journey alone from Jackson to the Delta, to visit her dead mother's people, the Fairchilds. One of her cousins, Dabney Fairchild, was to be married, and Laura's chief regret was that she could not be in the wedding party because of her mother's recent death. She remembered Shellmound, the Fairchild plantation, and knew that she would have a wonderful time with her exciting cousins and aunts. The Fairchilds were people to whom things happened, exciting, unforgettable things.

At Shellmound, Laura found most of the family assembled for the wedding. Although children her age were her companions, she was aware also of the doings of the grownups. It was obvious that the family was not happy about Dabney's marriage. Her husband-to-be was Troy Flavin, the manager of the plantation, whose inferior social position was the main thing against him. Uncle Battle, Dabney's father, was most of all reluctant to let one of his family go from him, but he could not bring himself to say anything to Dabney, not even that he would miss her. In fact, that seemed to Laura to be a strange thing about her cousins. They seldom talked as a united family, but they always acted as one.

There were so many members of the family that it was hard for Laura to keep them straight. Uncle Battle's wife was Aunt Ellen, and their oldest daughter was Shelley, who was going to be a nun. Again the whole family disapproved of her plan, but there was hardly ever any attempt to get her to change her mind. The obvious favorite was Uncle George, Battle's brother. Uncle George had also married beneath himself. He and his wife Robbie lived in Memphis, where everyone knew poor Uncle George could never be happy.

When George arrived for the wedding festivities, he was alone and miserable. Robbie had left him, and he had come down alone to see his family. Not wanting to make Dabney unhappy, they did not tell her of Robbie's desertion. The children and the aunts and great-aunts were not told either, although one by one they began to suspect that something was wrong. Ellen could have killed Robbie for making George unhappy, but she kept her feelings to herself except when she was alone with Battle, her husband.

Robbie's anger at her husband began on the afternoon of a family outing. George had risked his life to save one of the cousins, a feeble-minded child caught in the path of a train as they crossed a railroad trestle. After that incident Robbie was never the same with George. She seemed to want him to prove that he loved her more than he loved his family.

Probably Shelley understood the family best. She knew that they had built a wall against the outside world. But she suspected that they were more lonely than self-sufficient. Most people took the family as a group, loving or hating them all together. Only Uncle George seemed to take them one by one, loving and understanding each as an individual. Shelley thought that this was why they all loved Uncle George so much.

Dabney herself seemed to wish for more than she had in her love for Troy. Sometimes she felt left out, as if she were trying to find a lighted window but found only darkness. She loved Troy, but she wanted to feel even more a part of him. She wished also that her family would try to keep her with them, wanted to make certain of their love.

Preparations for the wedding created a flurry. The dresses had been ordered from Memphis, and when some of the gowns failed to arrive there was the usual hubbub among the women, a concern that the men could not appreciate. One of the children fell sick at the last minute, so that Laura was made one of the wedding party after all. Troy's mother sent some beautiful handmade quilts from her mountain shack. Troy felt proud, but the Fairchilds were even more self-consciously and unwillingly ashamed of his background.

After their wedding Dabney and Troy would live at Marmion, an estate owned by the family. Dabney rode over to see the house. Looking at the stately buildings and the beautiful old trees, she knew that best of all she would love being inside it looking out on the rest of the world. That was what she wanted the most, to be inside where she was a part of the light and warmth. That was what marriage must give her.

All the time, unknown to any of the family but Shelley, Pobbie was not far away. She had come after George in hopes that he was looking for her. What had almost defeated Robbie was the fear that she had not married George but the whole Fairchild family. It was that fear which had made her angry at the affair on the railroad trestle. Wanting desperately to come first with George, she knew instinctively that he could never set her apart from or above the family. Contrite and humble, she went to Shellmound. The fact that George was not even there at the moment hurt her even more, for she wanted very much for him to be miserable without her. He was, of course, but it was not the Fairchild way to let anyone see his true feelings.

Robbie probably hit the secret of the family when she said that the Fairchilds loved each other because in so doing they were really loving themselves. But of George that fact was not quite true. He was the different one. Because of his gentleness and his ability to love people as individuals, he let Robbie see his love for her without ever saying the words she had longed to hear.

The wedding was almost an anticlimax, a calm scene following gusty storms of feeling. Troy and Dabney took only a short trip, for Troy was needed to superintend the plantation. While they were gone Battle worked the hands hard to get Marmion ready for them. Dabney was anxious to move in, but the move was not so necessary after her marriage as it had seemed before; she no longer felt left out of Troy's life. She thought her life before had been like seeing a beautiful river between high banks, with no way to get down. Now she had found the way and she was at peace. Indeed, the whole family seemed to have righted itself.

When Aunt Ellen asked Laura to live with them at Shellmound, her being wanted by the Fairchilds seemed too wonderful for her belief. Laura knew that she would go back to her father, but still feeling that she really belonged to the Fairchilds seemed like a beautiful dream. She clung briefly to Aunt Ellen, as if to hold close that wonderful moment of belonging.

human motives to the simple impulses of love, hate, lust, and greed gives an impression of human nature as convincing and complete as the more complex studies of his later, longer plays.

The Story:

When the news of gold discoveries in California reached New England, Simon and Peter Cabot, who had spent their lives piling up stones to fence their father's farm, became restless. In the summer of 1850 they were ready to tear down the fences which seemed to hem them in, to rebel against their close-fisted old father, and for once in their lives to be free. One day Ephraim Cabot hitched up his rig and drove off, leaving the farm in charge of his three sons, Sim, Peter, and their younger half-brother, Eben. All three sons cordially hated their father because they saw him for what he was, a greedy, self-righteous old hypocrite. The older brothers hated old Ephraim for what he had done to them, but Eben had a further grievance. He hated his father because he had stolen the land which had belonged to his mother, and had then worked her to death on the farm. Eben felt the farm belonged to him, and he meant to have it. He had inherited some of old Ephraim's stony implacability, as well as his sensuality, and he gave expression to the latter on his trips down the road to visit Minnie, the local prostitute who had belonged to his father before him.

Realizing that Sim and Peter wanted to go to California, yet had no money to take them there, Eben thought up a plan to get rid of them once and for all. During old Ephraim's absence he offered them three hundred dollars apiece in gold if they would sign a paper renouncing all claims to the farm. The money had belonged to Eben's mother, and Eben had found it buried beneath the floorboards of the kitchen. The brothers accepted Eben's offer and set off for California.

Shortly afterward old Ephraim drove home with his third wife. He was seventy-six, she was thirty-five. But Abbie Putnam had decided that she wanted a home of her own. When old Ephraim offered to marry her she accepted him at once, and when she moved into the Cabot home instead she was already determined that whatever happened the farm would be hers someday. She tried unsuccessfully to make friends with Eben. But the thought of another woman's coming to take his mother's place and the farm which rightfully belonged to him made him hate Abbie at first.

After a time Eben began to notice that life on the farm was easier since his stepmother had arrived. But the realization that Abbie could influence his father as she desired only strengthened Eben's determination to resist her attempts to conciliate him. Finally some of his taunts became so pointed that Abbie complained to Ephraim. When she falsely hinted that Eben had been making advances toward her, the old man threatened to kill his son. Realizing that she had gone too far, and that she must make a different approach, Abbie subtly built up in Ephraim's mind the idea that a son and heir who would inherit the farm upon his death would be a better way of getting back at Eben than to kill him outright. The thought that at the age of seventy-six he might have a son flattered the old man, and he agreed to let Eben alone.

One night, after Ephraim had gone out to sleep in the barn, Abbie saw her opportunity to make her hold on the farm secure. She managed to lure Eben into his mother's parlor, a room which had not been opened since her death, and there she seduced him, breaking down his scruples with the suggestion that by cuckolding his father he could get revenge for Ephraim's treatment of his mother.

The result of this move on Abbie's part was the son whom Ephraim wanted as an heir. To celebrate the child's birth, Ephraim invited all the neighbors to a dance in the kitchen of the farmhouse. Many of the guests suspected the true circumstances and said so as openly as they dared. Ephraim paid no attention to the insinuations and outdanced them all until even the fiddler dropped from sheer exhaustion.

While the revelry still was going on the old man stepped outside to cool off. There he and Eben, who had been sulking outside, quarreled over the possession of the farm. Spitefully Ephraim taunted his son with a revelation of how Abbie had tricked him out of his inheritance. Furious, Eben turned on Abbie, threatening to kill her, and telling her he hated her and the child he had fathered when she tricked him with her scheme. But by this time Abbie was genuinely in love with Eben, and, thinking the child was the obstacle which was keeping them apart, she smothered it in an effort to prove to her lover that it was he and not the child she wanted. When he discovered what had happened, Eben was both enraged and shocked, and he set off to get the sheriff for Abbie's arrest.

When Ephraim discovered that Abbie had killed the child that was not his, he too was shocked, but his heart filled with contempt at his son's cowardice in giving Abbie over to the law.

On his way to the farm Eben began to realize how much he loved Abbie, and the great love she had shown for him in taking the child's life. When the sheriff came to take Abbie away, he confessed that he was an accomplice in the crime. The two were taken off together, both destined for punishment, but happy in their love. Ephraim Cabot was left alone with his farm, the best farm in the county. It was, the sheriff told him, a place anybody would want to own.

Reading Donn Byrne's short stories is like being lifted up out of a flat country and being set down in a wonderfully clean, colorful, and powerful land. There the characters are courtly, their stories full of courage, humor, and skill. Destiny Bay is a series of nine of these stories, differing greatly in length, told by Kerry Macfarlane, heir to Destiny

Bay, a house and a district in the north of Ireland. This place is a region of high hills, wild ocean, sun, and heather; the characters are equally bold, wild, warm, and beautiful.

The Story:

Kerry's uncle, Sir Valentine Macfarlane, lord of Destiny Bay, with his great fan-shaped red beard that came to his waist, was the courtliest and most hospitable of men. In twenty minutes he had persuaded the old Duke of la Mentera and his grandson that he could not allow Spanish royalty to stay at the Widow McGinty's village hotel when there was room and plenty at Destiny Bay. With the simplicity which comes with great age, the duke said that his life had been full of many turnings; now he was on the last path and he had come hoping to find a treasure chest, said to have been lost when one of his ancestors was killed off the Irish coast after Drake's defeat of the Armada. His grandson must be provided for; he had nowhere else to turn.

Aunt Jenepher, beautiful, blind, but seeming to see people better than anyone, said the duke and Don Anthony, his grandson, were noble and good, and she treated them with that kindness of hers which went straight to the heart.

A short time later the duke died, leaving his girlish-looking grandson to the Macfarlanes' several cares—the courtliness of Uncle Valentine, the trust of his valet, James Carabine, the kindness of Aunt Jenepher, and Kerry's companionship. That friendship was not always pleasing to Don Anthony, since he could not bear to see their prize fights or cock fights, though he was beside himself with joy at their horse races. But it was Jenico for whom the boy conceived a hero worship.

Jenico was not a large man like Uncle Valentine, but he had that look of burnished strength which made women try to get his attention, and he was innately courteous, though his mind might be a thousand miles away. His home was near Destiny Bay and nearer Spanish Men's Rest, that spot where the Spaniards were buried after their ships had been wrecked. For a long time the bees and birds had shunned the place, and it was a chill on the heart to go there. But when Jenico and Kerry took Don Anthony to Spanish Men's Rest, they heard the bees and birds again and the place seemed sunnier.

Jenico, trying to get the boy's mind off the settlement of the grandfather's estate, finally asked him to take off with him on a trip to the Atlas Mountains. The boy was flattered and obviously wanted to go, but begged off. Shortly after, as the three walked near the river, Jenico and Kerry decided to go swimming. Jenico went on ahead and Kerry could see his head like that of a sleek seal in the waves. When Kerry started to strip, Don Anthony begged him not to take off his clothes. Jenico laughed and told Kerry to strip the boy and throw him in. Kerry headed for the boy. Don Anthony flashed a knife, then ducked away. As Kerry turned to follow him, there was Uncle Valentine, roaring that there was once a time when a lady could be trusted amongst Irishmen.

With a change of clothes, Ann-Dolly, as she asked to be called, was one of the loveliest girls they had ever seen, and there was a new spirit in her. So that she would feel free to stay, they made her companion to Aunt Jenepher. At that time her relations with Jenico were strained, but whenever they were in a room together she would look at him when he was not looking, and then he would look at her when she had turned away.

Jenico tried a fool scheme of planting treasure for her to find, but he and Kerry had a fight about that and he never told her. Finally she had enough of the Macfarlanes and ran away in the night. Jenico and James Carabine and Kerry used horses, bicycles, and even bloodhounds to follow her. At last they found her huddled in an old ruin. She was deathly white and scared, and nothing they did could make her move. James Carabine plucked Kerry's sleeve, suggesting that they return the horses, the bicycles, the dogs they had borrowed, but Kerry brushed him off. Finally Carabine picked Kerry up like a feather and forcibly carried him out, to leave Jenico and Ann-Dolly together.

After Ann-Dolly became mistress of Jenico's house, the birds always sang and the bees knew it was a fair and happy home.

One never knew what or whom Uncle Valentine might bring back from a trip. One of the kindest of men was Patrick Herne, a man who looked like a double for Digory Pascoe, who was to have married Aunt Jenepher after he made his fortune. Digory had died in a fight, but Uncle Valentine had kept him alive for twelve years by writing letters from him, until he found Patrick Herne and brought him home as Digory. Aunt Jenepher played along for a while until she had to ask who the man really was who thought just as she did. Theirs was a happy wedding.

One time Uncle Valentine went off to America to find James Carabine, who had once saved his life. James Carabine was the Irish champion in the prize ring when he had an urge to sail to America to take care of a drunken friend. Because the friend died at sea, he was lonesome in New York and married a hard-faced and, as it turned out, two-faced singer whose friends ran illegal fights in and around the city. When Uncle Valentine found him, he had taken to drink after losing a bad fight and his wife; but he regained his self-respect and rewon his title before Uncle Valentine took him home. There was no more devoted valet and friend in Ireland than Uncle Valentine's James Carabine.

It was not only Uncle Valentine who traveled distances to help a friend. Anselo Loveridge, the gipsy whom Uncle Valentine's brother Cosimo saved from the hangman's noose, worried about Uncle Cosimo's heavy drinking, brought on, Uncle Cosimo told him, because of a Chinese girl he called the Fair Maid of Wu, whom he had seen three times and never spoken to. Anselo disappeared for six years, and when he came back he brought the Chinese girl as a present to Uncle Cosimo. Having lost his heart in those hard years, he would not wait to see Uncle Cosimo, but continued his wanderings. Uncle Cosimo was happy, his pocket bulging with his big flask, when he went to see what Anselo had brought. After one look his head cleared and he turned on his heel and left the country. From that day he worked to reclaim drunks in the slums of London and became so straight-laced that he was made Bishop of Borneo.

Critique:

Meager of plot because Bernanos is interested more in showing a man's thoughts and basic principles than in picturing human behavior, The Diary of a Country

Priest is fictional presentation of priestly attitudes, functions, and tribulations. Through this philosophical and realistic treatment of life in a small French parish, it is easy to see Bernanos' high regard for Joan of Arc as the symbol of France. In their simplicity the Maid's peasantry and saintliness are not unlike those phases of the diarist's life. Fittingly, compassion and tenderness characterize the writing, which, in translation, sustains the poetic charm and fluency of the original. Mankind's holiness is Bernanos' keynote.

The Story:

A young priest, thirty years old, in charge of the Ambricourt Parish in France, recorded in his diary his impressions and activities over a period of one year. His purpose in keeping the diary was to maintain frankness with himself in his relationships with his parishioners and in his service to God.

The priest was a man of marked humility, sympathy, simplicity, and great loneliness. Son of a poor family in which there had been much suffering and hardship, he planned to raise the scale of living in his parish. His plans for a village savings bank and for coöperative farming were discussed at his first monthly meeting with the curates, but his plans were disapproved because of their pretentious scope and his lack of personal influence in the parish. This saddening blow, which caused him to question whether God would use his services as He did the services of others, was intensified by the words of his superior and ideal, the Curé de Torcy, and of his friend, Dr. Maxence Delbende, who soon afterward committed suicide because of his disappointment at not receiving a legacy he expected.

These two men thwarted the young priest's ambition with their opinions that the poor were not to be raised from their low level because of religious and social reasons. God gave the poor a dignity, the Curé de Torcy said, which they do not wish to lose in His sight. According to the doctor, poverty served as a social bond and a mark of prestige among the poor. In the eyes of the Church, the curate believed, the rich are on the earth to protect the poor.

Undaunted and hopeful, the priest accepted an invitation to the chateau, where he hoped to get financial help from the Count for his parish projects. Thwarted in his attempt, he gave his physical energy, which was limited because of insomnia and a chronic stomach disorder, to the spiritual advancement of his parish. But his efforts in this direction were ill-spent. He questioned his success in teaching a catechism class, for the children did not respond as he had hoped, and he was tormented and plagued by the unsavory attentions of Seraphita Dumouchel, a young student in the class, who discomfited him by her suggestive questions and remarks to the other children and by her scribbled notes left about for the young priest to find.

Seraphita later befriended him, when on a parish visit he suffered a seizure and fell unconscious in the mud. A few days later Seraphita, bribed by sweets, offset her beneficence to the priest by telling Mademoiselle Chantal, the Count's strong-willed, jealous daughter, that the priest had fallen in drunkenness. The story was believed because it was known generally among the parishioners that the priest drank cheap wine, and because his physical condition was growing progressively worse.

The priest's spiritual strength was shown in his theological dealings with the Count's family. Mademoiselle Chantal had told, in conversation and in confession, that her father was having an affair with Mademoiselle Louise. The daughter, believing that she was to be sent to England to live with her mother's cousin, declared that she hated everyone in her household—her father and the governess for their conduct, and her mother for her blindness to the situation. After asserting that she would kill Mademoiselle Louise or herself and that the priest would have to explain away her conduct to God, she got his promise that he would discuss the girl's problems with her mother.

The priest went to the chateau to confer with the Countess regarding her daughter's spiritual state. There he found the mother in a more pronounced atheistic frame of mind than that of her daughter. Her spiritual depression resulted from the death of her baby son, twelve years before. During a prolonged philosophical discussion the Countess, after ridiculing the priest for his theological idealism and his lack of vanity and ambition, described with bitterness the hateful selfishness of her daughter, and related with indifference the Count's many infidelities.

Before he left the chateau, the priest sensed a spiritual change in his wealthy parishioner when she threw into the fire a medallion containing a lock of her son's hair. The priest, always humble, tried to retrieve the locket. In a letter delivered to him at the presbytery later in the day the Countess informed him that he had given her peace and escape from a horrible solitude with the memory of her dead child.

The Countess died that night. The priest's success in helping to redeem her soul left him with an uncertain feeling. He did not know whether he was happy or not.

If his reaction was happiness, it was short-lived. When the details of his session with the Countess became common knowledge, for Mademoiselle Chantal had eavesdropped during the interview, criticism and derision were heaped upon him.

The canon reprimanded him because he had assumed the role of her confessor, and the Curé de Torcy ridiculed his approach in dealing with the Countess. Members of the family, unstable as they were in their relationships, accused him of subversive tactics to realize a childish ambition.

His social ineptness, his personal inadequacies, and his professional inaptitude—deficiencies repeatedly mentioned in his introspective moods—seemed to increase as his physical condition grew worse. His hemorrhages continuing, he decided to consult Dr. Lavigne in Lille.

His last major bungle was in connection with this medical aid. Because he forgot the name of the doctor recommended to him, in Lille he turned to the directory and mistakenly chose the name of Dr. Laville. The physician, a drug addict, bluntly diagnosed the priest's ailment as cancer of the stomach.

From the doctor's office, the priest went to the address of his old schoolmate at the seminary, Monsieur Dufrety, who had long been urging his friend to visit him. There he died that night.

In a letter from Monsieur Dufrety to the Curé de Torcy, details of the priest's death were described. In great suffering and anguish, following a violent hemorrhage, the priest held his rosary to his breast. When he asked his old friend for absolution, his request was granted and the ritual performed in a manner, Monsieur Dufrety wrote, that could leave no one with any possible misgivings. The priest's last words affirmed his great faith in the whole scheme of things, because of God's existence.

Critique:

Because George J. Whyte-Melville's works have been catalogued as sporting fiction, they have never been given their rightful place in the history of English literature, and most scholars pass them by completely. It is true that Whyte-Melville wrote particularly for the sporting world, but his novels, especially Digby Grand, have interested wider audiences in their time. His writings have an air of liveliness, a note of authenticity, and an ineffable freshness. Digby Grand was Whyte-Melville's first novel, and it was truly termed by the novelist an autobiography, for the author's own early career as an officer in a Highland regiment and the Guards is mirrored in the novel. Digby Grand is, in fact, partly young Whyte-Melville. Considered in his time an authority on fox hunting, the author refers to the sport frequently in Digby Grand, as in his other novels.

The Story:

Digby Grand's father, Sir Peregrine Grand, of Haverley Hall, had one fond wish with respect to his son: he wanted Digby to be a man of fashion and to know his position in society. With that in mind, he decided that when Digby, then a youngster at Eton, should finish school he would be commissioned in the British Army. Digby, taken with the idea, wished to have his appointment made at once.

As luck had it, Digby met General Sir Benjamin Burgonet, who, pleased with the young man, made every effort to secure Digby's commission. Within a matter of weeks Digby received a letter announcing his commission in the army as an ensign in a regiment of infantry.

Digby Grand reported to his regiment's

headquarters in Scotland, where he rapidly adjusted himself to military life. Being of an adventurous turn and liking sports and gambling, he quickly became a sought-out addition to any party. He soon discovered, however, that the slim allowance made him by his father and his small pay as an ensign did not cover his large expenditures, and so he fell into the habit of gambling on horses, cards, and billiards to augment his income. Most of his fellow officers existed in much the same fashion.

While in Scotland, Digby had a narrow escape from marriage when an officer's daughter, a woman in her thirties, induced Digby to become engaged. His friends saw through the woman's plot, however, and rescued him from his predicament. He had the satisfaction of seeing her become instead the wife of Dubbs, the regimental drum major.

Shortly after that incident Digby was sent to Canada for a tour of duty. Memorable events of that short tour were the slaughter of a huge bull moose and a love affair with a French-Canadian girl named Zoë. Colonel Cartouch, Digby's commanding officer, having taken a liking to the high-spirited young man, prevented him from marrying the girl because he felt that the teen-age ensign was not yet ready for marriage.

Upon his return to England, Digby found himself with a new commission in Her Majesty's service; his father had purchased a lieutenantcy in the Life Guards for him during his absence in Canada. Digby was now in the most honored and most social brigade in the service, the Guards being the units which were stationed in London. Within a short time Digby had once again won for himself a praise in fashionable London life. He was voted into several of the choicest gambling clubs, appeared in the best society, and was taken up by some well-known people. One of his friends was a youthful peer named St. Heliers; another was an officer named Levanter; a third was Mrs. Mantrap, a woman who basked in the attentions of young men.

To keep up his life of ease, including gambling for high stakes, maintaining good rooms, drinking only the best wines, and buying expensive horses, required all of Digby's resourcefulness. Because his resourcefulness was not enough at times, his friend Levanter introduced him to a money-lender named Shadrach, who was quite willing to lend Digby money at a high rate of interest, the principal to be repaid when Digby inherited the family estates. Not once but many times Digby borrowed from Shadrach.

One day, while in charge of a small group of military police at parade, Digby met Flora Belmont, who had attended the parade with her father, a retired colonel. Immediately Digby fell in love, in spite of the fact that the colonel had little or nothing to pass on to his daughter in the way of a fortune.

On his twenty-first birthday, spurred on by his own love and that which Flora Belmont had declared for him, Digby went home to Haverley Hall to request a definite income of size from his father so that he and Flora could be married. Sir Peregrine, instead of being happy, was furious that Digby would even think of marrying anyone but an heiress, for the Grand estate was in poor financial condition and Sir Peregrine had been counting on a brilliant marriage by his son to recoup the family fortunes.

Downhearted, Digby returned to duty in London. To while away the time he continued his old life, living beyond his means and borrowing money to pay his expenses. He even borrowed from Shadrach when his boyhood chum, Tom Spencer, who was studying for holy orders at Oxford, had to sign the notes with him. For a time Digby had an affair with Coralie de Rivolte, a famous dancer, but that romance ended, though only after Digby had made an enemy of a scar-faced Spaniard who seemed to be the dancer's relative.

Eventually Digby got so deeply into debt that only a change of regiments could help him. As an officer in the Guards he had too many social responsibilities, and he exchanged commissions with an officer in a dragoon regiment stationed in Kent, at some distance from London. Within a few weeks he made still another move. Old General Sir Benjamin Burgonet, who had secured Digby's original commission, made him his aide, and Digby prepared to go with the general to India. He was somewhat aghast, however, to learn that the girl who had married the drum major was now Lady Burgonet.

In spite of his precautions, Digby was unable to leave England without falling into the hands of Shadrach and other creditors, who had him imprisoned for debt. To satisfy his creditors, Digby had to sell his commission and give up all he owned. At that black hour word came that Sir Peregrine had died, leaving Digby with the title and the estate. When the will was settled, however, it became apparent that the estate was too heavily in debt to be of any use to the new heir. To salvage himself, Digby had to sell the land; he inherited only the title.

He was saved by a meeting with Tom Spencer, who had been prevented from finishing his degree at Oxford by an arrest made for a note he had signed on Digby's behalf. Spencer, far from being downcast, had become a successful wine merchant. He took Digby into the business with him and the two built up a flourishing trade. Digby had, by that time, acquired a great deal more discretion and a few gray hairs.

After some years Digby ran across his old commanding officer, Colonel Cartouch. The colonel was engaged in prosecuting a man who had forged checks on his name, and the two discovered that the man was married to Coralie de Rivolte, Digby's old love. That surprise was not the end, for the colonel discovered also that Coralie was his own daughter by a Spanish woman who had run away from him after killing her sister, whom she believed in love with Cartouch.

The appearance of Coralie reminded Digby of Flora Belmont, the girl whom his father had forbidden him to marry because she lacked a fortune. Digby found her in mourning for her father but still single. Through friends Digby learned that she had remained faithful to him. In a short time they had made plans for their approaching marriage. Digby Grand was ready to be tamed.

SAVAGE KEITH RICKMAN, the genius

HORACE JEWDWINE, a literary editor

LUCIA HARDEN, loved by Rickman

FLOSSIE WALKER, betrothed to Rickman

MR. PILKINGTON, a financier

Critique:

Written by a popular English author of the early twentieth century, The Divine Fire is the chronicle of a gifted but unknown poet. His story was one of conflict between the genius and the man. First one, then the other was supreme, and he fought unsuccessfully to reconcile the two. It was only through the help of a good and inspiring woman that he was at last able to find himself.

The Story:

Horace Jewdwine, a literary editor, had a problem. He thought he had discovered a genius in Savage Keith Rickman, a young and unknown poet who earned his living by making catalogs for his father, a bookseller. But Jewdwine was afraid to say openly that Rickman was a genius, afraid for his reputation if he called Rickman a genius publicly and then the young man proved otherwise. He encouraged Rickman privately but failed to give him the public recognition that would have meant so much to the young writer.

Rickman himself cared little for fame or money. He knew too that he was a genius. That is, part of him was a genius. He was also a student, a young man about town, a journalist, a seeker after simple home life, and sometimes a drunk. It was hard to have so many facets to one's nature. One part warred constantly with the others. But no matter in what form he found himself, honor never left him. Even when drunk he continued to be honorable.

Rickman's intelligence and his ability to judge books were the foundations upon which the elder Rickman had built his financial success as a book dealer. The father and son could never understand each other. Money was the father's god; the muse was Rickman's. The father was backed by and supported by Mr. Pilkington, a financier of questionable ethics but great success. When Pilkington ton informed him that the Harden library might soon be on the market, the old man sent his son to evaluate it. At the same time Miss Lucia Harden, daughter of the owner of the library, asked for someone to catalog it for her. Rickman was sent because his knowledge of old books was infallible.

Rickman was awed by Lucia. She was the daughter of a baronet, so far above him that he could never hope to have her return his affection, but from the first he knew that she was destined to be his inspiration. Lucia was Jewdwine's cousin, and he was unhappy when he learned of her association with Rickman. He knew Rickman was beneath her, but he knew too that his cousin was moved by poetry. In addition, Jewdwine himself thought he would one day marry Lucia and inherit the library and the country estate. However, he could not bring himself to ask for her hand; decisions were almost impossible for Jewdwine.

Rickman soon learned, as he worked for Lucia, that his father and Pilkington were planning to pay a ridiculously low price for the Harden library. In order to help the girl, he wrote to Jewdwine and asked him to buy the library at a fair figure. Jewdwine failed to answer the letter. When Lucia's father died suddenly, leaving her indebted to Pilkington, Rickman went to his father and tried to persuade him to change the offer. The old man refused, and Rickman left the bookshop forever, refusing to compromise his honor in return for the partnership his father offered him if he would stay. Not wanting to hurt Lucia, he told her little of what had happened. He even tried to excuse Jewdwine's failure to buy the library and so salvage some of her father's estate.

Pilkington took the Harden house and furniture and Rickman's father the library. After Rickman left him the old man's business began to fail, and he had to mortgage the library to Pilkington. The books were stored, pending redemption. Rickman left Lucia and returned to his rooming-house, not to see her again for five years.

Back in London, Rickman continued to write for various journals. Jewdwine gave him a junior editorship on the journal which he edited, and the job allowed Rickman to live fairly comfortably. His serious writing he had put away in a drawer. The product of his genius, it would bring no money. Meanwhile he was trapped into a proposal by little Flossie Walker, a fellow boarder. Flossie was a girl who could never understand the ways of genius; her proper world was a house in the suburbs, decorated with hideous furniture. Rickman found himself with the house bought and the wedding date set.

Chance was to save him. Lucia, after five years, visited a friend in Rickman's boarding-house and the two met again. No word of love was spoken, for Lucia, even without her fortune, was still above him. And Rickman had no desire to hurt Flossie, who had waited two years for him to make enough money for their marriage. But he and Lucia found inspiration and comfort in renewed acquaintance. The real blow to Flossie's dreams came when Rickman's father died, leaving him a small inheritance. With it, Rickman could possibly redeem from Pilkington the mortgaged Harden library and return it to Lucia. To do so would mean a wait of at least two more years for Flossie. This she could not understand. A legal debt was one thing, a debt of honor another. With great relief Rickman learned that she refused to wait. She quickly married another boarder and found her house in the suburbs, complete with nursery.

Rickman lived through years of the most killing labor he would ever know. He worked all night, starved himself, lived in an unheated attic in order to redeem the complete library. He got extensions from Pilkington, who enjoyed the sight of genius chasing an impossible goal. His friends lost track of him. He lost his job with Jewdwine because he would not compromise his honor even in his desperate need to help Lucia. At last he seemed doomed to fail, for his lack of food and his feverish work made him desperately ill. Friends found him and took him, unconscious, to a hospital. Later, going through his things, they found the work of his genius. When it was published, Rickman's fame was assured. Poor Jewdwine! How he wished now that he had had the courage to claim Rickman in time. But Jewdwine had by that time sacrificed his own principles, and success was beyond hope for him.

Recovered, Rickman went to Lucia. He found her ill, unable to walk. When she learned that his illness had been caused by work for her, the gift was almost more than she could bear. With his aid she arose from her bed. Cured of the malady which she knew now was only heartbreak, she saw Rickman whole, the genius and the man fused at last.

Critique:

Doctor Faustus: The Life of the German Composer Adrian Leverkühn as Told by a Friend offers several approaches to an understanding of Mann's purpose and narrative pattern. On one level, it may be taken simply as the biographical story of a strange and fascinating genius, written in simple, honest prose by his lifelong friend and admirer, Serenus Zeitblum, a retired professor of philology. Again, it may be regarded as an excursion into a field which present-day fiction has neglected, a story of the destruction of a human soul in that demon-haunted world of the imagination which modern science has almost destroyed. Or it may be read as a study of the problem of the artist in contemporary society, of the conflict between his love of beauty and his moral responsibility to the kind of world in which he lives today. Beneath and beyond these levels of meaning, however, the novel is a political and philosophical allegory deeply charged with suggestion and purpose. Leverkühn, who gave his soul to the devil for twenty years of creative genius, symbolizes the German break-through to world power, the tortured nationalism of the Nazi state. As the narrator digresses to comment on the progress of the war the reader perceives that the rise and collapse of the Nazi dream runs side by side with Leverkühn's tragic story, like musical counterpoint creating a mood of increasing shame and community guilt, and a realization of inescapable doom. The novel is intricately constructed, profoundly serious, and beautifully written, with meanings which extend beyond the purely national and the temporal.

The Story:

At the outset Serenus Zeitblom doubts his ability to make understandable the life story of his friend Adrian Leverkühn, a musical genius whose strange, doomed career had much in common with the fated course of German history in the twentieth century. A former professor of philology, living in retirement and out of sympathy with the Hitler regime, greatly concerned for the future of his country, Zeitblom hesitantly began his task in May, 1943.

Adrian Leverkühn was born in 1885 on a farm near Kaiseraschern, in Thuringia. His family was of superior yeoman stock, and his father, a man interested in curious natural phenomena, did everything in his power to stimulate his son's intellectual curiosity. Adrian's boyhood friend was Serenus Zeitblom, a frequent visitor in the Leverkühn household. Years later Zeitblom could remember his friend's absorbing interest in a book filled with pictures of exotic lepidoptera. One in particular, Heræra Esmeralda, fascinated the boy because of its unusual beauty and protective coloring. Adrian had his introduction to music from a hired girl who taught him old folk songs.

A boy of brilliant mind and arrogant disposition, Adrian was educated to become the scholar of the family, since the farm was intended for an older brother. When he was ten he entered the gymnasium in Kaiseraschern. Living in the house of his uncle, a dealer in musical instruments, he had the run of the shop and began to play chords on an old harmonium. His uncle, overhearing his efforts, decided that the boy ought to have piano lessons. Adrian began to study under Wendell Kretschmar, the organist at the cathedral. His chief interest at that time, however, was theology, and he entered the University of Halle with the intention of preparing himself for the clergy. Zeitblom, certain that his friend's choice was dictated by the arrogance of purity, went with Adrian to his theological lectures. One of the teachers was Ehrenfried Kumpf, a forthright theologian who enlivened his classes by insulting the devil with epithets that Martin Luther might have used. Another instructor was Eberhard Schleppfuss, whose lectures were filled with anecdotes and sly undertones of demonism and witchcraft.

Because of the variety of his talents Adrian was soon ready for a career in scholarship, theology, or music. At last, unable to reconcile his interest in philosophy and science with theological precepts, he turned to music and began, still under Kretschmar's training, experiments in theory and technique which were to determine the highly original nature of his art. Before long the pupil had surpassed the instructor. Then Zeitblom was called up for a year of military duty, service from which Adrian was exempt because of his frail constitution, and the two friends separated for a time.

Adrian went to Leipzig for further study. With Kretschmar's encouragement he began to compose music of his own. A new friend was Rüdiger Schildknapp, an Anglophile poet whose enthusiasm for Shakespeare led to Adrian's decision to plan an opera based on Love's Labor's Lost. One night a sinister guide, somewhat like Schleppfuss in appearance, lured Adrian to a brothel. When a girl in the house—an Esmeralda, he called her—approached him, he ran from the place. Later he tried to see the girl again, but she had gone to Pressburg. Adrian rolled her and there voluntarily contracted the venereal infection which was to account for the strange flowering of his genius and the eventual wreckage of his life. Several years afterward, during a holiday in Italy, he imagined a medievalistic, hallucinated encounter with the devil, who in return for his soul promised him twenty-four years in which to fulfill his powers as an artist.

Before his Italian journey Adrian had lived for a time in Munich. There his friends were artists and young intellectuals, including Rüdiger Schildknapp, the poet; Jeanette Scheurl, a novelist; Rudolf Schwerdtfeger, a young violinist; several actors, and the daughters of his landlady, Inez and Clarissa Rodde. Through Adrian, Zeitblom met these people and became interested in them. In 1912 Zeitblom married. A short time later, on his return from Italy, Adrian retired to a Bavarian farm presided over by motherly Frau Else Schweigestill. In his retreat, during the next twenty years, he composed the music that established his fame. Zeitblom went to teach at Freising, not far away, and from that time on the friends saw each other frequently. Zeitblom wrote the libretto for Love's Labour's Lost.

In 1914 Zeitblom went into the army and served until invalided home with typhus. Adrian, in retirement, wrote Mirvels of the Universe and a composition based on the Gesta Romanorum. During the war Inez Rodde married Dr. Helmut Institoris. Secretly in love with Rudolf Schwerdtfeger, however, she kept up an adulterous relationship with the violinist for years. Adrian's health began to improve after the war. His great work of that period was an oratorio, Apocalypse. As his fame grew he acquired a patroness, Madame de Tolna, a wealthy Hungarian widow whom Zeitblom never met. Schwerdtfeger, in the meantime, had broken off his love affair with Inez. Their first meeting after their separation was at the funeral of Clarissa Rodde, an actress driven to suicide by a blackmailing lover.

Adrian yielded at last to Schwerdtfeger's urging and composed for the musician a violin concerto. About that time Adrian met attractive Marie Godeau. Hoping to marry her, he sent Schwerdtfeger to act as his emissary in his courtship, but the violinist fell in love with the girl and wooed her for himself. Shortly after the engagement had been announced Inez Institoris boarded a street-car in which Schwerdtfeger was riding and shot her former lover. Adrian blamed himself for his friend's death.

Fate had one more blow in store for the composer. Adrian had a nephew, Nepomuk Schneidewein, of whom he was paternally fond. While convalescing from an illness, little Echo, as his uncle called him, went to stay with Adrian at the Schweigestill farm. Taken suddenly ill with cerebrospinal meningitis, the child died. It seemed to Adrian that he had lost the child he himself might have had. He was never to recover completely from his grief.

Meanwhile he was at work on his masterpiece, a symphonic cantata called The Lamentation of Doctor Faustus. In the early summer of 1930 he invited a number of his friends and some critics to hear excerpts from the work, but his explanation of his composition was so disordered and blasphemous that many of the guests left before he sat down to begin playing the score. As he struck the first chords he fell senseless to the floor.

Adrian Leverkühn lived in madness for the next ten years, and he died, tenderly cared for by his aged mother, at his Thuringian birthplace in 1940. Serenus Zeitblom was among the few old friends present at the funeral. It seemed to him then, and the certainty grew upon him while he was writing the story of Adrian's life, that his friend had somehow reflected the destiny of the German nation, a land arrogant, isolated, dehumanized, and at last reeling to that destruction which was the price of its power as the old philologist penned his final pages in April, 1945.

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

Author: Christopher Marlowe (1564-1593)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Germany

First presented: c. 1588

Principal characters:

FAUSTUS, master of all knowledge

WAGNER, his servant

LUCIFER, the fallen angel

MEPHOSTOPILIS, a devil

GOOD ANGEL

EVIL ANGEL

Critique:

This drama should be regarded as a skeletal structure of the play written by Marlowe, for the surviving manuscripts are so interspersed with comic scenes and the lines themselves so often revised according to whims of the actors that the original writing must be culled out of the surviving version. Even so, The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus is worth reading and study because of the many remaining examples of the poet's skill it contains. In addition to the adulterated poetry in this play there is also the problem of the tainted characterization and symbolism; for while the personality of Mephostopilis is often caricaturized and while the exploits of Faustus are frequently rendered pure low comedy, still the Marlowe version of the two principal characters is evident in the sober and more consistent moments of the play. As an added contribution to existing Faustian literature, Marlowe's Doctor Faustus is an artistic effort, although not comparable in depth or scope to the treatment given this theme in Goethe's Faust.

The Story:

Faustus had been born of base stock in Rhodes, Germany. In his maturity, while living with some relatives in Wittenberg, he studied theology and was called a doctor. However, Faustus was so swollen with conceit that, Daedalus-like, he strove too far, became gluttoned with learning, conspired with the devil, and finally fell, accursed.

At the outset of his downward path Doctor Faustus found himself complete master of the fields of knowledge which men at that time studied. As a medical doctor he had already achieved huge success and great renown. But after obtaining good health for men no challenge remained in medicine except immortality. Law, Faustus concluded, was nothing but an elaborate moneymaking scheme. Only divinity remained, but theology led to a blind alley. Since the reward of sin was death and since no man could say he was without sin, then all men must sin and consequently die.

Necromancy greatly attracted Faustus. Universal power would be within his reach, the whole world at his command, and emperors at his feet, were he to become a magician. Summoning his servant Wagner, Faustus ordered him to summon Valdes and Cornelius, who could teach him their arts.

The Good Angel and the Evil Angel each tried to persuade Faustus, but Faustus was in no mood to listen to the Good Angel. He exulted over the prospects of his forthcoming adventures. He would get gold from India, pearls from the oceans, tasty delicacies from faraway places; he would read strange philosophies, cull from foreign kings their secrets, control Germany with his power, reform the public schools, and perform many other fabulous deeds. Eager to acquire knowledge of the black arts, he went away to study with Valdes and Cornelius.

Before long the scholars of Wittenberg began to notice the doctor's prolonged absence. Learning from Wagner of his master's unhallowed pursuits, the scholars lamented the fate of the famous doctor.

Faustus' first act of magic was to summon Mephostopilis. At sight of the ugly devil, he ordered Mephostopilis to assume the shape of a Franciscan friar. The docile obedience of Mephostopilis elated the magician, but Mephostopilis explained that magic had limits in the devil's kingdom. Mephostopilis claimed that he had not actually appeared at Faustus' behest but had come, as he would have to any other person, because Faustus had cursed Christ and abjured the Scriptures. Whenever a man is on the verge of being doomed, the devil will appear.

Interested in the nature of Lucifer, Faustus questioned Mephostopilis about his master, the fallen angel, and about hell, Lucifer's domain. Mephostopilis was wary. He claimed that the fallen spirits, having been deprived of the glories of heaven, found the whole world hell. Mephostopilis urged Faustus to give up his scheme, but Faustus scorned the warning, saying that he would surrender his soul to Lucifer if the fallen angel would give to Faustus twenty-four years of voluptuous ease, with Mephostopilis to attend him.

While Faustus indulged in a mental argument concerning the relative merits of God and the devil, the Good Angel and the Evil Angel, symbolic of his inner conflict, appeared once again, each attempting to persuade him. The result was that Faustus was more determined than ever to continue his course.

Mephostopilis returned to assure Faustus that Lucifer was agreeable to the bargain, which must be sealed in Faustus' blood. When Faustus tried to write, however, his blood congealed and Mephostopilis had to warm the liquid with fire.

Significantly the words, "Fly, man," appeared in Latin on Faustus' arm. When Faustus questioned Mephostopilis about the nature of hell, the devil claimed that hell had no limits for the damned. Intoxicated by his new estate, Faustus disclaimed any belief in an afterlife. Thus he assured himself that his contract with Lucifer would never be fulfilled, in spite of the devil's warning that he, Mephostopilis, was living proof of hell's existence.

Faustus, eager to consume the fruits of the devil's offering, demanded books that would contain varied information about the devil's regime. When the Good Angel and the Evil Angel came to him again, he realized that he was beyond repentance. Again the opposing Angels insinuated themselves into his mind, until he called on Christ to save him. As he spoke, wrathful Lucifer descended upon his prospective victim to admonish him never to call to God. As an appeasing gesture Lucifer conjured up a vision of the Seven Deadly Sins.

Faustus traveled extensively throughout the world, and Wagner marveled at his master's rapid progress. In Rome, at the palace of the Pope, Faustus, made invisible by his magic arts, astounded the Pope by snatching things from the holy man's hands. Like a gleeful child Faustus asked Mephostopilis to create more mischief. When Faustus returned home the scholars questioned him eagerly about many things unknown to them. As his fame spread, the emperor invited him to the palace and asked him to conjure up the spirit of Alexander the Great. Because a doubtful knight scoffed at such a preposterous idea, Faustus, after fulfilling the emperor's request, spitefully placed horns on the head of the skeptical nobleman.

Foreseeing that his time of merriment was drawing to a close, Faustus returned to Wittenberg. Wagner sensed that his master was about to die when Faustus gave his faithful servant all his wordly goods.

As death drew near, Faustus spoke with his conscience, which, assuming the form of an Old Man, begged him to repent before he died. When Faustus declared that he would repent, Mephostopilis cautioned him not to offend Lucifer. Faustus asked Mephostopilis to bring him Helen of Troy as a lover to amuse him during the final days of his life.

In his declining hours Faustus conversed with scholars who had loved him, and the fallen theologian revealed to them his bargain with Lucifer. Alone, he uttered a final despairing plea that he be saved from impending misery, but in the end he was borne off by a company of devils.

DOCTOR THORNE

Author: Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: "Barssetshire," England

First published: 1858

Principal characters:

DOCTOR THORNE, a country doctor

MARY THORNE, his niece

SQUIRE GRESHAM, owner of Greshamsbury Park

LADY ARABELLA, his wife

FRANK GRESHAM, their son

ROGER SCATCHERD, a stonemason, later a baronet

LOUIS PHILIPPE, his son

MISS DUNSTABLE, an heiress

Critique:

The third in the series of Barchester Novels, Doctor Thorne continues the chronicling of clerical and county life begun in The Warden and Barchester Towers. The usual Trollopian theme of making money and a successful marriage is here portrayed against the background of an English country estate and the life connected with it. There is, as in other books of the series, a mixture of sentiment, humor, romance, and fidelity to human nature and experience. The chief value of these novels lies in their authentic depiction of middle-class country life in nineteenth-century England. The Barchester Novels do not contain the whole of Victorian society, but in them Trollope reflected, better than any other writer of his time, the manners and morals of the period.

The Story:

Greshamsbury Park, in the county of Barssetshire, dominated the life of the surrounding countryside. Unfortunately, Greshamsbury's lord, Squire Gresham, was rapidly spending himself into poverty.

Most of his financial troubles resulted from the desire of his wife, Lady Arabella De Courcy Gresham, to get him into politics. The squire had inherited his father's seat in Parliament. He had lost favor, however, because of his Whig leanings. Barssetshire, overwhelmingly Tory, did not approve of Gresham's Whig friends or the fact that his wife's aristocratic family, the De Courcys, were aggressively Whig in sentiment. Having lost his seat in the Parliamentary elections, Gresham twice tried to regain it. These attempts were stimulated by his wife, who fancied being the wife of a member of Parliament. But Gresham was not successful, and he lost a great deal of money in financing his campaigns.

Consequently, when his son Frank came of age, Squire Gresham had not much to offer him in the way of financial security. Lady Arabella saw as their only hope the possibility of Frank's marriage to a wealthy heiress. That he might do such a thing seemed rather doubtful, however, for, much to the distress of his mother and her family, young Frank was highly enamored of Mary Thorne, niece of the local doctor. Frank and Mary had known each other all their lives, and Mary had been educated along with the young Greshams at Greshamsbury Park. Hers was an interesting history.

She had been brought to live with her uncle, Doctor Thorne, when she was a mere infant. The real circumstances of her birth—that she was the illegitimate child of Doctor Thorne's brother and Mary Scatcherd, a village girl—were known only to the doctor. Even Mary Scatcherd's brother Roger, who had killed his sister's betrayer, did not know that Doctor Thorne had adopted the child. Roger Scatcherd, a poor stonemason, had been sentenced to six months in prison for his crime. When his term was up, he was told that the child had died. Since the doctor stood in high favor with Squire Gresham and daily attended Lady Arabella, it was natural that his niece should visit the estate. Because she was an attractive child and near the age of the Gresham children, she soon took her lessons with them. By the time Frank was of age, Mary Thorne seemed part of the family. But Lady Arabella was determined that this was not to be the literal state of affairs; Mary had no money.

One of Squire Gresham's greatest misfortunes was the loss of a particularly choice part of his estate, land sold to pay off his numerous and most pressing debts. Doctor Thorne, acting as agent for the squire, found a buyer in Sir Roger Scatcherd, a wealthy baronet. Sir Roger was the former stonemason, who had prospered well after his jail term and was now the possessor of a title, a seat in Parliament, and a large fortune. Although he knew nothing of the existence of his sister's illegitimate child, Sir Roger was in close contact with Doctor Thorne. Sir Roger was a chronic alcoholic, and Doctor

Thorne was often called on to attend him during his sprees.

To the Gresham family the loss of this piece of property was indeed a tragedy, for the sale greatly diminished the estate Frank would someday inherit. Nervously, Lady Arabella began to plan for the future of her family. Fortunately, one of the daughters was engaged to marry money, a politician who wanted the Gresham and De Courcy position and family connections. Another daughter would marry the local vicar and so would be assured of a respectable position, though one without much money. But Frank was his mother's real hope. If he could make a wealthy marriage, their troubles would be over. But Frank, in love with Mary Thorne, had no lofty matrimonial ambitions. Lady Arabella's family, to save him from an unfortunate romance, invited Frank to De Courcy Castle for a visit.

It was the Countess De Courcy's plan to make a match between Frank and Miss Dunstable, a family friend. Miss Dunstable was considered the wealthiest heiress in England, but she was wary and sharp-tongued. Mostly to humor his aunt, Frank pretended to woo the heiress, and to his surprise he found her rather good company. Miss Dunstable, ten years his senior and much more worldly-wise, soon uncovered his little plot. Thereafter they became the best of friends, and she acted as an adviser to Frank in his affair with Mary Thorne.

Meanwhile Sir Roger Scatcherd was in such poor health from excessive drinking that he decided to make his will, leaving everything to Louis Philippe, his equally alcoholic son. When Dr. Thorne learned the terms of the will, he told Sir Roger that Mary Scatcherd's child was still living. Sir Roger made her his second heir in the event of his son's death.

Otherwise matters were not going well for Mary. Lady Arabella, finding Frank's attachment for Mary unchanged, would not allow the girl to visit Greshamsbury. When Frank arrived home and became aware of the shabby treatment she had received, he was furious. But the family insisted that he had to marry wealth, particularly after his sister, who was to marry money, had been jilted.

Sir Roger was also in difficulties. Having discovered a fraud in his election, the committee unseated him, and the shock was too great for the old man. He went on one final drinking bout and died from the effects. Louis Philippe, having inherited the estate, also formed an attachment for Mary, but she remained true to Frank. Dr. Thorne's only hope for the happiness of Mary and Frank lay in the possible death of Louis Philippe. Meanwhile that young man was well on his way to fulfilling the doctor's half-wish. Having paid a visit to the squire for the purpose of foreclosing on some debts, Louis Philippe went on a drinking spree that rivaled any of his father's. Weak and very ill, he was finally sent home.

Soon afterward, in a stormy interview, Lady Arabella demanded that Mary end her engagement to Frank. Mary refused to break her promise, but she did ask the young man to release her because of the hopelessness of the situation in which they found themselves. Frank refused, insisting that they loved each other. Then it was that Louis Philippe died. Doctor Thorne jubilantly told Mary the news of her inheritance, news which opened the way for her marriage to Frank. With Mary now an heiress in her own right, not even the proud De Courcys could object to so excellent a match. For the first time in years an atmosphere of rejoicing hung over Greshamsbury Park.

DODSWORTH

Author: Sinclair Lewis (1885-1951)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The 1920's

Locale: United States and Europe

First published: 1929

Principal characters:

SAM DODSWORTH, an American manufacturer

FRAN DODSWORTH, his wife

KURT OBERSDORF, Fran's lover

EDITH CORTRIGHT, Sam's friend, later his fiancée

CLYDE LOCKERT, Fran's admirer

EMILY, the Dodsworths' daughter

BRENT, the Dodsworths' son

Critique:

Dodsworth is a successful novel in spite of its sprawling and sometimes rambling style. It describes convincingly the degeneration and unmasking of the shallow, snobbish Fran Dodsworth, and the disillusion and final rebellion of her idealistic husband. One of the last in the tradition of American novels on American materialism and European cultivation, the book contains brilliant insights into the relationships of the two cultures.

The Story:

In 1903, Sam Dodsworth married Fran Voelker whom he had met at the Canoe Club while he was assistant superintendent at the Zenith Locomotive works. Five years after their marriage Sam became vice-president and general manager of production for the Revelation Automobile Company. By 1925, the Dodsworths had two children, Emily, about to be married, and Brent, in school at Yale. When Sam sold his factory to the Unit Automotive DODSWORTH by Sinclair Lewis. By permission of the publishers, Harcourt, Brace and Co., Inc. Copyright 1929, by Harcourt, Brace and Co., Inc.

Company, they decided to go to Europe for a leisurely vacation, a second honeymoon.

The first night out on the S.S. Ultima, Major Clyde Lockert seated himself at Sam's table in the smoking room. Lockert, who said he was growing cocoa in British Guiana, quickly became friends with Fran Dodsworth, and while Sam looked on like an indulgent parent, he squired her about, censuring and selecting the new friends she made. He continued to see the Dodsworths after they arrived in London.

Fran was snobbishly pleased when he took them to see his cousins, Lord and Lady Herndon. Between them Fran and Lockert made Sam feel almost like an outsider. He was a failure at the dinner party the Herndons gave, for he knew nothing about cricket or polo, and he had no opinions about the Russian situation.

One evening Hurd, manager of the London branch of the Revelation Motor Company, invited Sam to a get-together, along with about thirty representatives of American firms. Sam was surprised to learn that few of them wanted to go back to the United States except, perhaps, for a visit. They all preferred the leisureliness, the freedom from imposed moral restraint, which their adopted land afforded. These arguments made Sam see Europe in a different light.

When he returned to the hotel, he found Fran in tears. Lockert had taken her out that evening, and on their return had tried to make love to her. Fran, ashamed of the situation in which she had placed herself and sure that Lockert would be laughing at her, asked that they leave for France as soon as possible. They started four days later.

France was a new experience for Sam Dodsworth. When Fran was willing to go sightseeing, he was able to see Paris and observe its people. When she chose to be fashionable and take tea at the Crillon with other American tourists, he was less fortunate. But the more he saw, the more convinced Sam became that he could not understand Frenchmen. In the back of his mind he was afraid that his inability to accept foreign ways, and Fran's willingness to adopt them, would finally drive them apart. He felt lonely for his old friend Tubby Pearson, president of the Zenith bank.

Before long Fran had many friends among expatriate Americans of the international set. With her constant visits to dressmakers and her portrait painter, her outings with the leisured young men who escorted her and her friends, she and Sam saw less and less of each other. When he went home for his college class reunion that summer, he left Fran to take a villa with one of her new friends. He was to join her again in the fall, so that they might go on to the Orient together.

Back in New York, Sam felt, at first, as if he had become a stranger to the life of noise and hurry which he had previously taken for granted. Nor was he interested in the newest model Revelation which had been, quite competently, developed without his aid. He discovered also that he and his son no longer had common ground. Brent was planning to sell bonds. The newly-married Emily, her father observed, was the very capable manager of her own home, and needed no assistance. Even Sam's best friend, Tubby Pearson, had gone on without him to new poker-playing and golfing companions.

At first his letters from Fran were lively and happy. Then she quarreled with the friend who shared her villa over one of their escorts, Arnold Israel, a Jew. Sam grew increasingly anxious as he realized that the man was trailing Fran from one resort to another and that their relationship was becoming increasingly more intimate. He made sailing reservations and cabled his wife to meet him in Paris.

Sam had no difficulty discovering that his wife had been unfaithful to him; she admitted as much during their stormy reunion in Paris. With the threat that he would divorce her for adultery if she did not agree to drop Israël, he forced her to leave for Spain with him the following day.

The Dodsworths wandered across Spain into Italy, and finally on to Germany and Berlin, and Sam had ample time to observe his wife. Increasingly he noted her self-centeredness, her pretentiousness, and his pity for her restlessness made him fonder of her.

At the home of the Biedners, Fran's cousins in Berlin, the Dodsworths met Kurt Obersdorf, a ruined Austrian nobleman. Kurt took them to places of interest in Berlin and became Fran's dancing companion.

When the news came that the Dodsworths were grandparents, for Emily now had a boy, they did not sail for home. In fact, they did not tell their friends of the baby's birth because Fran feared that as a grandmother she would seem old and faded to them. When Sam went to Paris to welcome Tubby Pearson and his wife, abroad for the first time, Fran remained in Berlin.

Sam and Tubby enjoyed themselves in Paris. Then Sam, driven by a longing to see his wife, flew back to Berlin. That night Fran announced that she and Kurt had decided to marry, and that she wanted a divorce. Sam agreed, on the condition that she wait a month before starting proceedings.

Sadly, Dodsworth left for Paris and later went on to Italy. While he was sitting on the piazza in Venice and reading one of Fran's letters, he saw Edith Cortright, a widow whom the Dodsworths had met during their earlier trip to Italy. Mrs. Cortright invited Sam home to tea with her, and on his second visit he told her about his separation from Fran.

Sam spent most of the summer with Edith and her Italian friends. He began to gain a new self-confidence when he found that he was liked and respected by these new acquaintances, who admired him and were satisfied with him as he was. He grew to love Edith, and they decided to return to America together. Then Sam received a letter from Fran telling him that she had dropped divorce proceedings because Kurt's mother objected to his marriage with a divorced American.

Without saying goodbye to Edith, Sam rejoined Fran, homeward bound. He tried patiently to share her unhappiness and loneliness. But before long Fran became her old self, implying that Sam had been at fault for the failure of their marriage and flirting with a young polo player aboard ship. After breakfast, one morning, Sam sent a wireless to Edith, making arrangements to meet her in Venice. When the boat docked in New York, Sam left his wife forever. Three days later he sailed again to Italy and Edith Cortright.

DOMBEY AND SON

Author: Charles Dickens (1812-1870)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1846-1848

Principal characters:

MR. DOMBEY, a rich London merchant

PAUL, his son

FLORENCE, his daughter

EDITH GRANGER, his second wife

MR. CARKER, his trusted agent

WALTER GAY, in love with Florence

Critique:

Dombey and Son, which appeared after Martin Chuzzlewit, was an effort by Dickens to regain popularity he had lost with the publication of his previous novel. Martin Chuzzlewit, which had heavily satirized America and Americans, had caused Dickens to lose a great deal of favor, a loss which greatly irritated Dickens, who was by that time in something of a competition for the public's attention with another great Victorian novelist, William Makepeace Thackeray. Dombey and Son is also a milestone in Dickens' work in that he placed the story at a higher social level than he had done in his previous novels. For the first time he indicated an interest and a sympathy in the upper middle classes and the aristocracy. The story is a very serious one, involving the downfall of a dignified and pompous merchant and his learning of the power of love as compared to the lesser power of money. In typical Dickensian style, however, there is a whole catalog of characters to provide a humorous background.

The Story:

Mr. Dombey was a stiff and dignified man who rarely showed emotion. But the birth of an infant son, who was named Paul, was cause for rejoicing, as Mr. Dombey had longed many years for a child who would fill the second part of the mercantile firm of Dombey and Son. Even the fact that Mrs. Dombey died shortly after the boy's birth did not particularly concern him; he was centered entirely on the little infant who he hoped would someday take over the business. Mr. Dombey also had a daughter, Florence, but she meant almost nothing to him, for she could not take a place in the firm.

Little Paul was first given over to a wet nurse, but the woman proved to be unreliable and was dismissed. After her dismissal little Paul was cared for by Mr. Dombey's sister and a friend of hers. Despite their vigilant care, however, little Paul's health was poor. He was listless and never cared to play. At last Mr. Dombey made arrangements to have him sent to a home, together with his sister, at Brighton, there to gain the benefits of the sea air.

Paul, in spite of his father's dislike for little Florence, loved his sister very much, and they were constant companions. Paul's love for Florence only made Mr. Dombey dislike the girl more, for the father felt that his daughter was coming between himself and his son.

One weekend, while Mr. Dombey was visiting at Brighton, Walter Gay, a young clerk in the firm, came to the inn where Mr. Dombey and his children were having dinner. Some time before the clerk had rescued Florence from an old female thief. Now his uncle was about to become a bankrupt, and Walter had come to ask for a loan to save his uncle's shop. Mr. Dombey let little Paul, who was then six years old, make the decision. Paul asked Florence what he should do; she told him to lend the money, and he did.

Shortly afterward, little Paul was placed in a private school at Brighton, where he was to be educated as quickly as possible. The pace of his studies proved too much for him, and before the year was out his health broke down. He never seemed to grow any better, even after his father took him home to London. Before many months had elapsed, little Paul died, mourned by his father and his sister, though for different reasons.

Mr. Dombey took his son's death as a personal blow of fate at his plans. His sister and her friend became so concerned about him that they planned to have him take a trip with Major Bagstock, a retired officer, to Leamington. While they were there, they met Edith Granger, a young widow whose mother the major had known. Mr. Dombey, seeing in Mrs. Granger a beautiful, well-bred young woman who would grace his household, immediately began to court her. Mrs. Granger, coaxed by an aged mother who was concerned for her daughter's welfare, finally accepted Mr. Dombey, although she was not in love with him.

Florence Dombey had seen young Walter Gay several times since their meeting at Brighton, and after her brother's death she came to look upon young Walter as a substitute brother, despite his lowly station. Then their friendship was broken temporarily when Mr. Dombey sent Walter on a mission to the West Indies. Weeks passed, but no word was heard of the ship on which he had sailed. Everyone believed that it had sunk and that Walter had been drowned.

After Mrs. Granger had accepted Mr. Dombey's suit, they began to make plans for the wedding and for reopening the Dombey house in London. It was at the house that Edith Granger first met Florence. The two immediately became fast friends, even though Mr. Dombey disliked his daughter and made it plain that he did not want his wife to become too fond of the girl.

Mr. Dombey's second marriage was unsuccessful from the start. Edith Granger was too proud to give in to Mr. Dombey's attempts to dictate to her and to his claim upon her as a piece of merchandise, and she resisted him in every way. Dombey, who was too dignified to argue with her, sent his business manager, Mr. Carker, to tell his wife that he was dissatisfied with her conduct. Carker warned Mrs. Dombey that, unless she obeyed Mr. Dombey, Florence would be the one to suffer. Edith Dombey then became outwardly cool to her stepdaughter, but still she resisted her husband. Mr. Carker was once more dispatched to tell her that Mr. Dombey meant to be obeyed in everything.

The wife then openly revolted. She felt that she could get complete revenge by running off with Carker, her husband's most trusted employee, who was also so far below Mr. Dombey socially that the blow would hurt even more. After she and the employee disappeared, Florence was only rebuffed in her attempts to comfort her father. When he struck her, she ran away from the house and went to the shop owned by Walter Gay's uncle, Sol Gills. There she found that Gills had disappeared and that an old ship's captain named Cuttle was in charge. Captain Cuttle recognized Florence and took her in.

Mr. Dombey at last learned the whereabouts of his wife and Carker from a young woman whom Carker had seduced and deserted. Mr. Dombey followed the pair to France but failed to locate them. Carker, meanwhile, returned to England. Mrs. Dombey had refused to have anything to do with him. She had her revenge, she said, in ruining him and her husband. Carker, trying to escape into the English countryside, met Mr. Dombey at a railway station. An accident occurred, and Carker was killed by a train.

Florence, staying with Captain Cuttle, hoped that Walter would return, even though everyone had given him up for dead. Her faith was at last rewarded. Walter had been picked up by a China-bound vessel and so had not had the opportunity to send back word of his safety. Shortly after his return he revealed to Florence that he no longer felt as a brother toward her, since she had become a woman during his absence. Realizing that she, too, had fallen in love with him, she accepted his proposal. Walter had found work as clerk on a ship, and after their marriage they sailed on a ship bound for the Orient.

The failure of his marriage had broken Mr. Dombey's spirit, and he took little interest in his firm from that time on. His lack of interest was unfortunate, for the firm had been placed in a difficult position by certain dealings of Carker's while he had been Dombey's trusted agent. As a result of Carker's mismanagement and Dombey's lack of interest, the firm went bankrupt. After the bankruptcy Mr. Dombey stayed alone in his house, saw no one, and gradually drifted into despair.

On the very day that Mr. Dombey had decided to commit suicide, Florence returned to London from the Orient with her year-old son, who was named Paul, after his dead uncle. Florence and the baby cheered up Mr. Dombey, and he began to take a new interest in life. Reconciled to his daughter, he realized that she had always loved him, even though he had been exceedingly cruel to her. Walter Gay succeeded in business, and all of them lived together happily, for his misfortunes had made a changed man of the almost indomitable Mr. Dombey.

DON CARLOS

Author: Johann Christoph Friedrich von Schiller (1759-1805)

Type of plot: Historical tragedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Spain

First presented: 1787

Principal characters:

DON CARLOS, heir to the Spanish throne

PHILIP II, King of Spain and Don Carlos' father

ELIZABETH DE VALOIS, Queen of Spain, Don Carlos' stepmother

MARQUIS DE POSA, Don Carlos' friend

DOMINGO, confessor to the king

DUKE OF ALVA, Philip II's trusted general and minister

PRINCESS DE EBOLI, attendant to the queen

Critique:

This drama by Schiller was based chiefly on a historical novel of the same title published by the Abbe de Saint-Réal at Paris in 1672. The play, an exceedingly long one, was written in blank verse and represented a distinct advance over Schiller's earlier dramas, which had been written in prose. Within this play the reader finds Schiller's own ideas of humanity and liberty expressed in words spoken by Don Carlos and the Marquis de Posa. Although the title indicates that the hero was to be Don Carlos, heir to the Spanish throne, the marquis usurps the central position, as he did in Schiller's own mind while the play was being written. This was Schiller's last play before he turned to writing in the fields of aesthetics, ethics, and literary criticism.

The Story:

Philip II of Spain did not wish to trust his son, Don Carlos, with any of the crown's affairs, even though Don Carlos was twenty-three years old. Philip's ostensible reason was that Don Carlos was too hot-blooded. Probably the real reason was Philip's fear of his son, fear springing from the fact that Philip himself had forced his father, Charles V, from the throne. To aggravate the differences and the coldness between the king and his son, Philip was married to Elizabeth de Valois, with whom Don Carlos had been in love. Indeed, both France and Spain had given permission for the courtship between the two, until Philip had decided to take Elizabeth for himself.

Don Carlos hid his love for his stepmother until the Marquis de Posa returned from Flanders, at which time Don Carlos revealed his secret to his friend. The marquis was horrified, but swore upon their boyhood friendship to help the prince, if the prince in turn would try to help the people of Flanders escape from the heavy and tyrannic policies forced upon them by Philip through his emissary, the Duke of Alva.

Stating that he could be more humane than the duke, Don Carlos went to his father and pleaded that he be made the king's agent in Flanders. Philip, refusing to listen, sent the duke over Don Carlos' protests. He did, however, ask the duke to be more friendly with the prince. When the duke went to speak to the prince, he found Don Carlos in the queen's antechamber. They had words and fought, until the queen intervened.

From one of the queen's pages Don Carlos received a mysterious note and a key to a room in the queen's apartments. Hoping against hope that the queen had sent it to him, he went to the room, an act for which his jealous father would have punished him severely. He found, instead of the queen, the Princess de Eboli. Having fallen in love with the prince, she had sent him the note. Loving Don Carlos, she asked his help in evading the importunities of the king, who sought her for his mistress. Don Carlos repelled the advances of the princess and thus incurred her anger. When he left, he took with him a letter which the king had sent to her. Hoping to use the letter as proof that the king was a tyrant and an evil man, he showed it to the Marquis de Posa. The marquis tore up the letter, saying that it was too dangerous a weapon and might hurt Don Carlos and the queen more than the king.

In the meantime the Princess de Eboli, infuriated at Don Carlos' refusal of her love, went to Domingo, the king's confessor and pander, and told him of her decision to become Philip's mistress. She also told about her meeting with the prince and his obvious hope that he was to meet the queen. That information pleased Domingo and the Duke of Alva, who wanted to rid the kingdom of both Don Carlos and the queen.

With the help of the princess, the duke and the confessor laid a trap for Don Carlos and the queen. Becoming suspicious of the conspirators' motives, Philip called in a man he thought would be completely honest in solving the problem. The man was, ironically, Don Carlos' friend, the Marquis de Posa. He quickly gained the king's confidence, even though some of his religious ideas were heretical, and he did his best to help Don Carlos. Having to work in secret, the marquis seemed to Don Carlos to be a traitor to his friend. Other courtiers reported to Don Carlos that a file of letters he had given to the marquis had been seen in the king's chamber. What Don Carlos heard was true, for the marquis had found it necessary to tell the truth about the letters to clear Don Carlos of the charge of illicit relations with the queen.

Don Carlos, not knowing the truth concerning the marquis' activities, went to the Princess de Eboli to seek her help. The Marquis de Posa, learning of Don Carlos' visit to the princess, entered immediately after the prince. Using the authority given him by the king to arrest Don Carlos, the marquis had him put incommunicado in prison, lest he talk to others who could do him harm. The easiest way to keep Don Carlos safe would have been to murder the Princess de Eboli, but the marquis did not have the heart to kill her, even when his dagger was at her breast.

Instead of assuming the guilt of murder, the marquis resolved to make himself the victim. The king had been convinced that Don Carlos and the queen had been involved in a treasonable plot against the crown in Flanders. To clear them, the marquis sent a letter he knew would be put into the king's hands. In it he stated that he, the marquis, was the real conspirator. Afterward the marquis had only enough time to go to the prison and reveal his true actions to Don Carlos. As he spoke, a shot was fired through the gratings by an assassin sent by Philip.

Popular wrath and the indignation of the grandees forced Philip to release his son, but Don Carlos refused to leave the prison until his father came in person to give him back his sword and his freedom. When Philip arrived, in the company of the grandees of the council, Don Carlos confronted him with the marquis' corpse and told him that he had caused the murder of an innocent man. Philip, seeing the truth of the accusation, and filled with remorse, became ill in the prison and was carried away by the grandees.

A friend reported to Don Carlos that the king and the Duke of Alva had been enraged by public reaction in favor of the imprisoned prince. Hoping to lift the yoke of tyranny his father and the Duke of Alva had placed upon that country and its people, Don Carlos decided to leave Spain immediately and go to Flanders. Before he left, he planned to see the queen once more and tell her of his plans. Donning a mask and the garb of a monk, he went through a secret passage to the wing of the castle in which the queen lived. There he went through open corridors to her rooms, able to do so because of a superstition that Charles V, garbed in like manner, haunted the castle. The superstitious soldiers let him pass.

The king, meanwhile, had sent for the Cardinal Inquisitor. Asked for his advice, the churchman rebuked Philip for his waywardness in letting the heretic marquis escape proper punishment for so long and then having him killed for political reasons. They discussed also the heresy of the young prince, and Philip resolved to turn his son over to the Inquisition for punishment. In person, Philip led the cardinal to the queen's apartments, for the king, having heard reports of the ghost, guessed who really was beneath the disguise. Don Carlos was found with the queen and handed over to the authorities of the Inquisition.

Principal characters:

GREGOR MELEKHOV, a soldier

PIOTRA, his brother

AKSINIA, his mistress

NATALIA, his wife

KOSHEVOI, a Communist

Critique:

The Don Flows Home to the Sea is a sequel to And Quiet Flows the Don. Here the fortunes of the Cossacks are lengthily and vividly portrayed after the peace with the Central Powers in 1917 up to the dominance of the Reds in 1920. Although The Don Flows Home to the Sea, published in two parts in 1933 and 1938, was written under the Soviet regime, the insurgent Cossacks are sympathetically portrayed. The beginnings of Soviet autocratic ruthlessness are seen as base and inhuman but probably inevitable. In scope the work is vast. It deserves to be ranked among the best Soviet productions.

The Story:

The Germans were still carrying off white flour, butter, and cattle. Every day their trucks rolled from the Don through the Ukraine. Various sections of Russia, however, were fighting each other. To the north of the Don Basin the White Army was driving back the Bolsheviks. Most of the Cossacks were in the White forces, although some were with the Reds.

Gregor and Piotra Melekhov were leaders in the White Army. Piotra, the elder brother, was decidedly anti-Red and waged battle viciously. Gregor was of two minds; perhaps the Reds would bring stable government. Gregor was opposed to pillaging civilians and killing prisoners. As best he could he kept his men in hand. When his father and his sister-in-law Daria visited him at the front, he was furious when they took home a wagon load of loot.

Back in Tatarsk the Whites were trying to win over the Cossacks to full support of the insurgent cause. In the spring of 1918 there had been a great defection of northern Cossacks to the Reds, and the southern Cossacks were only half-hearted in throwing back the Red tide. Koshevoi, a Red sympathizer, was caught when he returned to his home in Tatarsk. His companions were killed, but he was let off to join the drovers in the steppes.

Eugene Listnitsky, a rich Cossack from the district, spent a furlough with a brother officer. Eugene was attracted to Olga, the man's wife. After the officer was killed, Listnitsky married the widow. When he got home, invalidated out with a missing arm, Aksinia, his former mistress, was still there, waiting for him. Eugene wanted nothing more to do with her after his marriage. He made love to her briefly under a currant bush and offered her money to go away. Aksinia was pained but stayed on in service. Her husband Stepan, miraculously alive after years in prison, tried in vain to get her to come home.

Gradually the Cossacks returned home; farmers, they had to till the land. The advancing Red Army passed through the village of Tatarsk. After them came the political men and the Red government took charge. Gregor, glad to be home, had little longing now for Aksinia, who had been his mistress before she became Eugene's. After years of fighting Germans and Reds, he was content to be a little reconciled to Natalia, his wife.

Koshevoi was put in charge of the government of Tatarsk, and soon Stockman, a professional Red, came to help him. They began gradually, seizing a man here and there and spiriting him off to death or imprisonment. They wanted to arrest both Piotra and Gregor. A little afraid to take Piotra, who was friendly with Fomin, a Red commander, they did decide to take Gregor. Learning of their intentions in time, Gregor left Tatarsk and escaped.

As the political imprisonments and executions increased, the Cossacks revolted. Their wrongs were so great that in a comparatively short time the rebellion was succeeding. Piotra was made a commander immediately. He was a ferocious fighter and ruthless to the Reds. In a skirmish, however, he was captured by the enemy. Koshevoi, now a Communist, stepped out from a patrol and killed Piotra without compunction.

Gregor, after serving under Piotra, rose to command a division. He was cold with fury toward the Communists and had the reputation of never keeping live prisoners for long. Yet when the Cossacks began to imprison Red sympathizers from among the civilians, he dissented strongly. On one occasion he even forced open a prison and released old men and women who were suspected of helping the Reds.

Stockman and the others who had been the political rulers of Tatarsk were captured when a Red regiment deserted. Stockman was killed outright, and the others were returned to run a terrible gantlet at Tatarsk. Daria herself killed the man she thought responsible for the death of Piotra, her husband. Koshevoi was unsuspected at the time.

Daria recovered from Piotra's death rather speedily and soon was carrying on various affairs. When Gregor came home on furlough, she even made tentative love to him. But Gregor was tired from fighting and carousing, and he still had bitter memories of Aksinia. Natalia, who had heard of Gregor's conduct on his sprees, was cold to him. The day before he was to return to the army, Gregor met Aksinia at the Don. He thought of their former love and of her affair with Listnitsky. But the old love was not dead, and he took Aksinia again.

The Soviet government, realizing by May of 1919 that they had a formidable task on their hands, increased their forces and slowly pushed back the insurgent Cossacks. The rebels retreated toward the Don, taking with them crowds of refugees. At last the Cossacks crossed the river and held their positions.

The Reds came through Tatarsk as Natalia was recovering from typhus. Koshevoi was with them; he was indignant that Dunia, Gregor's young sister, was across the Don, for he had long been in love with her. Koshevoi's own family was missing and his father's house had been destroyed. He took pride in firing the houses of all the rich landowners in and near Tatarsk.

Gregor, busy as a division commander, took time to send for Aksinia and she came to live near him. Stepan returned, to her embarrassment, and although she did not take him back as her husband, they preserved appearances among the refugee families.

With the arrival of the White Army, the Reds were driven back. Now that the insurgents were incorporated into a regular army, Gregor was demoted to the rank of squadron commander, for he was an uneducated man. The Whites sent punitive patrols to punish those who had aided the Reds. To the horror of the Melekhovs, all of Koshevoi's relatives were executed. Daria caught syphilis and drowned herself. Natalia, learning of Gregor's return to Aksinia, refused to bear him another child. She had an unskillful abortion performed and bled to death.

With increasing Red pressure and desertion from the Cossack ranks, the White Army was going down in defeat. Gregor and Aksinia fled south to try to board a ship. On the way Aksinia fell ill with typhus and had to be left behind. She later made her way back to Tatarsk. Gregor could not leave the country. With nothing better to do, he joined the Reds and fought valiantly against the Poles.

In spite of family protests Dunia married Koshevoi, now commissar of the village. When Gregor returned home, Koshevoi at once set in motion plans to arrest him. But Gregor again escaped, joining up with Fomin, a deserter from the Red Army. Fomin tried to rally the Cossacks to revolt against the Communists for levying heavy taxes and collecting grain. The revolt, however, was short-lived. The rebels were killed, and only Gregor came back to Tatarsk. This time, when Gregor fled, he took Aksinia with him, but she was killed by a pursuing Red patrol. Gregor threw his arms into the Don and came back to his house. Only his son was left to him now and he would fight no more.

DON JUAN TENORIO

Author: José Zorrilla y Moral (1817-1893)

Type of plot: Fantastic-religious comedy

Time of plot: c. 1545

Locale: Seville, Spain

First presented: 1844

Principal characters:

DON JUAN TENORIO, a nobleman of Seville

DON DIEGO TENORIO, his father

DON LUIS MEJIA, another Andalusian gentleman

DON GONZALO DE ULLOA, Comendador of Calatrava

INES DE ULLOA, his daughter

ANA DE PANTOJA, betrothed to Mejía

MARCOS CIUTTI, servant of Don Juan

Critique:

One of the best examples of Spain's romantic theater is this play in seven acts, four of which take place during a single night, the remaining three about five years later. The drama was written in twenty days for a theater owner threatened with bankruptcy. Though full of exaggeration and melodramatic improbabilities that even its author ridiculed, it has been popular in Spain since the time of its first presentation. Based on a well-loved Spanish legend, spiritedly written in excellent and varied poetry, traditionally it is produced all over the Spanish-speaking world for All Saint's Day, the first of November. Audiences see in it not only a play about a rollicking adventurer whom they would like to imitate, but also a story with a meaning deeper than that which appears on the surface. The implication of the drama seems to be that since God's love is infinite, a man can sin as much as he likes, provided at the end he wins the love of a pure woman. This combination of the romantic with the mystic has perennial appeal to the Latin temperament.

The Story:

It was the carnival season in Seville, and the Laurel Tavern was a strange place in which to find gallant young Don Juan Tenorio, when the streets outside were filled with masked merrymakers. But he was there with his servant, Marcos Ciutti, to keep a rendezvous with Don Luis Mejía, another gallant. One year before each had wagered that he could do the most harm in the next twelve months. That night they were to decide the bet.

Don Gonzalo de Ulloa, father of the girl whom Don Juan hoped to marry, went masked to the inn, for he wanted to hear with his own ears an account of the wild and villainous deeds attributed to his prospective son-in-law. Don Diego, Juan's father, joined him, masked as well. Several officers, friends of Don Juan and Mejía, were also loitering in the tavern to learn the outcome of the wager, which had been talked about in the city for months. Mejía appeared promptly, just as the cathedral clock was striking eight.

With good-humored boasting the rivals compared lists of the men they had slain in duels and the women they had cruelly deceived during the year. Don Juan was easily the victor. Because his roster lacked only two types of women, a nun and the bride of a friend, he wagered that he could add both to his list within a week. Fearing that his rival had an eye on Ana de Pantoja, whom he was planning to marry, Mejía sent his servant to call the police. Angered by the evil deeds of which Don Juan had boasted, the comendador announced that he would never consent to the young scoundrel's marriage with his daughter Ines. Instead, the girl would be kept safe in a convent. Don Diego also disowned his son.

A patrol appeared to arrest Don Juan on Mejía's accusations. Other guards summoned by Ciutti took Mejía into custody at the same time.

Through the influence of powerful friends Mejía soon had himself freed. He hurried at once to the house of Ana de Pantoja, where he persuaded a servant to let him into the house at ten o'clock that night. His purpose was to keep Don Juan from attempting an entrance. When Ana appeared at the balcony, he told her his plan and got her acquiescence to it.

Don Juan, also released from custody, overheard their conversation, which gave him the idea of impersonating his rival in order to get into Ana's room. Ciutti had already bribed Ana's duenna to secure the key to the outer door. To make sure that Mejía was out of the way, Ciutti also hired several men to impersonate the police patrol. These bravos seized Mejía and bound him.

Don Juan next interviewed Brígida, the duenna of Ines, and bribed her to deliver a note to the girl in the convent. When the old woman reported that her charge was already in love with Don Juan, whom she had never seen, the gallant decided that he had time to go to the convent and abduct her before the hour for him to appear at Ana's house.

Meanwhile, at the convent, Ines listened abashed as the abbess praised the girl's godliness. Perhaps she had once been like that; now she no longer looked forward to taking holy orders. Half-frightened, half-eager, she kept thinking of Don Juan. The appearance of Brígida with the note upset her still more, so that when Don Juan himself appeared suddenly at the door of her cell she collapsed in a faint. In her unconscious state it was easy for him to carry her off. Don Gonzalo, worried by the young man's boasting and reports of conversations between him and Brígida, arrived at the convent too late to save his daughter.

Ines remained unconscious while Don Juan took her to his house beside the Guadalquivir River. When she came to, Brígida lied to her charge, saying that Don Juan had saved the girl's life when the convent caught on fire.

Later Don Juan returned, after he had successfully entered Ana's room. Mejía, seeking revenge, came in pursuit. Don Gonzalo, hoping to rescue his daughter, also appeared at the house. Enraged by their insults, Don Juan shot Don Gonzalo and stabbed Mejía. Then he jumped into the river to escape from police who were hammering at his front door. Abandoned by Don Juan, Ines returned to the convent and died of grief.

Five years later a sculptor was putting the finishing touches to the Tenorio pantheon. On Don Diego's orders the family mansion had been torn down and the grounds had been turned into a cemetery for his son's victims. Lifelike statues of the three chief ones, Mejía, Don Gonzalo, and Ines, gleamed in the moonlight. Patiently the sculptor explained his labors to a stranger who finally terrified the craftsman by revealing himself as Don Juan.

Repentant, Don Juan knelt before Ines' monument and begged her to intercede with God for mercy. When he looked up, her statue had disappeared from its pedestal and Ines herself stood beside him, sent reincarnate from Heaven either to bring him back with her to salvation or to be damned with him throughout eternity; he had until dawn to choose their fate. Don Juan, unable to believe that what was happening was real, thought it a trick of crafty priests.

When two officers who five years before had witnessed the outcome of his bet with Mejía came into the graveyard, he laughed at their fear of ghosts; fear had no entry to his heart. After inviting his old acquaintances to have supper with him and hear the story of his adventures, with rash bravado he also extended his invitation to the statue of Don Gonzalo. Only the comendador's presence at the table, Don Juan said, would convince him of a life beyond the grave. The statue kept its stony silence.

While the trio sat drinking at the table, they heard the sound of knocking, each time nearer, though all the doors were bolted. Then into the room stalked the statue of Don Gonzalo, to tell the skeptic about the life eternal that could be realized through God's mercy. The officers fainted, but Don Juan was so courteous a host that before the statue disappeared through the wall it invited him to a similar banquet in the cemetery.

Still unconvinced that one moment of repentance could wipe out thirty years of sin, Don Juan refused to be moved when Ines appeared to persuade him to make the right choice. Half believing that the whole affair was a joke concocted by the sleeping officers, he shook them back to consciousness and accused them of using him for their sport. They in turn charged him with drugging them. The argument ended in challenges to a duel.

In the half light of early morning the statues of Ines and Don Gonzalo were still missing from the pantheon of the Tenorio family when Don Juan, melancholy because he had killed his old friends in the duel, appeared to keep his appointment. His knock at the comendador's tomb transformed it into a banquet table that parodied his own bountiful spread of the night before. Snakes and ashes were the foods, illuminated by the purging fire of God, and ghostly guests crowded around the board. Although death was on his way, Don Juan still refused to repent as Don Gonzalo's statue once more told him about the redeeming power of Heaven.

As Don Juan's funeral procession approached, Don Gonzalo seized the sinner's arm and prepared to drag him off to Hell. At that moment Don Juan raised his free arm toward Heaven. Ines appeared and she and Don Juan, both saved, sank together into a bed of flowers scattered by angels. Flames, symbolizing their souls, mounted to Heaven.

DON SEGUNDO SOMBRA

Author: Ricardo Güiraldes (1882-1927)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: Argentina

First published: 1926

Principal characters:

DON SEGUNDO SOMBRA, a gaucho

FABIO, a young waif

DON LEANDRO GALVÁN, a rancher

PEDRO BARRALES, a gaucho

PAULA, a pretty young woman, loved by Fabio

Critique:

Don Segundo Sombra: Shadows on the Pampas has been called the South American counterpart of Huckleberry Finn. Like the hero of Mark Twain's novel, Fabio wanders on his own through youth in a new country, giving the author a chance not only to tell a story but also to present a vivid and varied documentation of details about the people, the customs, and the countryside. In Argentina itself, the book was immediately popular. It and the earlier gaucho epic, Martín Fierro, are the best narratives dealing with the gaucho, the South American cowboy. The hero of Güiraldes' novel was drawn from a real-life gaucho whom the author had known and loved in his own childhood on his father's ranch, La Portena, in the province of Buenos Aires. The novel reflects a pastoral form of life that has all but disappeared in Argentina, and the story will probably fascinate later generations much as Owen Wister's picturesque narrative of the North American cowboy, The Virginian, has caught the fancy of post-frontier readers.

The Story:

Fabio was a young lad who lived with his two maiden aunts in a small Argentine village. He disliked his aunts, who felt, in their turn, that he was simply a bother. He was not sure that the two women were truly his relatives, for they paid him little heed as long as he gave them no trouble. Don Fabio Cáceres, a rancher, occasionally came to see the boy and take him into the country for a day, but the man ceased coming about Fabio's eleventh year.

Fabio grew up to be a cheeky youngster who showed off for the worst element of the town. He knew all the gossip and spent most of his time hanging about the saloons; no one seemed to care that he never went to school. The village loafers hinted that he was an illegitimate, unwanted child. At best, he seemed destined to be a ne'er-do-well who carried a chip on his shoulder in defiance of the rest of the world.

One night a gaucho rode into the town as Fabio was going homeward from fishing. The man impressed the boy at sight, and a little later Fabio earned the gaucho's interest by warning him of an ambush laid by a knife-wielding bully. The kind words spoken by the gaucho, Don Segundo, went to the boy's heart, and Fabio immediately decided to follow the man when he left town. Gathering together his meager possessions, which fortunately included a saddle and two ponies, Fabio went quietly away without telling anyone where he was going, in order to escape his hated aunts. He rode to the ranch belonging to Don Leandro Galván, where he knew Don Segundo was going to spend a few days breaking wild horses for riding.

When he arrived, the boy applied for work and was accepted. By the time Don Segundo was ready to leave the ranch on a cattle drive Fabio had convinced Don Leandro and Don Segundo that he was a willing worker, and they let Fabio go with the other gauchos on half pay. At the end of the drive Fabio was well along in his apprenticeship as a gaucho.

For five years Fabio continued under the tutelage of Don Segundo. Traveling from ranch to ranch, they worked for a number of landowners. From the older man Fabio learned to care for himself and his horses, to work cattle under various conditions, to live courageously, to get along with all kinds of people, and to have a good time singing songs, dancing, and telling stories. It was more than a way of making a living that the man passed on to the boy; it was an entire culture, a culture as old as the cattle industry and in some respects even older, going back as it did to the culture of Spain.

There were many incidents in their wanderings, including the time that Fabio won a large number of pesos by picking the winning bird in a cockfight when everyone else bet against the bird. That happened in the town of Navarro, a town which remained a lucky place in young Fabio's mind. He remembered also a long drive with cattle to a ranch on the seashore. There Fabio found a country he detested and a young woman he loved, as well as a great store of bad luck. He had picked up quite a respectable string of horses, the tools of the gaucho's trade, and he was very proud of them. But in working the cattle at the seashore ranch two of the horses were injured, much to the young gaucho's disgust. One of them was badly gored by a bull, and when Fabio came across the bull one evening while exploring with another young man he vowed to break its neck. He lassoed the beast and broke its neck with the shock, but in doing so he injured himself severely, breaking several bones.

While Fabio remained at the ranch convalescing from his injuries he fell in love, he thought, with Paula, a pretty young girl who lived on the place. Unfortunately, she led him on and also the rather stupid son of the rancher. The other lad took advantage of Fabio's crippled arm and attacked him with a knife. Fabio, not wanting to injure the owner's son, to fight over a woman, or to violate the father's hospitality, avoided the other fellow's thrusts until they became deadly. Then with a quick thrust Fabio slashed the boy's forehead slightly, taking the will to fight out of him very quickly. Paula, over whom the fight began, rebuked the crippled Fabio. Disgusted at her and at himself, Fabio, crippled as he was, mounted his horse and rode away to rejoin Don Segundo, who was working at a nearby ranch until Fabio could be ready to travel.

Don Segundo and Fabio happened into a small village on a day when people had gathered from miles around to race horses. Fabio bet and lost a hundred pesos, then another hundred, and finally the third and last hundred he possessed.

Still not satisfied that he was a hopeless loser, he gambled five of his horses and lost them as well. He came out of the afternoon's activity a sad young man.

He and Don Segundo were hired to trail a herd of cattle from a ranch near the village to the city to be butchered. It was a long, hard drive, even for experienced gauchos. It was made even more difficult for Fabio by the fact that he had only three horses, for the animals soon became fatigued from the work of carrying him and working the cattle on the road. When the herd stopped to rest one afternoon, Fabio decided to see if he could somehow get another horse or two.

While looking about he found Pedro Barrales, a gaucho who had traveled with him and Don Segundo several times before. Pedro Barrales had a letter addressed to Señor Fabio Cáceres, a letter which he gave to Fabio. The lad looked blankly at the letter, not believing it was addressed to him, for he thought he had no surname. Don Segundo opened the letter to find that the maiden aunts had been truly Fabio's relatives and that Don Fabio Cáceres who had visited him at his aunts' home was really his father, from whom he had inherited a fortune and a large, well-stocked ranch. The news saddened Fabio because he saw that it would take him away from the life he loved. He was angered, too, because he had been left so long under the impression that his parentage was one to be ashamed of.

Acting upon the good advice of Don Segundo, Fabio returned to his native town, however, and from there to the ranch where he had begun work under Don Leandro Galván, who had now become his guardian. When Don Segundo agreed to remain with him for three years on his own ranch, Fabio was willing to settle down. But the three years passed all too swiftly, and at the end of that time Fabio was exceedingly sad when Don Segundo, answering the gaucho's call to wander, rode away.

Seldom is the literary man a political leader, but Rómulo Gallegos is an exception to that rule. He was one of the founders of the Democratic Action Party in Venezuela in 1941 and was nominated by that party for the Venezuelan presiof Venezuela. Gallegos' national pride in his country and his people is reflected in his fiction. Although his fiction, like most of the books written in Latin America, is little known in the United States, it has a high reputation with readers who have come to know it either in Spanish or in translation.

The Story:

The Altamira ranch was a vast estate in the wildest section of the Arauca River basin of Venezuela, a ranch that had been established early in the history of the cattle business of that South American country. Late in the nineteenth century, however, it had been divided into two parts by the joint heirs of one of the owners. One part retained the old name and went to the male heir of the Luzardo family. The other part, going to a daughter who had married a Barquero, took its name from the new owner. As the years went by the two families carried on a feud which killed most of the men on both sides. In the years of the Spanish-American War, the owner of Altamira and his elder son quarreled; the father killed the son and then starved himself to death. Doña Luzardo took her only remaining son and went to Caracas, there to rear him in a more civilized atmosphere.

Years went by, and finally the son, Santos Luzardo decided to sell the ranch, which had been allowed to deteriorate to almost nothing under irresponsible overseers. In order to set a price upon his property he went into the back country to see it for himself. On his arrival he found that the neighboring ranch of the Barqueros had fallen into the hands of Doña Barbara, a mestiza who had been the mistress of the real owner before she ran him off his own property. Doña Barbara was in the process of taking over Altamira ranch with the help of several henchmen, including Don Balbino, the overseer of Altamira ranch. Santos decided to keep the ranch and try to make it a prosperous business, if he could only keep it out of Doña Barbara's hands.

To help him, Santos had a handful of loyal cowboys who had known him as a child, including Antonio, a cowboy who had been his playmate years before. Santos Luzardo's first move was to end the feud between himself and the Barqueros. He found Lorenzo Barquero living in a cabin in a swamp, the only land his mistress had not taken from him. After making his peace with Lorenzo and with his illegitimate daughter Marisela, Santos took them to live at Altamira ranch. Marisela was as beautiful as her mother, Doña Barbara, and Santos wished to retrieve her from barbarity.

Most of the cattle had been stolen from Altamira ranch, until only about a hundred head were left. But Antonio, the loyal cowboy, had seen to it that many hundreds more had been allowed to stray into wild country in order to save them from the depredations of Doña Barbara and Señor Danger, an American who had begun as a squatter and who was carving his own ranch out of Altamira land. Don Balbino, the treacherous overseer, was immediately discharged. Since he had been working for Doña Barbara and was her lover, he sought the mestiza's protection.

Santos, who had been trained as a lawyer, decided first to try legal means in order to repossess part of his ranch. He went to the local magistrate and through his knowledge of the law forced that official to call in Doña Barbara and Señor Danger. They were told to permit a roundup of his cattle and to help him, since their herds were intermingled with those from Altamira. They were also told to take action with respect to fences. Danger had to build fences, for according to the law he had too few cattle to let them run wild. Doña Barbara was to help build a boundary fence between her ranch and Altamira. Surprisingly, she took the decisions with good grace. Her henchmen were completely surprised, for previously she had ridden roughshod over all opposition. The answer lay in the fact that she was secretly in love with Santos Luzardo, and she thought she could command his love and his property by her beauty.

As weeks of deadening ranch routine passed, Santos was glad that he had brought Marisela to his house, for his efforts to teach her culture kept him from losing touch with civilization. Although his interest in her was only that of a friend and tutor, Marisela had fallen in love with the rancher.

Along the Arauca River there were thousands of herons. When the birds were moulting, the people of Altamira went out to collect the plumes and gathered fifty pounds of the valuable feathers, which were sent with two of the cowboys to market. Santos intended to use the money from the sale to fence his boundaries. On their way to market the cowboys were murdered and the feathers stolen. Their loss and the failure of the authorities to track down the culprit caused a great change in Santos. He determined to take the law into his own hands and to match violence with violence when he found it necessary.

His first act was to have three of Doña Barbara's henchmen captured and sent off to prison, for they had been long wanted for a number of crimes. A short time later he received word from Doña Barbara, who was pulled in two ways by her love for him and by her wish for power, that he would find in a certain canyon the thief who had taken the feathers. Santos went in the night and killed the Wizard, Doña Barbara's most trusted and bloodthirsty henchman. Meanwhile Don Balbino, the treacherous overseer who had been in charge of Altamira and who had been Doña Barbara's lover, became distasteful to her. She had him killed after discovering that it was he who had stolen the feathers. To aid Santos, she threw on Don Balbino the blame for killing the Wizard.

Recovering the feathers, Doña Barbara went to town to sell them for Santos. At the same time she had documents made out to transfer the disputed lands to their rightful owner. When she returned to her ranch she found that her people had deserted her; they could not understand why she had turned on her trusted killers. Doña Barbara rode immediately to Altamira, where she found Santos talking to Marisela, whose father had recently died. Because the girl's love for Santos showed plainly on her face, Doña Barbara, unseen, drew her revolver to kill her daughter. Her own love for Santos prevented the deed, however, and she rode away without revealing her presence.

Doña Barbara was not heard from again. The next day a large envelope was delivered to Santos. In it he found a sheaf of documents giving back the property that had been stolen from him, and others transferring the Barquero ranch to Doña Barbara's daughter Marisela. Shortly afterward Santos and Marisela were married, and thus the two ranches which had been separated for many years were once again joined under one owner.

THE DOUBLE-DEALER

Author: William Congreve (1670-1729)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1694

Principal characters:

MELLEFONT, an earnest young man

LORD TOUCHWOOD, his uncle

LADY TOUCHWOOD, in love with Mellefont

CYNTHIA, Mellefont's sweetheart
MASKWELL, Mellefont's false friend

Critique:

The Double-Dealer, Congreve's second play, failed at the time of its presentation. This failure probably can be explained by the play's departure from the established tradition of Restoration comedy. In spite of its firm construction and witty dialogue, The Double-Dealer contains some repulsive elements not relished by the play-going audience of Congreve's day. Yet its plot, characters, and light dialogue make it one of the best comedies of the period. The play also reflects the dramatic conventions of its time and type: the attack on Puritans and Puritanism, dissolute dandies, devastatingly witty maidens, faithless young wives of old men, rascally servants, and devious intrigue.

The Story:

Lady Touchwood was infatuated with her husband's nephew, Mellefont, who had pledged himself to Cynthia, daughter of Sir Paul Plyant. When she confessed her ardor to him, and he rebuked her, she attempted to end her life with his sword. Prevented in her attempt, she vowed revenge.

Fearing the designs of Lady Touchwood, Mellefont engaged his friend Careless to keep Lady Plyant, Cynthia's stepmother, away from Lady Touchwood. Careless also revealed his distrust of Maskwell, Mellefont's friend, who was under obligations to Lord Touchwood.

From sheer spite, Lady Touchwood gave herself to Maskwell. In return, Maskwell promised to help Lady Touchwood by insinuating to Lady Plyant that Mellefont really loved her, not Cynthia.

Lady Touchwood's plan began to work. Old Sir Paul Plyant and Lady Plyant expressed indignation when they were told that Mellefont desired Lady Plyant. Actually, Lady Plyant was flattered and merely pretended anger, but she was nevertheless shocked that Mellefont intended to marry Cynthia for the ultimate purpose of cuckolding Sir Paul. Lady Plyant rebuked him, but at the same time she told the puzzled young man not to despair. Maskwell revealed to Mellefont that he was Lady Touchwood's agent in provoking trouble; Maskwell's real purpose was to create general confusion and to win Cynthia's hand.

Lord Touchwood, refusing to believe that his nephew played a double game, was scandalized when Lady Touchwood recommended cancellation of the marriage on the grounds that Mellefont had made improper advances to her. Maskwell, instructed by Lady Touchwood, ingratiated himself with Lord Touchwood by saying that he had defended Lady Touchwood's honor and had prevailed upon Mellefont to cease his unwelcome attentions.

Maskwell, in his own vicious behalf, told Mellefont that his reward for assisting in the breakup of Mellefont's marriage to Cynthia was the privilege of bedding with Lady Touchwood. Plotting Mellefont's ruin, the fake friend pretended that he wished to be saved from the shame of collecting his reward, and he asked the credulous young man to go to Lady Touchwood's chamber and there surprise Maskwell and Lady Touchwood together.

When Lord Plyant, frustrated by Lady Plyant's vow to remain a virgin, complained to Careless that he did not have an heir, Careless waggishly promised to see what he could do in the matter.

Mellefont, to escape the evil that was brewing, impatiently urged Cynthia to elope with him. Although she refused, she promised to marry no one but him. When she challenged Mellefont to thwart his aunt and to get her approval of their marriage, he promised to get Lady Touchwood's consent that night.

Lady Plyant, meanwhile, had consented to an assignation with Careless. When Lord Plyant appeared, Careless had to give her, secretly, a note containing directions for their meeting. Lady Plyant, anxious to read Careless' letter, asked her husband for a letter which he had received earlier. Pretending to read her husband's letter, she read the one given her by Careless. By mistake she returned her lover's letter to her husband.

Discovering her mistake, she reported it in alarm to Careless. Lord Plyant, meanwhile, had read the letter. Lady Plyant insisted that it was part of an insidious plot against her reputation, and after accusing her husband of having arranged to have it written in order to test her fidelity, she threatened divorce. Careless pretended that he had written it in Lord Plyant's behalf to test his wife's virtue. As foolish as he was, Lord Plyant was not without suspicion of his wife and Careless.

That night Mellefont concealed himself in Lady Touchwood's chamber. When she entered, expecting to find Maskwell, Mellefont revealed himself. Lord Touchwood, informed by Maskwell, then appeared. When her husband threatened his nephew, Lady Touchwood pretended that the young man was out of his wits.

Not suspecting Maskwell's treachery, Lady Touchwood later told him of her lucky escape. Maskwell, in a purposeful soliloquy, revealed to Lord Touchwood his love for Cynthia. Duped, the old man named Maskwell his heir and promised to arrange a marriage between Cynthia and the schemer.

Lady Touchwood learned of Maskwell's treachery when Lord Touchwood told her that he intended to make Maskwell his heir. Chagrined by her betrayal, Lady Touchwood urged her husband never to consent to Cynthia's marriage with anyone but Mellefont.

Maskwell, still pretending to be Mellefont's friend, made his final move by plotting with the unwary Mellefont to get Cynthia away from her house. His intention being to marry her himself, he privately told Cynthia that Mellefont would be waiting for her in the chaplain's chamber. Careless checked Maskwell's carefully laid plans, however, when he disclosed to the young lovers Maskwell's true villainy. Cynthia and Lord Touchwood, in concealment, overheard Lady Touchwood rebuke Maskwell for his betrayal of her. At last she tried to stab her lover but was overcome with emotion. Maskwell then revealed the meeting place where Mellefont, in the disguise of a parson, would be waiting for Cynthia. Lady Touchwood, planning to disguise herself as Cynthia, hurried away to meet him there.

Lord Touchwood, knowing of her plan, put on a chaplain's habit and confronted his wife when she came to make overtures to the man she supposed was Mellefont. The whole plot uncovered, and Maskwell, the double-dealer, unmasked, Mellefont, cleared of all suspicion, took Cynthia for his own.

DRACULA

Type of work: Novel

Author: Bram Stoker (1847-1912)

Type of plot: Horror romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Transylvania and England

First published: 1897

Principal characters:

JONATHAN HARKER, an English solicitor

MINA MURRAY, his fiancée

COUNT DRACULA, a mysterious nobleman

DR. SEWARD, head of a mental hospital

DR. VAN HELSING, a Dutch medical specialist

LUCY WESTENRA, Mina's friend

ARTHUR HOLMWOOD, engaged to marry Lucy

Critique:

This strange tale of vampires and werewolves has worn surprisingly well. It has been presented on the stage and its principal character, Dracula, has become a well-known figure of literary reference. Full of Gothic touches such as mysterious gloomy castles and open graves at midnight, the story is exciting even today. Although Dracula is not truly great literature, it is an excellent example of its type. Written with the rhetorical device of letters and diaries, its overall effect is one of realism and horror.

The Story:

On his way to Castle Dracula in the province of Transylvania, in Rumania, Jonathan Harker, an English solicitor, was apprehensive. His nervousness grew when he observed the curious, fearful attitude of the peasants and the coachman after they learned of his destination. He was on his way to transact business with Count Dracula, and his mission would necessitate remaining at the castle for several days.

Upon his arrival at the castle, Harker found comfortable accommodations awaiting him. Count Dracula was a charming host, although his peculiarly bloodless physical appearance was somewhat disagreeable to Harker's English eyes. Almost immediately Harker was impressed with the strange life of the castle. He and the count discussed their business at night, as the count was never available during the daytime. Although the food was excellent, Harker never saw a servant about the place. While exploring the castle, he found that it was situated high at the top of a mountain with no accessible exit other than the main doorway, which was kept locked. He realized with a shock that he was a prisoner of Count Dracula.

Various harrowing experiences ensued. While Harker half dozed in the early morning hours, three phantom women materialized and attacked him, attempting to bite his throat. Then the count appeared and drove them off, whispering fiercely that Harker belonged to him. Later Harker thought he saw a huge bat descending the castle walls, but the creature turned out to be Count Dracula. In the morning Harker, trying frantically to escape, stumbled into an old chapel where a number of coffin-like boxes of earth were stored. Beneath the cover of one which Harker opened lay the count, apparently dead. In the evening, however, the count appeared as usual, and Harker demanded that he be released. Obliging the count opened the castle door. A pack of wolves surrounded the entrance. The count, laughing hysterically, left poor Harker a prisoner in his room.

The next day Harker, weak and sick from a strange wound in his throat, saw a pack cart loaded with the mysterious boxes drive from the castle. Dracula was gone and Harker was alone, a prisoner with no visible means of escape.

In England, meanwhile, Harker's fiancée, Mina Murray, had gone to visit her beautiful and charming friend, Lucy Westenra. Lucy was planning to marry Arthur Holmwood, a young nobleman. One evening, early in Mina's visit, a storm blew up and a strange ship was driven aground. The only living creature aboard was a gray wolf-like dog. The animal escaped into the countryside.

Soon afterward Lucy's happiness began to fade because of a growing tendency to sleepwalk. One night Mina followed her friend during one of her spells and discovered Lucy in a churchyard. A tall, thin man who was bending over Lucy disappeared at Mina's approach. Lucy, on waking, could remember nothing of the experience, but her physical condition seemed much weakened. Finally she grew so ill that Mina was forced to call upon Dr. Seward, Lucy's former suitor. Lucy began to improve under his care, and when Mina received a report from Budapest that her missing fiancé had been found and needed care, she felt free to end her visit.

When Lucy's condition suddenly grew worse, Dr. Seward asked his old friend, Dr. Van Helsing, a specialist from Amsterdam, for his professional opinion. Van Helsing, examining Lucy thoroughly, paused over two tiny throat wounds which she was unable to explain. Van Helsing was concerned over Lucy's condition, which pointed to unusual loss of blood without signs of anemia or hemorrhage. She was given blood transfusions at intervals, and someone sat up with her at night. She improved but expressed fear of going to sleep at night because her dreams had grown so horrible.

One morning Dr. Seward fell asleep outside her door. When he and Van Helsing entered her room, they found Lucy ashen white and in a worse condition than ever. Quickly Van Helsing performed another transfusion; she rallied, but not as satisfactorily as before. Van Helsing then secured some garlic flowers and told Lucy to keep them about her neck at night. When the two doctors called the next morning, Lucy's mother had removed the flowers because their odor might bother her daughter. Frantically Van Helsing rushed to Lucy's room and found her in a coma. Again he administered a transfusion and her condition improved. She said that with the garlic flowers close by she was not afraid of nightly flapping noises at her window. Van Helsing sat with her every night until he felt her well enough to leave. After cautioning her always to sleep with the garlic flowers about her neck, he returned to Amsterdam.

Lucy's mother continued to sleep with her daughter. One night the two ladies were awakened by a huge wolf that crashed through the window. Mrs. Westenra fell dead of a heart attack and Lucy fainted, the wreath of garlic flowers slipping from her neck. Seward and Van Helsing, who had returned to England, discovered her half-dead in the morning. They knew she was dying and called Arthur. As Arthur attempted to kiss her, Lucy's teeth seemed about to fasten on his throat. Van Helsing drew him away. When Lucy died, Van Helsing put a tiny gold crucifix over her mouth, but an attendant stole it from her body.

Soon after Lucy's death several children of the neighborhood were discovered far from their homes, their throats marked by small wounds. Their only explanation was that they had followed a pretty lady. When Jonathan Harker returned to England, Van Helsing went to see him and Mina. After talking with Harker, Van Helsing revealed to Dr. Seward his belief that Lucy had fallen victim to a vampire, one of those strange creatures who can live for centuries on the blood of their victims and breed their kind by attacking the innocent and making them vampires in turn. The only way to save Lucy's soul, according to Van Helsing, was to drive a stake through the heart of her corpse, cut off her head, and stuff her mouth with garlic flowers. Dr. Seward protested violently. The next midnight Arthur, Dr. Seward, and Van Helsing visited Lucy's tomb and found it empty. When daylight came they did as Van Helsing had suggested with Lucy's corpse, which had returned to its tomb.

The men, with Mina, tried to track down Dracula in London, in order to find him before he victimized anyone else. Their object was to remove the boxes of sterilized earth he had brought with him from Transylvania so that he would have no place to hide in the daytime. At last the hunters trapped Dracula, but he escaped them. By putting Mina into a trance Van Helsing was able to learn that Dracula was at sea, and it was necessary to follow him to his castle. Wolves gathered about them in that desolate country. Van Helsing drew a circle in the snow with a crucifix and within that magic enclosure the travelers rested safely. The next morning they overtook a cart carrying a black box. Van Helsing and the others overcame the drivers of the cart and pried open the lid of Dracula's coffin. As the sun began to set, they drove a stake through the heart of the corpse. The vampire was no more.

EDWARD THE SECOND

Type of work: Drama

Author: Christopher Marlowe (1564-1593)

Type of plot: Historical chronicle

Time of plot: Fourteenth century

Locale: England and France

First presented: c. 1590

Principal characters:

EDWARD II, King of England

PRINCE EDWARD, his son

EDMUND, Earl of Kent, half-brother to the king

PIERCE DE GAVESTON, Earl of Cornwall

GUY, Earl of Warwick

THOMAS, Earl of Lancaster

LORD MORTIMER, the elder

LORD ROGER MORTIMER, the younger

HUGH SPENCER, Earl of Gloucester

QUEEN ISABELLA, wife of King Edward

Critique:

The Troublesome Reign and Lamentable Death of Edward the Second, the last play written by Marlowe before his untimely death, is a pre-Shakespearian chronicle in its highest form. In fact, the drama had in the past been assigned to Shakespeare himself. Unlike Marlowe's earlier work, this play is polished in form, sustained in theme, and consistent in characterization. Marlowe's first real success in the field of historical drama, Edward the Second sacrifices for a highly dramatic and tragic ending the lyrical beauty of language and metaphor present in his other plays. A further accomplishment to be noted here is Marlowe's use of a large group of dominant characters; in his earlier plays he had employed only two central figures.

The Story:

King Edward II having recalled his favorite from exile, Pierce de Gaveston joyfully returned to England. While hurrying to Westminster to rejoin his monarch, he came upon the king talking to his courtiers. Secretive, he hid from the royal assemblage and overheard the noblemen discussing his repatriation.

Edward, an immature and weak-minded yet stubborn man, nourished for Gaveston an unwholesome and unyielding love, in spite of the fact that Edward's father had originally banished the man. The noblemen of England, sworn to uphold the decree of exile, hated the royal favorite. Most passionate in his fury was young Mortimer. But others were not far behind Mortimer in lusty dislike, and they threatened the king with revolt if Gaveston were permitted to remain in England. None but the king's brother Edmund would harbor Gaveston.

The fiery discussion ended, the nobles stalked off in haughty displeasure. Gaveston, still in hiding, rejoiced in his knowledge of the king's love, for Edward revealed his pettiness by his unconcern for the welfare of his kingdom as weighed against his desire to clasp Gaveston to his bosom once more. When Gaveston revealed his presence, Edward ecstatically rewarded him with a series of titles and honors, the scope of which caused even Edmund to comment wryly that Edward had outdone himself. Gaveston mockingly claimed that all he desired was to be near his monarch. To add further salt to the kingdom's wounds, Edward sentenced the Bishop of Coventry, the instigator of Gaveston's exile, to die in the Tower of London.

This action, coupled with the titles and estates lavishly bestowed upon Gaveston, so incensed the rebellious nobility that under the leadership of the two Mortimers, Warwick, and Lancaster, they plotted to kill the favorite. The Archbishop of Canterbury, protesting the damage inflicted upon the Church by the king's folly, allied himself with the plot. Queen Isabella, who professed to love her lord dearly, complained to the noblemen that since Gaveston's return Edward had snubbed her beyond endurance. She agreed that Gaveston must be done away with, but she cautioned the angry noblemen not to injure Edward.

When the rebellious nobility seized Gaveston, Edward, yielding to the archbishop's threat to enforce his papal powers against the king, could do nothing but stand by and allow his beloved friend to be carried off. A bitter exchange of words between the king and his lords was tempered by the gentle sentiments of Gaveston as he bade Edward farewell. Driven by childish anger, perhaps incensed by an intuitive knowledge, Gaveston attacked the queen and accused her of a clandestine association with the younger Mortimer, a charge which she denied. Sensing his advantage, Edward seized upon the accusation as a wedge to undermine his enemies, and he compelled the queen to use her influence to save Gaveston. The queen, because of her love for Edward and her hopes for a reconciliation, resolved to mend the rift by abetting her husband.

At first the nobles disdainfully refused to hear her entreaties. Then, having prevailed upon young Mortimer's sympathy, she disclosed to him a plot whereby Gaveston could be overthrown and the king obeyed at the same time. Mortimer then convinced the other nobles that if Gaveston were allowed to remain in England, he would become so unpopular that the common people would rise in protest and kill him.

There was peace in England once more. Edward affected renewed love for his queen and the lords humbly repledged their fealty to Edward. An undercurrent of meanness prevailed, however, in the bosom of young Mortimer, whose sense of justice was outraged at the fact that Edward had chosen such a baseborn villain as his minion. He still believed that it would be a service to his king and country to unseat Gaveston, and thus he plotted secretly.

But at the ceremonial in honor of Gaveston's return the lords could not stomach the presence of the king's minion. Bitter sarcasm was showered upon Gaveston and young Mortimer tried to stab him. So outraged was Edward at this show of independence by his peers that he vowed vengeance for his dear Gaveston's sake. Even the loyal Edmund could not brook this display on the part of his brother; he deserted Edward to join the nobles.

Edward renewed the smoldering accusation against Isabella that she was Mortimer's lover. Defeated in battle, the king's forces, with Gaveston in flight, were split up to confuse the enemy. Warwick, Lancaster, and others succeeded in capturing the king's minion and ordered his death, but Arundel, a messenger from Edward, pleaded that Gaveston be allowed to say farewell to the king. One of the nobles, unable to scorn the king's wishes, arranged to escort Gaveston to Edward. With a servant in charge, Gaveston was conducted to a hiding place to spend the night. Warwick, driven by blind hatred and an irrational patriotism, kidnapped the prisoner.

Meanwhile Valois, King of France and Isabella's brother, had taken advantage of the revolt in England and had seized Normandy. Edward, displaying the corruption of his statesmanship, dispatched his son Prince Edward and Isabella to negotiate a parley with Valois. Arundel, meanwhile, reported to Edward that Warwick had beheaded Gaveston. Edward, in a wild rage against his lords, swore to sack their lands and destroy their families. Characteristically, having lost his beloved friend, he declared that henceforth young Spencer would be his favorite. He continued to resist the rebels, and before long Warwick, Lancaster, and Edmund were captured and sentenced to death.

In France, the Earl of Gloucester suspected that Isabella was gathering forces to place her son upon the throne. Isabella, in the meantime, had been rejected by Valois. Sir John of Hainault rescued the queen and prince by offering to keep the pair at his estate in Flanders until Edward had matured sufficiently to rule England. The young prince was already showing signs of royal character and a depth and magnitude of personality which promised to make him a suitable monarch.

The condemned Mortimer and Edmund escaped to France, where Sir John agreed to help them in levying forces to aid Isabella and the prince. Landing at Harwich, the forces of Mortimer and Edmund routed the king, who fled toward Ireland. Stalwart, sincere, and intellectually honest, Edmund, who had broken with his brother only after the king had driven him too far, relented in his feelings against Edward; he was further disturbed by a suspicion that Isabella was in love with Mortimer. Mortimer became a despot in his triumph. Edward was captured and sent to Kenilworth Castle, a prisoner. There he was prevailed upon to surrender his crown to the prince.

With the queen's consent Mortimer outlined a crafty scheme to kill Edward. He drew up an ambiguous note which ordered the king's death in one sense and abjured it in another. When Prince Edward, Isabella, Edmund, and Mortimer argued fiercely to decide upon the prince's protector, the prince revealed his distrust for Mortimer. Edmund, fearing greater disunion, resolved to rescue the imprisoned king. His attempt failed.

Prince Edward was crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Shortly after the coronation the deposed Edward, tortured cruelly in a dungeon, was murdered by Mortimer's hireling. Edmund was beheaded. Thereupon Edward III, now monarch in his own right, ordered Mortimer to be hanged and Isabella, who was suspected of being the nobleman's accomplice in plotting her husband's death, to be taken to the Tower of London.

EGMONT

Type of work: Drama

Author: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Brussels

First presented: 1788

Principal characters:

COUNT EGMONT, Lord of Gaure

CLÄRCHEN, his beloved

BRACKENBURG, a citizen in love with Clärchen

THE DUKE OF ALVA, emissary of Philip II

MARGARET OF PARMA, Regent of The Netherlands

WILLIAM, Prince of Orange

Critique:

This tragic account of the martyrdom of Egmont has remained constantly in favor, partly because of Beethoven's musical setting. Here Goethe has taken for his theme the undying love for liberty of oppressed peoples everywhere, and for his plot an episode in the struggle of The Netherlands to throw off Spanish rule. Egmont is warmly depicted as a brave and generous man, but the other characters are less fully developed. The action of the play is designed to bring out the theme of liberty, and in that design it succeeds admirably.

The Story:

The people of The Netherlands were unhappy in the state of their homeland. Philip II of Spain was tightening his absolute control of the Lowlands, particularly in religious matters, for Philip was the main instrument of the Inquisition. Recently a new regent had been appointed to administer his rule. The populace had hoped the office would go to Count Egmont, who, after his defeat of the French at Gravelines, had become a national hero. Besides, although Egmont was a Catholic, he treated the Protestants with kindness, and he had even gone to Madrid to plead with Philip to lessen the strictures of Catholic repression.

The king, however, had given the office to Margaret, his half-sister. She, like Philip, tolerated no dissidence from the established church, yet by firmness and tact she had pacified the sturdy burghers who stubbornly resisted any laws but their own. She had even managed to conciliate Egmont and William of Orange, so that outwardly at least there was harmony among the nobility.

Margaret summoned Machiavel, her secretary, to hear his account of new uprisings. He told her how throughout Flanders mobs were breaking into cathedrals and despoiling the monuments of the hated foreign religion. He counseled Margaret to be firm but not cruel toward the Protestants. Margaret told him that her efforts toward conciliation would mean little, for it was rumored that the cruel Duke of Alva was on his way to assume control of the provinces. Machiavel reminded her that as regent she would hold the final power, but Margaret was wise in the ways of kings. Officially or not, Alva would rule The Netherlands, and she could hope to circumvent him only by appealing directly to her brother. She was especially fearful of what might happen to Egmont and William of Orange, and the effects of Alva's harsh rule on the people.

Meanwhile, in her humble house, Clärchen was happily singing; that night Egmont would come to her. Brackenburgh watched her anxiously, for he loved her and he was certain that no good would come of that love affair between a count and a commoner. When Clärchen, looking from her windows, saw a mob in the street, she asked Brackenburgh to learn the cause of the disturbance. During his absence her mother reproached Clärchen bitterly for rejecting Brackenburgh's suit. Even now, the mother declared, the burgher would be glad to marry Clärchen. Brackenburgh returned to tell them the people had heard of the outbreaks in Flanders, and were heartened by that uprising against their oppressors.

A group of commoners argued about their rights as citizens. One, who could read, told them of their rights under the constitution and of their forefathers' vigilance in protecting their privileges. Egmont, arriving on the scene, advised them to be moderate in their talk but to preserve their ancient liberties. After he left, a keen observer remarked that Egmont's head would make a dainty morsel for the headsman.

In his residence Egmont attended to duties of state. One of his letters came from Count Oliva, his old preceptor, who counseled him to be more circumspect in his behavior and less free in his talk. Egmont threw the letter aside, remarking that every one was different; he himself believed in doing what was right without fear or favor. Let others play the part of fawning courtier.

William of Orange arrived to talk over the coming of Alva. William was in favor of caution; they would do nothing until they knew what Alva had been sent to accomplish. Egmont reminded him that they were both Knights of the Golden Fleece. As members of that order they could not be punished except through a trial by their peers. Prince William was inclined to place little trust in their rights, however, for Philip was a determined and ruthless ruler. William declared that he himself would remain on his own estate and refuse to meet the Duke of Alva. Egmont, on the other hand, decided to speak his mind freely. If he had to be a rebel, he would openly do his best to advance the welfare of The Netherlands.

Margaret, in the meantime, had received a dispatch from Philip. The letter was gentle and considerate in tone, a fact ominous in itself. The king informed her officially of Alva's mission and told in detail of the formidable army the duke was bringing to garrison the recalcitrant towns. Margaret knew that her authority as regent had been superseded.

In the evening Clärchen received Egmont with joy. For a time Egmont was remote in his conduct, even keeping on his mantle. Then he showed her that he was wearing his full uniform, decorated with the emblem of the Golden Fleece, and said that he had come thus attired because she had asked him to do so as a favor. Clärchen, particularly impressed by the decoration of the Golden Fleece, was touched by that evidence of his regard.

The inhabitants of the town grew fearful. Alva's soldiers had been stationed at every strategic point and his spies were everywhere, so that the citizens dared not congregate to discuss their new woes. The ordinary people were afraid for Egmont; it was rumored that he would be killed.

In his palace Alva had made his plans, with his trusted guards forming so tight a cordon around the residence that no one could get in or out. To his natural son Ferdinand he announced his intentions. He was expecting Egmont and William of Orange. At the end of the audience, Alva would detain Egmont on a pretext. Prince William would be arrested outside. As soon as he was safely in custody, Ferdinand, acting as the duke's messenger, was to return to the reception chamber. His arrival would be the signal to arrest Egmont. Ferdinand, uneasy over the success of the plot, was nevertheless flattered by the part he was to play.

William of Orange was too cautious to fall into the duke's trap, however, and he stayed away from the audience. Egmont, who knew no fear, went without hesitation and discussed at great length the troubled situation in The Netherlands. He was a skillful debater. At every point he upheld the dignity of the burghers and wisely counseled patience and tact in dealing with them. At last Alva became impatient and abruptly ordered his arrest. He read a document in which Philip decreed Egmont had been tried and found guilty of treason. Because the King of Spain did not acknowledge the authority of the Knight of the Golden Fleece, Egmont failed in his demand for immunity.

Clärchen was distraught when she heard of Egmont's arrest. Accompanied by faithful Brackenburg, she wandered about the town in an attempt to incite the citizens to rescue Egmont. But Alva had done his work well; the burghers were all afraid even to discuss the matter. Returning to the house, Clärchen thought of the vial of poison that Brackenburg had once shown her when he was disconsolate. Thinking to quiet her temporarily, he gave her the vial. Clärchen immediately drank the poison and left the room to die.

Meanwhile, in the palace prison, Egmont had been wakeful. When he finally dozed off he was wakened by Ferdinand and Silva. The latter read Egmont's sentence; he was to be executed publicly in the market place as a warning to the people. Silva left, but Ferdinand remained behind to condole with the count. Although he had had a part in the plot, he really sympathized with Egmont.

When Egmont slept again, a vision appeared. Freedom was reclining on a cloud. Her features were those of Clärchen. She held above his head a wreath of victory. Egmont awoke at dawn to strains of martial music. The guards were at his door.

THE EMPEROR JONES

Author: Eugene O'Neill (1888-1953)

Type of plot: Expressionistic melodrama

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: West Indies

First presented: 1920

Principal characters:

BRUTUS JONES, Emperor

SMITHERS, a Cockney trader

LEM, a native

Critique:

Eugene O'Neill departed from traditional dramatic writing when he created this play, which concerns itself expressionistically with the forces that make a man what he is. The Emperor Jones goes forward and backward simultaneously: Brutus Jones is carried, in the realm of the stage-actual, from his position as emperor to his death from fear; while, in the short, interrelated, and dynamic episodes which symbolize Jones' and his race's history, the action regresses in point of time from the present to several hundred years ago in the Congo jungle. The Emperor Jones was first produced by the Provincetown Players, in 1920.

The Story:

Henry Smithers, a Cockney adventurer, learned from a Negro woman that the followers of Brutus Jones, self-styled emperor of a West Indian island, were about to desert their ruler. With Smithers' help, Jones, a former Pullman porter and jail-breaker, had duped the natives into believing he was a magician. The superstitious natives made him emperor of the island. Smithers disclosed to the emperor the disaffection of his subjects, who had been taxed and cheated by the pair beyond human endurance. Jones had judged that he had six more months of power before the natives caught on to his skullduggery. He had had a silver bullet cast for a good luck charm; besides, the bullet might be useful if he were ever caught by his subjects.

At Smithers' suggestion, Jones rang a bell for his attendants; no one appeared. Jones resigned his position as emperor on the spot and made immediate plans to escape through the jungle to the coast. Drums began to beat in the hills. The emperor gave the palace to Smithers, took up his white Panama hat, and walked boldly out the front door.

At the edge of the jungle Brutus Jones searched unsuccessfully for tinned food he had cached for such an emergency. The drums continued to beat, louder and more insistent. Night fell, and formless fears came out of the jungle to beset Jones. The moon rose. Jones came into a clearing and there in the moonlight he saw Jeff, a Pullman porter he thought he had killed in a razor duel. Jeff was throwing dice. When the kneeling figure refused to answer him, Jones shot at him. The phantom disappeared. Drums still thudded in the distance. Jones, now sick with fright, plunged into the inky jungle.

After a while he came upon a road and paused to rest. A chain gang came out of the forest. The guard of the gang motioned to Jones to take his place in the gang and get to work. When the guard whipped him, Jones lifted his shovel to strike him, but he discovered that he actually had no shovel. In his rage of fear and frustration, he fired his revolver at the guard. The road, the guard, and the chain gang disappeared; the jungle closed in. The louder beat of the tom-toms drove Jones on in frantic circles.

Now in tatters, the terrified Jones repented the murders he had committed and the way he had cheated the islanders. He came next upon a slave auction attended by whites dressed in the costumes of the 1850's. An auctioneer put Jones on the auction block. Frightened, Jones shattered this apparition by firing one shot at the auctioneer and another at a planter. He dashed into the forest, mad with fear. The drums continued to beat.

At three o'clock Jones came to a part of the jungle which strangely resembled the hold of a slave ship. He found himself one of a cargo of slaves who were swaying slowly with the motion of the ship. Jones and the other slaves moaned with sorrow at being taken away from their homeland. Having only the silver bullet left in his revolver, Jones saved it and dashed on again into the black of the night.

Next he came upon an altar-like arrangement of boulders near a great river. He sank to his knees as if to worship. A Congo witch doctor appeared from behind a large tree and began a primitive dance. Jones was hypnotized by the ritual. The witch doctor indicated to Jones in pantomime that the ex-emperor must offer himself as a sacrifice in order to overcome the forces of evil. A great green-eyed crocodile emerged from the river; Jones fired the silver bullet at the monster and the witch doctor disappeared behind a tree, leaving Jones lying on the ground completely overcome by fear.

At dawn Lem, the leader of the rebels, came with Smithers and a group of natives to the edge of the jungle where Jones had entered the night before. Lem had been delayed in pursuing Jones because of the necessity of manufacturing silver bullets, which, Lem believed, were the only means of taking Jones' life. Several of Lem's men entered the jungle. They soon found the prostrate Jones, who had run in circles all the night. One shot him through the chest with a silver bullet. Jones' body was brought back to Lem, who thought that the silver bullet was what had really killed Jones. But Smithers, looking at Brutus Jones' fear-contorted face, knew differently.

Critique:

Known as the foremost dramatist of the nineteenth century, Ibsen was in constant conflict with the society of his time. He believed that it was the majority who caused people to stagnate. In An Enemy of the People, Doctor Stockmann stood alone, far in advance of the majority of the people. He was persecuted and ridiculed by those he tried to serve only because he was in conflict with established institutions of society. Ibsen saw himself as a Doctor Stockmann, and through the doctor gave the world ideas of universal significance.

The Story:

All the citizens of the small Norwegian coastal town were very proud of the Baths, for the healing waters were making the town famous and prosperous. Doctor Stockmann, the medical officer of the Baths, and his brother Peter, the mayor and chairman of the Baths committee, did not agree on many things, but they did agree that the Baths were the source of the town's good fortune. Hovstad, the editor of the People's Messenger, and Billing, his sub-editor, were also loud in praise of the Baths. Business was good and the people were beginning to enjoy prosperity.

Then Doctor Stockmann received from the University a report stating that the waters of the Baths were contaminated. Becoming suspicious when several visitors became ill after taking the Baths, he had felt it his duty to investigate. Refuse from tanneries above the town was oozing into the pipes leading to the reservoir and infecting the waters. This meant that the big pipes would have to be relaid, at a tremendous cost to the owners or to the town. When Hovstad and Billing heard this news, they asked the doctor to write an article for their paper about the terrible conditions. They even spoke of having the town give Doctor Stockmann some kind of testimonial in honor of his great discovery.

Doctor Stockmann wrote up his findings and sent the manuscript to his brother so that his report could be acted upon officially. Hovstad called on the doctor again, urging him to write some articles for the People's Messenger. It was Hovstad's opinion that the town had fallen into the hands of a few officials who did not care for the people's rights, and it was his intention to attack these men in his paper and urge the citizens to get rid of them in the next election.

Aslaksen, a printer who claimed to have the compact majority under his control, also wanted to join in the fight to get the Baths purified and the corrupt officials defeated. Doctor Stockmann could not believe that his brother would refuse to accept the report, but he soon learned that he was wrong. Peter went to the doctor and insisted that he keep his knowledge to himself because the income of the town would be lost if the report were made public. He said that the repairs would be too costly, that the owners of the Baths could not stand the cost, and that the townspeople would never allow an increase in taxes to clean up the waters. He even insisted that Doctor Stockmann write another report, stating that he had been mistaken in his earlier judgment. He felt this action necessary when he learned that Hovstad and Billing knew of the first report. When the doctor refused either to change his report or withhold it, Peter threatened him with the loss of his position. Even his wife pleaded with him not to cross his powerful brother; he was sustained in his determination to do right only by his daughter Petra.

Hovstad, Billing, and Aslaksen were anxious to print the doctor's article so that the town could know of the falseness of the mayor and his officials. They thought his words so clear and intelligible that all responsible citizens would revolt against the corrupt regime. Aslaksen did plead for moderation, but promised to fight for what was right.

Peter Stockmann appeared at the office of the People's Messenger and cleverly told Aslaksen, Hovstad, and Billing that the tradespeople of the town would suffer if the doctor's report were made public. He said that they would have to stand the expense and that the Baths would be closed for two years while repairs were being made. The two editors and the printer then turned against Doctor Stockmann and supported Peter, since they felt that the majority would act in this way.

The doctor pleaded with them to stand by the promises they had given him, but they were the slaves of the majority opinion which they claimed to mold. When they refused to print his article, the doctor called a public meeting in the home of his friend, Captain Horster. Most of the citizens who attended were already unfriendly to him because the mayor and the newspaper editors had spread the news that he wanted to close the Baths and ruin the town. Aslaksen, nominated as chairman by the mayor, so controlled the meeting that a discussion of the Baths was ruled out of order.

Doctor Stockmann took the floor, however, and in ringing tones told the citizens that it was the unbelievable stupidity of the authorities and the great multitude of the compact majority that caused all the evil and corruption in the world. He said that the majority destroyed freedom and truth everywhere because the majority was ignorant and stupid. The majority was really in slavery to ideas which had long outlived their truth and usefulness. He contended that ideas become outdated in eighteen or twenty years at the most, but the foolish majority continued to cling to them and deny new truths brought to them by the intelligent minority. He challenged the citizens to deny that all great ideas and truths were first raised by the persecuted minority, those few men who dared to stand out against the prevailing opinions of the many. He said that the real intellectuals could be distinguished as easily as could a thoroughbred animal from a cross breed. Economic and social position had no bearing on the distinction. It was a man's soul and mind that separated him from the ignorant masses.

His challenge fell on deaf ears. As he knew from the beginning, the majority could not understand the meaning of his words. By vote they named him an enemy of the people. The next day they stoned his house and sent him threatening letters. His landlord ordered him to move. He lost his position as medical director of the Baths, and his daughter Petra was dismissed from her teaching position. In each case the person responsible for the move against him stated that it was only public opinion that forced the move. No one had anything against him or his family, but no one would fight the opinion of the majority. Even Captain Horster, a friend who had promised to take the Stockmanns to America on his next voyage, lost his ship because the owner was afraid to give a ship to the man, the only man, who had stood by the radical Dr. Stockmann.

Then the doctor learned that his father-in-law had bought up most of the now undesirable Bath stock with the money which would have gone to Mrs. Stockmann and the children. The townspeople accused the doctor of attacking the Baths so that his family could buy the stock and make a profit, and his father-in-law accused him of ruining his wife's inheritance if he persisted in his stories about the uncleanness of the Baths. Reviled and ridiculed on all sides, Doctor Stockmann determined to fight back. He could open a school. Starting only with any urchins he could find on the streets, he would teach the town and the world that he was stronger than the majority, that he was strong because he had the courage to stand alone.

EPITAPH OF A SMALL WINNER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis (1839-1908)

Type of plot: Philosophical realism

Time of plot: 1805-1869

Locale: Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

First published: 1880

Principal characters:

BRAZ CUBAS, a wealthy, cultured Brazilian

MARCELLA, his first mistress

VIRGILIA, his fiancée, later his mistress

LOBO NEVES, Virgilia's husband

QUINCAS BORBA, a philosopher and pickpocket

Critique:

This novel, written by one of Brazil's leading men of letters, was not made available in English translation until 1952, even though it had long been a favorite with readers in the original Portuguese and in Spanish translations. Machado de Assis himself was president of the Brazilian Academy of Letters from its foundation in 1897 until his death in 1908. Epitaph of a Small Winner is the story of an ordinary man who sums up the profit of living as nothing, except that he had left no children to whom he could pass on the misery of human existence. Because he left no children to endure life, he was, says the author, a small winner in the game of life. Obviously Machado de Assis' attitude is one of complete and ironic pessimism. As the English translator points out, the book combines the twin themes of nature's indifference to man and man's own egotism. Readers familiar with eighteenth-century fiction will recognize many stylistic peculiarities similar to those in Sterne's Tristram Shandy.

The Story:

Braz Cubas, a wealthy Brazilian, died of pneumonia in his sixty-fifth year. After his death he decided to write his autobiography, to while away a part of eternity and to give mankind some record of his life.

Braz was born in 1805. His childhood was an easy one, for his father was extremely wealthy and indulgent, only pretending to be severe with his child for the sake of appearances. One of the earliest experiences the boy remembered was the elation of the Brazilians over the defeat of Napoleon, an occasion marked in his memory by the gift of a small sword. The sword was the most important aspect of the occasion, and Braz remarked that each person has his own "sword" which makes occasions important.

As a child, Braz Cubas did not like school. In his seventeenth year he had his first love affair with a courtesan named Marcella. Trying to please his mistress, Braz spent all the money he could borrow from his mother, and then gave promissory notes to fall due on the day he inherited his father's estate. His father, learning of the affair, paid off his son's debts and shipped him off to a university in Spain. At first Braz hoped to take Marcella with him. She refused to go.

Graduated from the university and awarded a degree, Braz admitted that he knew very little. He then took advantage of his father's liberality and wealth and spent several years traveling about Europe. Called back to Rio de Janeiro by news that his mother was dying of cancer, he arrived home in time to see her before she died. After her death he went into retirement, remaining in seclusion until his father came to him with plans for a marriage and a seat in the Brazilian legislative body. After some vacillation Braz decided to obey his father's wishes. The reason for his hesitation was a love affair with a rather beautiful girl. His discovery that she was lame, however, turned him away from her. On his return to social life he learned that the young woman his father had picked out for him, a girl named Virgilia, had position, wealth, and beauty. It was through her father's influence that the elder Cubas expected his son to get ahead politically. Unfortunately for the schemes of both father and son, Virgilia met Lobo Neves, a young man with more ambition and greater prospects. She decided to marry him, a decision which ended, at least temporarily, prospects of a political career for Braz.

Disappointed and disgruntled with life, he accidentally met Marcella, his former mistress. He found her greatly changed, for smallpox had destroyed her beauty. After losing her looks, she had left her earlier profession to become the keeper of a small jewelry shop.

Disappointment over his son's failure to win Virgilia was too much for his father, who died shortly afterward. There was a great to-do after the father's death, for Braz' brother-in-law turned out to be an avaricious man who wanted his wife, Braz' sister, to have as much of the estate as possible. Braz accepted calmly the selfish and unfortunate aspect of human nature thus revealed and agreed, for his sister's sake, to be reconciled with his greedy brother-in-law.

Not very long after his father's death, Braz learned from Virgilia's brother that Virgilia and her husband were returning to Rio de Janeiro. Braz was pleased; he was still in love with her. A few days after the return of Virgilia and her husband, he met them at a ball. Virgilia and Braz danced several waltzes together and fell more deeply in love than they had ever been while Braz was courting her. They continued to meet and before long Virgilia became his mistress.

One day Braz found a package in which were several bundles of banknotes. He kept the money and later used it to establish a trust fund for Doña Placida, a former servant of Virgilia's family, who maintained the house in which Virgilia and Braz kept their assignations. They managed for several years to keep their affair a secret, so that Braz could be a guest in Virgilia's home as well. In fact, he and Lobo Neves were good friends.

One day Braz met Quincas Borba, an old schoolmate who had been reduced to begging. The man took some money from Braz and, as he discovered later, also stole his watch. That night Braz suggested to Virgilia that they run away. She refused to do so. They had a lovers' quarrel, followed by a tender scene of repentance.

A short time later Lobo Neves was offered the governorship of a province, and he suggested that Braz accompany him as his secretary. The situation was inviting to the two lovers, but they knew that in the smaller provincial capital their secret could not long be hidden. Their problems were unexpectedly solved when superstitious Neves refused the government post because the document appointing him was dated on the thirteenth of the month.

The love affair continued until Virgilia became pregnant. Neither of the lovers doubted that Braz was the father of the child, and he acted very much like a husband who expected to be presented with his first-born. The child, not carried the full time, died at birth, much to the sorrow of Virgilia and Braz, and of the husband as well, who thought the child was his.

One day Braz received a letter from Quincas Borba, the begging schoolmate who had stolen his watch. Having improved his finances, the beggar had become a philosopher, a self-styled humanist. Borba's ideas fascinated Braz, who had always fancied himself an intellectual and a literary man. He was also pleased when Borba sent him a watch as good as the one he had stolen. Braz spent a great deal of time with Borba, for Neves had become suspicious of the relationship between his wife and her lover, and the two were discreet enough to stay away from each other for a time.

At last Virgilia and her husband left Rio de Janeiro after Neves received another political appointment. For a time Braz felt like a widower. Lonely, he himself turned to public life. Defeated for office, he then became the publisher of an opposition newspaper, but his venture was not successful. He also fell in love and finally decided to get married. Once more he was disappointed, for his fiancée died during an epidemic.

The years passed rather uneventfully.

EUGENE ARAM

Type of work: Novel

Author: Edward George Earle Bulwer-Lytton (1803-1873)

Type of plot: Mystery romance

Time of plot: Mid-eighteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1832

Principal characters:

ROWLAND LESTER, an English gentleman

MADELINE, his daughter

ELLINOR, another daughter

WALTER LESTER, a nephew

HOUSEMAN, a rogue

EUGENE ARAM, a scholar

Critique:

The history of the crime and trial of Eugene Aram had fascinated English writers long before Bulwer-Lytton wrote his novel on the subject. In an introduction to his book he comments on the popularity of the story and deplores that he is not a greater writer so that he could better handle the intriguing tale. The novel attempts to show that a man of good character can, under the influence of poverty and hunger, of desire and mental confusion, commit a serious crime. The novel has qualities which link it to both Crime and Punishment and the Doctor Faustus legend.

The Story:

When Geoffrey Lester, a roving and dissipated man, ran away from his wife

Braz grew older, and so did his friends. Not many weeks after the death of Quincas Borba, who had become a close companion, Braz himself fell ill of pneumonia. One visitor during his last illness was Virgilia, whose husband had died, but even her presence was not enough to keep Braz from slipping into delirium. In his dying moments he cast up the accounts of his life and decided that in the game of life he was the winner by only a small margin, in that he had brought no one else into the world to suffer the misery of life.

and only son, his brother, Rowland Lester, took the forsaken family into his own home at Grassdale. Soon both brothers' wives died, and kindly old Rowland took over the responsibility of rearing not only his two daughters, Madeline and Ellinor, but also his young nephew, Walter. As the children grew up, Walter fell in love with Madeline, but his love was not returned. It was Ellinor who idealized her cousin as a perfect young man.

One day a stranger came to Grassdale, a crude, ugly man who was to affect all their lives. Madeline and Ellinor, startled by the man while they were out walking, fled to the house of Eugene Aram, a young recluse and scholar whom they knew slightly. Aram did his best to make the two sisters comfortable and went to secure a carriage to take them home. During his absence the stranger came to the cottage and asked if Eugene Aram were in. He was sent away. That night he appeared again at the cottage. Aram recognized him as a man named Houseman, whom he had known under dreadful circumstances years before.

Aram, in spite of his solitary preoccupation with science and philosophy, began to visit the Lester family. Before long it was obvious to Walter that Madeline and Aram were falling in love, and Walter begged Rowland to let him go away for a while. Rowland, sensing his nephew's feelings, allowed him to go. Before he left, Walter had a long talk with Madeline and warned her to consider well her fondness for Aram, who he felt would not make her happy. Madeline took his advice as an insult to her intelligence, and the anger which she showed went far to dispel the love Walter had felt for her.

Walter and Bunting, a servant, set out for London. Old Rowland had given Walter several letters of introduction to his friends there and had advised the boy to learn what he could about the fortunes of his lost father. From an old friend of his uncle, Walter learned that Geoffrey Lester had been to India, had returned, and under the name of Clarke had gone to Yorkshire to collect a legacy left him by a friend he had known in India. Walter and Bunting started for Yorkshire to trace Geoffrey's whereabouts.

Meanwhile Houseman reappeared in Grassdale and again bothered Aram. In times past Houseman had been connected with Aram in a way which Aram did not wish to have announced to the world. Houseman, Aram knew, was involved in robbery and worse, but he was not in a position to expose the man. Houseman promised to leave the country if Aram would settle a yearly allowance on Houseman's daughter, the only person in the world whom he loved or who loved him. Aram went to London, where he was able to raise the sum demanded by Houseman. When he returned to Grassdale, Aram thought that he was rid of Houseman forever.

In Yorkshire Walter learned that his father had been seen last in the village of Knaresborough. On the way there he and Bunting met Houseman, whom Walter recognized as a man who had robbed him on a previous occasion. Bunting recognized him as a man who had been in Grassdale. Houseman, having learned that his daughter was dying, was hastening to Knaresborough, where she lay on her deathbed. As his horse had gone lame, Houseman begged Walter to lend him his, and Walter, despite Bunting's objections, was so moved by the man's story that he did so.

When they arrived at Knaresborough, the two travelers learned that Houseman had arrived in time to hold his daughter in his arms before she died. Walter also learned more of his father, who under the name of Clarke had come to the town years before. He had also, Walter was told, stolen some jewels and run up bills in all the shops of the town before he had mysteriously disappeared. An inquest had been held after Clarke's disappearance, and the last two men who had seen him had been tried, but released for lack of evidence. With surprise and horror Walter heard that these two men were Houseman and Eugene Aram.

Walter went immediately to see Houseman, whom he found almost mad over the death of his child. He was unable to answer Walter's questions. Then came word of the discovery of a body that had been buried about the time Clarke had disappeared. Walter forced Houseman to go with him to the newly opened grave and demanded to know if those were the bones of his father. Houseman said that the bones were not those of Clarke, that Clarke had been killed and his body buried in a cave. He said that he and Aram had planned to rob Clarke, but that in the struggle Aram had killed Clarke. The remains of Clarke were uncovered in the place Houseman had described. Walter prepared to return home with the news that Madeline's lover was a murderer.

Meanwhile Rowland had given his permission to the marriage of Madeline and Aram, and had come to love his prospective son-in-law almost as much as he loved his daughter. Walter's arrival with his terrible news threw the household into despair. Aram, arrested for the crime, denied his guilt. Madeline wasted away with grief over the affair, and old Rowland could barely make himself see the reasons which made his nephew bring his charge against Aram.

As the day of the trial drew near, Madeline grew weaker and weaker. Walter realized that whether Aram was found guilty or not guilty, there was no place for him in England. If Aram was judged not guilty, Walter could never ask forgiveness, especially as he would always doubt the judgment. If Aram was found guilty, Walter could not face his family and Madeline again.

At last the day of the trial arrived. Madeline, convinced of Aram's innocence, went dressed in the clothes she had hoped to wear at her wedding. Houseman was called as a witness by the prosecution. Aram defended himself by pointing out the lack of evidence and the contradiction between his own life and the life of a man who could commit such a crime. Houseman's testimony, he said, could not be counted, as Houseman was known as a thief and robber. But the jury, in accordance with the judge's statement that it was often possible for a man who had led an exemplary life to commit a crime, brought in a verdict of guilty.

As she returned home from the court, Madeline died, broken-hearted. In jail Aram still maintained his innocence. Walter, in great mental turmoil over the decision of the court, was disturbed by fears that Aram might not be guilty and that he had caused both the death of his cousin and Aram without reason. Granted permission to visit Aram in jail, Walter pleaded with the prisoner to tell him the truth. Aram promised to leave a letter which Walter could read after the execution.

Walter awaited with anxiety the day of the execution. When it was over, he opened the letter and read Aram's confession of guilt. Aram tried to justify his deed. He had robbed so that he would have money to continue scientific studies which he thought would be of great benefit to mankind. The murder had been the accidental killing of a worthless rogue who had run away from his family, a liar and a thief. Aram thought it only right that such a man should be robbed, even killed, if the money gained went to the betterment of mankind. He had not known that Clarke had really been Geoffrey Lester, uncle of the woman he later planned to marry. Walter was astonished at a mind, so brilliant in so many respects, which could draw such false conclusions.

Walter kept the letter a secret. Knowing the grief he had caused, he left the home of his uncle and cousin and lived for many years abroad. On his return he went secretly to Grassdale. There Bunting recognized his old master, showed him old Rowland's grave, and gave him directions to the place where Ellinor lived. After a time Walter and Ellinor married and lived a happy life which served to compensate for all the grief the family had known in the past.

EUGENE ONEGIN

Type of work: Poem

Principal characters:

EUGENE ONEGIN, a Russian dandy
VLADIMIR LENSKY, his friend
TATYANA LARIN, in love with Eugene
OLGA, her sister

Critique:

The outstanding character in this narrative poem is Tatyana, often called the first in the long line of Russian heroines; indeed, Eugene Onegin as a whole must be regarded as a kind of fountainhead for the illustrious group of nineteenth-century Russian novels. Pushkin's conception of his theme is romantic and his treatment often lyrical. There are in the poem many autobiographical elements, particularly in the resemblance between Eugene and Pushkin himself. The Soviet regime has continued to set a high value on Pushkin's work. The poem was dramatized as an opera by Tchaikowsky.

The Story:

Eugene Onegin was brought up in the aristocratic tradition. Although he had little classical background, he had a flashing wit and he was well-read in economics. He had become an accomplished man of the world by the time he reached young manhood. In fact, he had been so successful in love and so accustomed to the social life of Moscow that he habitually felt a supreme boredom with life. Even the ballet had lately failed to hold his attention.

Eugene's father had led the usual life. He gave balls regularly and tried his best to keep up his social position by borrowing recklessly. Just as he was declared a bankrupt, Eugene received word that his uncle was dying. Since he was the heir, he left in haste to attend the dying man. Grumbling meanwhile at the call of duty, he was thankful to be coming into an inheritance.

His uncle, however, died before he arrived. After the relatives had departed Eugene settled down to enjoy his uncle's handsome country estate. The cool woods and the fertile fields charmed him at first, but after two days of country life his old boredom returned. He soon acquired a reputation as an eccentric. If neighbors called, Eugene found himself obliged to leave on an urgent errand. After a while the neighbors left him to himself.

Vladimir Lensky remained his friend. At eighteen Vladimir was still romantic and filled with illusions of life and love. He had been in Germany, where he was much influenced by Kant and Schiller. In Russia his German temperament set him apart. He and Eugene became more and more intimate.

The Larins had two daughters, Olga and Tatyana. Olga was pretty and popular, and although she was the younger, she was the leader in their group. Tatyana was reserved and withdrawn, but a discerning observer would have seen her real beauty. She made no effort to join in the country life. Olga had been long betrothed to Vladimir; the family despaired of a marriage for Tatyana.

On Vladimir's invitation Eugene reluctantly agreed to pay a visit to the Larins. When the family heard that the two men were coming, they immediately thought of Eugene as a suitor for Tatyana. But Eugene was greatly bored with his visit. The refreshments were too ample and too rustic, and the talk was heavy and dull. He paid little attention to Tatyana.

After he left, Tatyana was much disturbed. Having fallen deeply in love, she had no arts to lead Eugene on. After confiding in her dull-witted nurse, she wrote Eugene a passionate, revealing love letter. She wrote in French, for she could not write Russian grammatically.

Eugene, stirred by her letter, paid another visit to the Larins and found Tatyana in a secluded garden. He told her the brutal truth. He was not a good man for a husband, for he had had too much experience with women and too many disillusionments. Life with him would not be at all worthy of Tatyana. The girl, making no protest, suffered in silence.

On his lonely estate Eugene lived the life of an anchorite. He bathed every morning in a stream, read, walked and rode in the countryside, and slept soundly nights. Only Vladimir called occasionally.

That winter the Larins celebrated Tatyana's name-day. When Vladimir represented the gathering as only a small family affair, Eugene consented to go. He felt betrayed when he found the guests numerous, the food heavy, and the ball obligatory. For revenge, he danced too much with Olga, preventing Vladimir from enjoying his fiancée's company. Vladimir became jealously angry and challenged Eugene to a duel. Through stubbornness Eugene accepted the challenge.

Before the duel Vladimir went to see Olga. His purpose was to reproach her for her behavior, but Olga, as cheerful and affectionate as ever, acted as if nothing had happened. More light-hearted but somewhat puzzled, Vladimir prepared to meet Eugene on the dueling ground.

When the two friends met, Eugene shot Vladimir through the heart. Remorseful at last, Eugene left his estate to wander by himself. Olga soon afterward married an army man and left home.

In spite of the scandal, Tatyana still loved Eugene. She visited his house and made friends with his old housekeeper. She sat in his study reading his books and pondering his marginal notes. Eugene had been especially fond of Don Juan and other cynical works, and his notes revealed much about his selfishness and disillusionment. Tatyana, who had hitherto read very little, learned much bitterness from his books and came to know more of Eugene.

At home Tatyana's mother did not know what to do. The girl seemed to have no interest in suitors and had refused several proposals. On the advice of relatives the mother decided to take Tatyana to Moscow, where there were more eligible men. They were to visit a cousin for a season in hopes that Tatyana would become betrothed.

From her younger cousins Tatyana learned to do her hair stylishly and to act more urbanely in society. At a ball a famous general, a prince, was attracted to Tatyana. In spite of the fact that he was big and fat she accepted his proposal.

After more than two years of wandering, Eugene returned to Moscow. Still indifferent to life, he decided to attend a fashionable ball, simply to escape from boredom for a few hours. He was warmly greeted by his host, whom he had known well in former times. While the prince was reproaching him for his long absence, Eugene could not keep from staring at a queenly woman who dominated the gathering. She looked familiar. When he asked the prince about her, he was astounded to learn that she was Tatyana, his host's wife.

The changed Tatyana showed no traces of the shy rustic girl who had written so revealingly of her love. Eugene, much attracted to her, frequently went to her house, but he never received more than a cool reception and a distant hand to kiss.

Finally Eugene began to write her letters in which he expressed his hopeless longing. Still Tatyana gave no sign. All that winter Eugene kept to his gloomy room, reading and musing. At last, in desperation, he called on Tatyana unannounced and surprised her rereading his letters.

Tatyana refused to give in to his importunate declarations. Why had he scorned the country girl and why did he now pursue the married woman? She would rather listen to his brutal rejection than to new pleadings. She had once been in love with Eugene and would gladly have been his wife; perhaps she was still in love with him. Perhaps she had been wrong in listening to her mother, who had been insistent that she marry the prince. But now she was married, and she would remain faithful to her husband until she died.

THRASO, a soldier and rival of Phaedria

PARMENO, Phaedria's slave

CHAREA, Phaedria's younger brother, in love with Pamphila

PAMPHILA, a slave girl

CHREMES, Pamphila's brother

Critique:

In antiquity, this was the most famous and popular of Terence's plays. Tradition has it that it was once produced twice in one day. Like most Roman drama, it had its origins in the plays of Greek dramatists, and borrowings from the works of Menander are apparent. In this play we find that Terence tried to depart from some of the traditional conventions of the Roman drama. Most Roman comedies contained the insolent parasite, the rascally slave, and the braggart warrior. These characters are present in name in The Eunuch, but Terence worked over his figures until they are somewhat different from the conventional portrayals. The slave is an honest and well-meaning fellow, lacking in the usual insolence. The warrior, an Athenian captain, is a fool, but he strives to be a wit, so that he is more than a boaster about deeds which he may or may not have accomplished.

The Story:

Phaedria, a young Athenian of good family, was disturbed because he had been excluded from the house of Thais, a courtesan. He was also perturbed because of the love he felt for the woman. Phaedria's slave, anxious to help his master, advised that Phaedria retire to the country for a time and try to forget her. Parmeno, the slave, really believed the woman was wicked and that his master would be better off without her. As master and slave stood before Thais' house, which was next to Phaedria's father's residence, the courtesan herself came out to explain why she had refused to admit the young man. She explained that Thraso, a warrior, had purchased a slave who had formerly belonged to her mother. Thais believed that the slave, a young girl, was actually a free citizen of Athens. In order to get a good name in Athens, to which city she had recently come, Thais hoped to learn the girl's identity and restore her to her family. Thais had to humor the captain in order to get possession of the slave girl.

Phaedria believed Thais and promised to go away into the country for two days, so that she could work on the captain with her charms and get possession of the girl. Before he left, Phaedria gave Parmeno orders to go into his father's house and get the two slaves whom he had purchased for Thais. One of the slaves was an Ethiopian girl, the other a eunuch; Thais wanted a eunuch because royalty preferred them.

On his way to get the slaves for Thais, Parmeno met Phaedria's younger brother, Chaerea, who had seen the slave girl Thais wanted and had fallen in love with her. Chaerea persuaded Parmeno to introduce him into Thais' household in place of the eunuch, and the exchange was made. In the meantime Thraso's parasite had brought the slave girl to Thais' house as a present to the courtesan from the warrior. He also bade Thais meet his master for dinner.

Thais and some of her maids went to Thraso's house as he had requested. While they were gone, Chaerea, in the person of the eunuch, was entrusted with the care of Pamphila, the slave girl. He sent her to be bathed by other slaves. When she was returned, he was so overcome by her charms, aided by a picture of Jupiter's rape of Danaë, that he raped the girl. Ashamed at what he had done, he fled.

While Thais was gone, Pamphila's brother Chremes came to the house at the request of Thais. Told that she was not at home, he went in search of her at Thraso's residence. Thraso, thinking Chremes a rival for Thais' affections, behaved boorishly. Disgusted, Thais took her leave, after telling Chremes to meet her shortly thereafter at her own house.

Phaedria, in the meantime, had left for the country, but, overcome by his affection for Thais, he turned back. Arriving at his father's house, he was met by one of Thais' maids, who told him that the eunuch had raped Pamphila. Phaedria, swearing that such things could not happen, found the eunuch dressed in his brother's clothing. The maid, upon seeing the eunuch, realized that the guilty man was not the eunuch but Phaedria's brother. The brother, meanwhile, had gone off to a dinner with some friends. He was both sorry and glad for his deed; most of all, he wanted to marry the girl.

Thais returned, distressed and angry when she heard what had happened. Her anger was cut short by the arrival of Chremes, who thought that Pamphila was his sister, stolen in infancy. To make sure, he went off to get the nurse who had been in charge of his sister. Before he could leave, however, he had to chase off Thraso, who had arrived with a band of servants to reclaim the slave he had given to Thais.

Chaerea returned and confessed his actions to Thais. When she accused him of doing the deed to spite her, a courtesan, he demurred, swearing that he had raped the girl because he loved her overmuch. He still claimed that he wanted to marry her. Chremes returned with the nurse, who quickly identified Pamphila as Chremes' long-lost sister, a free citizen of the city, a member of a good family, and a fine wife for Chaerea, if the lad could get his father's consent.

While they were conferring, Thais' maid resolved to have her own revenge on Parmeno, Phaedria's slave. She told Parmeno that Chaerea had been seized and that he was about to be mutilated, as was the customary treatment of rapists in ancient Athens. Parmeno ran to Laches, the father of Phaedria and Chaerea, to get the older man's help.

When Laches learned the true facts, he was quite willing to permit a marriage between his younger son and the girl whom he had dishonored. More than that, the father became reconciled to his older son's love for the courtesan, since she had proved herself in her efforts to restore the slave to freedom and her proper position in life. He agreed to look after the courtesan's welfare and to permit his older son to live with her. This plan made Phaedria and Thais very happy, for they truly loved one another.

When Thraso returned for one last attempt to regain the favor of the courtesan, Phaedria threatened to kill him if he appeared in that street again. But Thraso's parasite suggested to Phaedria and Thais that they keep the braggart for entertainment. The parasite pointed out that Thraso was very foolish, had a lot of money, and could be kept dangling a long time by the courtesan without ever receiving any of her favors. Phaedria, seeing the humor of the situation, agreed to the terms. The warrior, not realizing he was to be made a fool, was so happy with the arrangement that he promised to behave himself and to be more generous than ever with the parasite who had got him into the silly situation.

EVAN HARRINGTON

Type of work: Novel

Author: George Meredith (1828-1909)

Type of plot: Social satire

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1861

Principal characters:

EVAN HARRINGTON, a tailor's son

HARRIET COGGLESBY,

CAROLINE STRIKE, and

LOUISA, THE COUNTESS DE SALTAR, Evan's sisters

ROSE JOCELYN, an heiress

FERDINAND LAXLEY, Evan's rival

Critique:

That a common tradesman can vindicate himself in the presence of the upper classes is the theme of this novel. How the Countess de Saldar contrives to uphold the honor of her brother and sisters provides the plot. Although the plot is handicapped by complications often difficult to follow, the novel is, aside from Meredith's intricate method and involved style, rich in social satire, smoothly maneuvered to reach its climax, and ironically amusing in its consistent characterizations. Evan Harrington is no mere social climber; he is more or less a symbol of the refinement latent in his own class as opposed to upper-class vulgarity. In the novel Meredith drew heavily on his own family background and experience. Melchisedec Harrington was drawn from his own grandfather, a tailor, and Evan's sisters are the writer's three aunts, thinly disguised.

The Story:

Melchisedec Harrington was a tailor with the bearing and manners of a great nobleman. When he died, his neighbors spoke fondly of him and wondered what his son, who was in Portugal, would do. His widow knew that the great Mel, as he was called, had left debts amounting to more than four thousand pounds, which Evan would want to repay. The boy was to go to Mr. Goren in London to learn the tailor's trade.

There had been three daughters in the tailor's household, each of whom had married so well that they had thenceforth cut themselves apart from their father, a common tradesman. Harriet had married a brewer, Andrew Cogglesby; Caroline had married Major Strike, and Louisa had become the Countess de Saldar. The countess decided that her brother Evan must also marry well, and she tried to ally him with Rose Jocelyn, who had money of her own.

When Mrs. Harrington told Evan about old Mel's debts, the son consented to go to London and learn his trade from Mr. Goren; not even the countess' entreaties and assurances that Rose loved him could dissuade him from his course. Setting out for London on foot, he met Jack Raikes, an old school friend. They went to the Green Dragon Inn, where they joined a group of men at dinner. Old Tom Cogglesby, brother of Andrew, the brewer, presided. Among those present were Harry Jocelyn, Rose's brother, and Ferdinand Laxley, his friend. Evan and Jack got into a drunken brawl involving much name calling and many threats. The gentlemen present scoffed at Evan's choice of trade. Laxley challenged Evan to a duel, but on learning that Evan was the son of a tailor he haughtily declined to fight a common tradesman.

The day after the tavern brawl, while watching a cricket match on the green, Evan met Rose Jocelyn and her party, which included the Countess de Saldar. He was prevailed upon to visit the Jocelyns at Beckley Court before he went to London. As he rode along beside Rose, one of the men with whom he had quarreled the night before pointed him out as a tailor. At Beckley Court the countess was able to persuade Harry Jocelyn that Evan was not the tailor but that Jack Raikes was. Still, Laxley demanded that Evan deny his trade and fight the duel as a gentleman or else acknowledge it.

Laxley was one of Rose's suitors. Representing Evan, he continually challenged him to admit he was not a real gentleman. Since claiming that he was a gentleman would mean a duel with Laxley, Evan resolved to leave Beckley Court.

The countess, fearing to see all her plans ruined, prevailed upon Evan to seek the advice of his relatives. Harriet, Caroline, and Andrew were also visiting at Beckley Court; Evan's predicament concerned all of them. Andrew offered the young man a position in his brewery.

Glorying in her position, Rose encouraged her admirers to outrace each other in an amateur steeplechase, the prize to be her handkerchief. Evan won the prize but was injured when thrown from his horse.

There was a rumor in Lympot that at the age of sixteen the Countess de Saldar tried to run off with a certain George Uploft. Melchisedec allegedly had chased the pair down and ended the romance. When Uploft appeared at Beckley Court, the countess brazenly defied him to recall her background. At dinner the conversation swung to old Mel, and during the last anecdote, which involved Mel's oldest daughter, Caroline swooned and was taken from the room, but not before Uploft recognized her as Mel's daughter.

Although confined to bed because of his injury, Evan was still determined to leave Beckley Court. The masquerade he was playing, pretending to be one of the upper class when he was actually a tailor's son, was too much for him. That evening, seeing Rose in the garden, he followed her to claim the handkerchief which he had won. When he revealed his love, and she responded, he promised himself that he would disclose his base origin to her on the morrow.

The next day Evan told Rose the facts about himself. She admitted that she already knew his story and loved him in spite of it, and she promised to fight her family for the right to marry him. She also asked him to accept employment as her Uncle Melville's secretary.

Awaiting Evan's arrival in London, Mr. Goren learned from Jack Raikes that Evan was loitering at Beckley Court. Mr. Goren wrote a complaint to Mrs. Harrington, who proceeded at once to Beckley Court. Stopping overnight at the Green Dragon Inn, she met the obstreperous Tom Cogglesby and tamed him with her efficiency and good sense. Since both were going to Beckley Court, they traveled together the next day. Tom was on his way, he said, to help a tailor marry a gentlewoman.

The social involvements at Beckley Court grew more tense. Laxley was blamed for an outrageous blunder in revealing the whereabouts of a runaway wife whom Lady Jocelyn had befriended, and he was sent away. The Countess de Saldar had a triumphant moment. Mrs. Harrington conducted herself with finesse in the midst of a difficult situation.

But the Harringtons had been publicly exposed as the family of the tailor Melchisedec. Evan, fearing that he had lost Rose, discovered that his sister, the Countess de Saldar, was responsible for the anonymous letter Laxley was supposed to have written. Failing in his entreaties to convince his sister to confess the truth to Lady Jocelyn, Evan decided to take the blame for Laxley's dismissal. After declaring his guilt to Lady Jocelyn, he wrote also to Laxley. Evan decided beforehand that if Laxley challenged him to a duel he would refuse the challenge.

Juliana, Rose's cousin and a plain-looking crippled girl, was in love with Evan and had always been loyal to him. From the beginning she had known the facts about his background. When the question of his infamous deception involving Laxley arose, Juliana refused to believe ill of Evan.

On the day of Evan's departure from Beckley Court, Rose came to him and asked him if he had been responsible for Laxley's humiliation. Feeling that if she truly loved him she would not need to ask, he refused to explain. Laxley arrived and took possession of Rose. A note from Juliana told Evan that she believed in him.

In Mr. Goren's shop Evan prepared to follow his trade. The Cogglesbys, receiving Juliana as a guest in their home, set out to win Evan's heart for the invalid girl. But Evan still pined for Rose, who cut him cruelly when she met him on the street.

When Andrew's brewery went bankrupt and he lost all his property, the three sisters, who had been living in the Cogglesby house, were forced to go to their mother in Lymport. At Evan's request, Lady Jocelyn had taken Juliana, in poor health, back to Beckley Court.

Juliana inherited Beckley Court upon the death of her grandmother. Just before she died, her malady being incurable, Juliana wrote to Rose and revealed Evan's innocence. She also wrote a will leaving her estate to Evan. Meanwhile Rose, engaged to Laxley, felt herself bound by promise to Evan and sent for him to release her before she could marry his rival. Evan did so with no show of self-sacrifice. Later Rose learned that Evan, rejecting Juliana's bequest, had returned Beckley Court to Lady Jocelyn.

Everyone had become indebted to Evan for his generosity; he himself had simply tried to make everyone happy. Lady Jocelyn and Rose went to Lymport to thank him. There Rose, speaking with Evan alone, asked him why he had blackened his name to her. No longer compelled to pretend anything about himself, Evan rose manfully to the occasion. When he declared his love, Rose accepted him. Old Tom Cogglesby, delighted, offered to give Evan an income.

The sisters went back to their former ways of life. Mrs. Harrington became Tom Cogglesby's housekeeper.

EVELINA

Type of work: Novel

Author: Fanny Burney (Madame d'Arblay, 1752-1840)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1778

Principal characters:

SIR JOHN BELMONT, an English nobleman
EVELINA, Sir John's unacknowledged daughter
THE REV. MR. VILLARS, Evelina's guardian
MADAME DUVAL, Evelina's grandmother
LORD ORVILLE, whom Evelina married
SIR CLEMENT WILLOUGHBY, a gentleman of fashion
MRS. MURVAN, Evelina's patroness

Critique:

This novel, written in the epistolary form so popular in the eighteenth century, still attracts attention, chiefly for its portrayal of morals and manners. The author revealed her purpose in her subtitle, The History of a Young Lady's Entrance into the World. Even though the reader may be repelled by the sugar-sweetness of a heroine who never draws an unkind breath from the beginning to the end of the story, the reader will be attracted to the descriptions of English social life and the idiosyncrasies of character revealed through the eyes of a seventeen-year-old girl.

The Story:

Evelina, abandoned by her father and her maternal grandmother upon the death of her mother, had been for many years the ward of the Rev. Mr. Arthur Villars, an English clergyman. At last her grandmother, Madame Duval, wrote from France to say that she would take charge of the girl, providing proper proof of the child's relationship were forthcoming. Mr. Villars refused, however, to send Evelina to France. He also objected to the invitation of Mrs. Mirvan, who wanted Evelina to join her family in London. He felt that Evelina, having been brought up carefully at Berry Hill in Dorsetshire, should not be exposed to the unhappiness of London society life, particularly so since her own father, Sir John Belmont, would not admit his parentage and she was without enough income to permit her to live as the Mirvans did.

After some urging, he finally allowed Evelina to visit Lady Howard, Mrs. Mirvan's mother, at Howard Grove. A short time later Mrs. Mirvan and her daughter, who were delighted with Evelina, secured permission to have her accompany them to London.

Almost at once she was swept into fashionable London life. Having grown up in the provinces, the city was a constant joy to her. She soon met Lord Orville and both were attracted to one another. On several occasions her lack of London manners caused her embarrassment and she expressed a desire to return to Dorsetshire. Sir Clement Willoughby was her chief tormentor.

By chance she met her odious grandmother, the vulgar and presumptuous Madame Duval. On an outing the Frenchwoman became the subject of ridicule when she was pitched into a mudhole. Evelina met other of her relations and found them no better than her grandmother.

Madame Duval, attaching herself to the Mirvans, succeeded in making Evelina most unhappy. Evelina went reluctantly to the opera with her relatives and was made miserable by their crudeness. Hoping to escape them, she joined Sir Clement, but was only further embarrassed when Sir Clement intentionally delayed his coach while escorting her to her lodgings. For that escapade Evelina was severely scolded by her guardian. In a letter to her he indicated that he lived in daily fears for her honor. He was relieved when he heard that the Mirvans were at last returning with her to Howard Grove.

Lady Howard, urged on by Madame Duval, put forth the plan of forcing Sir John Belmont to acknowledge Evelina as his daughter. Mr. Villars did not approve of this action, as he had promised Evelina's mother that the girl would never know her cruel and unnatural father.

At Howard Grove, Evelina unknowingly participated in a cruel joke planned by Captain Mirvan and Sir Clement. Again made a laughing-stock, Madame Duval took to her bed after she had been sent upon a fool's errand and had lost her false curls.

When Sir John Belmont refused to admit that Evelina was his daughter, Madame Duval planned to take Evelina to confront Sir John in person and to demand his recognition. Mr. Villars would not listen to her proposal. He did agree, however, to let Evelina spend a month with her grandmother in London. Evelina was unhappy under Madame Duval's chaperonage because her vulgar relations attempted to use her to ingratiate themselves with her fashionable friends. Sir Clement Willoughby visited Evelina while she was staying with her grandmother, but Madame Duval embarrassed everyone by her uncivil remarks to him. She remembered the joke played on her at Howard Grove.

In her London lodgings Evelina was instrumental in preventing the suicide of Mr. Macartney, an impoverished Scottish poet. Out of pity for his plight, she relieved his need with money from her own purse.

At a fireworks display Evelina was again chagrined, having been discovered by Lord Orville while she was in vulgar company.

Madame Duval announced that she hoped to marry Evelina to the boorish young son of Mr. Braughton, a silversmith. Mr. Braughton was Madame Duval's nephew. Evelina was much distressed, the more so when her grandmother's friends attached themselves to Lord Orville in a familiar manner. When Mr. Braughton asked his lordship's custom for any silver the nobleman might want to buy, Evelina felt herself ruined forever in Lord Orville's eyes.

In her distress Evelina wrote to Mr. Villars, who ordered her to return immediately to Berry Hill. From there she wrote to her friend, Miss Mirvan, about her London adventures. A most painful surprise to her was a letter she had received from Lord Orville, to whom she had written to disclaim responsibility for her relatives' crudeness. His reply was so insulting that she became quite ill and had to be sent to a rest home at Bristol Hot Wells, where she went in the company of Mrs. Selwyn, a neighbor.

At the watering place Evelina met many of her fashionable London friends, among them Lord Orville. He was so courteous that she had to forgive him for his impolite letter. As Evelina was beginning to feel at home once more among people of wealth and position, Mr. Macartney appeared and embarrassed her with his importunities.

A new arrival at the baths was Miss Belmont, an heiress reputed to be Sir John Belmont's daughter. Mrs. Selwyn, hearing of the girl's identity, decided to learn more about Miss Belmont. Mrs. Selwyn was convinced that Evelina was the true daughter of Sir John.

Mr. Macartney was trying to return the money Evelina had given him, but she did not want her friends to learn that she had ever known him. She feared that they would suspect her of having had an affair with him. Lord Orville, however, encouraged her to see the unfortunate young poet. From Mr. Macartney, Evelina learned that he believed himself to be an unacknowledged son of Sir John Belmont. Evelina, realizing that she herself must be the sister of Mr. Macartney, did not reveal her knowledge.

When Sir John Belmont returned to England, Mr. Villars was finally stirred to action against him, for by introducing to society the woman who posed as his daughter Sir John was indicating that Evelina was an impostor. Determined that Evelina should have her rights, Mr. Villars prepared to force Sir John to acknowledge Evelina as his daughter.

Through the good offices of Mrs. Selwyn and others the affair was at last untangled. The supposed daughter of Sir John proved to be the daughter of a penniless nurse, who had substituted her own child for Lady Belmont's infant. Evelina, delighted to learn that Sir John's attitude had been the result of error and not neglect, was happily reconciled with her father, who received her warmly. The impostor was treated with great kindness by all concerned as she herself was innocent of the design. She married Mr. Macartney, who was also acknowledged by Sir John. Evelina, as Sir John's daughter, was sought after by Lord Orville, to whom she gladly gave her hand in marriage.

EVERY MAN IN HIS HUMOUR

Type of work: Drama

Author: Ben Jonson (1572?-1637)

Type of plot: Comedy of humors

Time of plot: Late sixteenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1598

Principal characters:

KNOWELL, an old gentleman

EDWARD KNOWELL, his son

BRAINWORM, Knowell's servant

DOWNRIGHT, a plain man

WELLBRED, his half-brother

KITELY, a merchant

CAPTAIN BOBADILL, a cowardly braggart

DAME KITELY, Kitley's wife

COB, a water carrier

TIB, Cob's wife

Critique:

Every Man in His Humour amused and delighted literary London in 1598. Jonson, a shrewd observer of human foibles, capitalized on these failings to create a new kind of dramatic comedy in accordance with the medieval theory of the four humors—hot, dry, cold, moist. That is to say, each man contains within him these four elements, and when any one of these elements predominates in an individual, that person is given to a peculiar sort of folly and is called "humorous." All comedy, of course, is based on aberration from the normal, but Jonson's conscious design of marking each individual in his play by heightening his principal folly or shortcoming was a new departure in the drama and set the pattern for many subsequent plays by other hands in which the theory of humors was similarly employed. It is believed that Shakespeare acted in this play when it was first produced at The Curtain theater in the summer of 1598. The first published version was the folio edition of 1616.

The Story:

In Hogsden, a conservative suburb north of London's wall, Edward Knowell, a dignified, practical citizen, was somewhat concerned over his son Edward's interest in poetry. Old Knowell was further alarmed at the younger generation's interests when his nephew Stephen, a country simpleton, showed interest in the gentle art of falconry. Old Knowell wished to have his son and his nephew engaged in more practical arts.

One day he was handed a letter obviously meant for his son. The letter, signed by Wellbred, a London gallant, was an invitation to young Knowell to renew his association with a group of young madcaps. Old Knowell, having read the letter, and being convinced that his son was up to no good, had his servant, Brainworm, deliver the letter to the youth in his study, with the directions not to reveal that the letter had been opened. Contrary to orders, Brainworm told his young master that old Knowell had read the letter. The young man, delighted with the prospect of high entertainment in the city, gave little thought to what his father might do.

Meanwhile, in the city, Matthew, an urban fool, called on Captain Bobadill, a spurious cavalier who roomed in the low-class lodgings of Cob, a water carrier. Matthew, his taste having been questioned by Downright, a plain-spoken mar-asked for and received instructions in dueling from the braggart, swaggering city captain.

In his house, nearby, Kitley, a merchant, discussed with Downright the dissolute ways of his brother-in-law, Wellbred, who roomed with the Kitleys. Wellbred had become the leader of a group of scoffers, young men who apparently had no respect for anyone or anything; their greatest sport was to discover fools and make sport of them. Kitley feared that his identity with this sporting crew might endanger his business reputation; besides, he was jealous of his wife. When Matthew and Bobadill called for Wellbred, Bobadill insulted Downright in Matthew's behalf. Kitley, cautious, restrained Downright from avenging his honor on the spot.

Brainworm, young Knowell's ally, appeared in Moorfields disguised as a disabled veteran for the purpose of intercepting old Knowell, who he knew would follow young Knowell into the city to spy on him. Brainworm encountered first, however, young Knowell and his cousin Stephen. To the latter he sold a worthless rapier. Soon afterward he encountered old Knowell. The old gentleman, out of pity, hired Brainworm, who had styled himself Fitz-Sword, as a personal servant.

Inside the city wall, their rendezvous the Windmill Tavern in London's Old Jewry, young Knowell revealed to Wellbred that old Knowell had read Wellbred's letter; the pair agreed that the only recourse was to make a joke of the situation. Stephen, Matthew, and Bobadill provided rare fun for young Knowell and Wellbred. Stephen assumed a ridiculous air of melancholy, which he thought befitted a lovesick poet; Matthew, a poetaster, reflected this melancholy in what he thought was the urban manner. Bobadill provided entertainment with preposterous lies about his military experiences and with oaths which especially impressed rustic Stephen. Brainworm joined the group, revealed his true identity to the satisfaction of the duped Stephen, and reported to young Knowell that old Knowell had come to the city and was stopping at the house of Justice Clement.

Kitley, meanwhile, obsessed with a growing fear that his wife might be unfaithful to him, decided to forego a profitable business transaction in another part of the city. Later he changed his mind, but before he left home he ordered his servant, Thomas Cash, to report immediately the coming to the house of Wellbred and his companions, or of any stranger. The young gallants came to the house shortly afterward. Cash, in desperation, enlisted Cob to carry the message to Kitley. Before Cob left, he was thrashed by Bobadill for making a speech against the use of tobacco.

Having received the message at the house of Justice Clement, where he was doing business, Kitley hurried home, plagued by the imagination of a jealous husband. Cob, meanwhile, asked Justice Clement for a warrant for Bobadill's arrest. When Justice Clement learned about Cob's anti-tobacco speech, he sentenced Cob to jail, but through the good services of old Knowell, who was present, Cob received the warrant instead of a jail sentence.

In Kitley's house, Downright reproached his sister, Mistress Kitley, for permitting their brother, Wellbred, to use her house as meeting place for his mad company. Matthew, to the amusement of young Knowell and Wellbred, read bits of stolen verse to Bridget, Kitley's maiden sister. When Downright asked Wellbred and his followers to leave, rapiers were drawn. After Cash and the other servants had separated the antagonists, Bobadill made brave gestures. As Wellbred and his companions left, Kitley entered excitedly and began a search for young Knowell, whose virtues were being praised by Mistress Kitley and Bridget. He feared the women had hidden the young man in the house.

Armed with a warrant and aroused by Kately's husbandly apprehensions, Cob went by his house to see that all was well with his wife Tib. He advised her to remain indoors and not to admit anyone.

Meanwhile Brainworm, as the disabled veteran, returned, at the direction of young Knowell, to inform old Knowell that his son could be apprehended at Cob's house, where an assignation was to take place.

Downright arrived in Moorfields while Bobadill entertained young Knowell, Matthew, and Stephen with unbelievable accounts of his prowess as a swordsman. After Downright disarmed Bobadill easily and thrashed him, Matthew, frightened, ran back to the city. Stephen claimed the russet cloak which Downright left at the scene of the fight.

Back in Old Jewry, Kately continued to be tortured by his jealousy. Brainworm, now disguised as Justice Clement's man, Formal, entered and told Kately that Justice Clement wished to see him immediately. While Kately again admonished Cash to guard the house against all interlopers, Wellbred conspired with Brainworm for the marriage of young Knowell and Bridget. Wellbred, ever seeking amusement at the expense of others, suggested to Mistress Kately that perhaps her husband was a philanderer. At this, Mistress Kately departed to spy on the activities of her husband. Kately returned to find his wife absent, and when he was told that she had gone to Cob's house he followed, fearful that he had been cuckolded. Wellbred took the opportunity, while neither of the Kiteleys was home, to take Bridget to the church.

After their shameful conduct in Moorfields, Bobadill and Matthew met in the city; Bobadill rationalized their cowardice. They encountered Brainworm, still disguised as Formal, and gave him jewelry and clothing to pawn for the price of a warrant to arrest Downright, who they said wore a russet cloak.

The tricks played by Brainworm, young Knowell, and Wellbred began to rebound on the knavish threesome. Old Knowell went to Cob's house, where he was told by the indignant Tib that she knew no Edward Knowell. At the same time, Mistress Kately appeared and was suspected by old Knowell of being young Knowell's mistress. Kately arrived next. He and his wife exchanged bitter words of mistrust, for Kately suspected old Knowell of being his wife's paramour, Mistress Kately accused her husband of dalliance with Tib. Cob appeared and thrashed his wife for not obeying him. As a result of misunderstandings all around, Kately insisted that all concerned present themselves before Justice Clement.

In the meantime, Brainworm, having assumed the disguise of a constable, and accompanied by Matthew and Bobadill, arrested Stephen, who was wearing Downright's russet cloak. Brainworm's mistake was quickly recognized, but when Downright himself approached, Matthew and Bobadill departed in haste. Downright, although Stephen had surrendered the cloak, insisted that the matter be explained to Justice Clement.

Practically all of the principals having gathered in the hall of his house, Justice Clement held an investigation of the misunderstandings which had taken place. Brainworm threw off his disguise and explained his part in the confusion of the day. He was forgiven by his master, old Knowell. Young Knowell and Bridget, now man and wife, entered with Wellbred. Kately and Mistress Kately, as well as Cob and Tib, were reconciled after explanations had been made. Justice Clement, having seen peace and trust re-established, dedicated the ensuing evening to celebration and conviviality.

SAVIOLINA, a lady of the court

Critique:

Every Man in His Humour having been the tremendous success it was, Jonson, possibly urged on by his fellow investors in the theater, wrote Every Man out of His Humour as a companion piece to his earlier success. In this play, produced the following year, Jonson overreached himself: there are too many characters and the plot seems to ramble unconscionably. One explanation for the comparative failure of the play lies in the fact that at the time of its composition Jonson was actively engaged in the so-called War of the Theaters, a controversy in which rival playwrights employed the stage to satirize each other and to ridicule actors of the rival companies. As a play, Every Man out of His Humour is a hodgepodge which manages somehow to work out; as personal satire it no longer holds meaning for the modern audience. Its subject and treatment, however, make it a work of particular interest to historians of literature.

The Story:

Macilente, disgusted by the injustices of society, had fled to the country. As he lay idly under a tree he overheard a conversation between the wealthy young farmer, Sogliardo, and Carlo Buffone, a railing cynic whom the rustic bumpkin had chosen as his guide in becoming a gentleman. Macilente winced at Sogliardo's presumption and at Buffone's callous instructions to the foolish Sogliardo to spend his money liberally, to haunt the taverns, to frequent the theater, to have many creditors, and to assume a melancholy air. Buffone, seeing Macilente and knowing him to be a malcontent, hurried away with Sogliardo, but in departing he told Macilente that they were going to Puntarvolo's house.

Still musing under the tree, Macilente next listened while Sordido, a miserly farmer, consulted his almanac and hoped for rainy weather in order that his hoarded grain might soar in value. A farmhand delivered to Sordido a note, an official order for him to bring his grain to market. Sordido scorned the order and swore that he would hide his surplus harvest.

In front of Puntarvolo's house, Buffone and Sogliardo talked with the braggart courtier, Sir Fastidious Brisk. The three watched with amazement Puntarvolo's return from the hunt. Puntarvolo, an old-fashioned, fantastic knight, was given to extravagances in the form of little homecoming plays which he wrote himself. Assuming the role of a strange knight, Puntarvolo approached his house, inquired about the owner, and heard his virtues praised by his indulgent wife and her women. In another part of the play Puntarvolo wooed his wife in the manner of a knight-errant. Sordido and his son, Fungoso, a law student in the city, appeared. Fungoso was so impressed with the stylish cut of Brisk's clothes that he asked his uncle, Sogliardo, to get him money from Sordido, ostensibly for law books, but actually for a suit of clothes in the latest style. All the while hoping for rain, Sordido reluctantly gave his son money, but not enough.

Reaction varied to Puntarvolo's announcement that he had wagered five thousand pounds at five-to-one odds that he and his wife and their dog could travel to Constantinople and back without a fatal mishap. Buffone saw in this venture material for a colossal joke, while Brisk was interested in investing a hundred pounds in the venture. Fungoso, meanwhile, taken with Brisk's courtly manner and dress, was pleased to learn that his brother-in-law, Deliro, was Brisk's merchant.

The next day Macilente advised his friend Deliro to bridle his doting love for his wife, since this dotage caused the wife, Fallace, to react petulantly to Deliro's affections. Fungoso, wearing a new suit, went to Deliro's house and borrowed money from his sister, Fallace, in order to complete his costume. No sooner had he received the money than Brisk entered in a new suit. Fungoso, frustrated by this new development, wrote his father for more money. Brisk, meanwhile, bragged of his actually non-existent triumphs at court; he also made arrangements with Deliro for mortgaging his land in the country. Fallace, impatient with her work-a-day husband, admired Brisk's courtliness and dreamed of becoming a court lady.

In the aisles of St. Paul's Cathedral, the meeting place of gallants and of small businessmen, Buffone, accompanied by Puntarvolo, tried to find two retainers for his newly-arrived gentleman, Sogliardo. Puntarvolo, who had with him a dog and a cat, explained that his wife had withdrawn from the Constantinople venture and that the cat would go in her place.

Brisk promised to take the hopeful Macilente to court if Macilente would purchase himself a fitting suit of clothes. Actually, it was Macilente's purpose to discover Brisk's true standing at the court. Fungoso and his tailor, ever in pursuit of the latest fashion, studied Brisk's clothes as the knight talked to his companions. And Sogliardo, who desired to have every gentlemanly attainment, retained a braggart down-at-heels rascal, one Shift, as his servant and instructor in the gentle art of smoking tobacco.

The good weather which prevailed in the country became the despair of Sordido. At last, in desperation, he attempted to hang himself, but he was rescued from that folly by the neighboring farmers, who would save him despite his despicable miserliness. The revelation to him of his evil nature caused him to have a change of heart; he vowed to be a kind and generous neighbor henceforward.

Having dressed themselves in new clothes, Brisk and Macilente appeared at the court, Macilente to observe court life and Brisk's deportment. Macilente marveled at the inane discourse between Brisk and Saviolina, a court lady, and he was amused when Saviolina put Brisk out of countenance for his abominable habit of smoking.

Fallace, meanwhile, dreamed of the virtues of courtier Fastidious Brisk and paid no attention to Deliro's efforts to please her. When Macilente told them of Brisk's folly at court, Deliro was determined to foreclose on the knight. Fallace, shocked at Macilente's disloyalty and eager to help Brisk, sent Fungoso, whom she gave money to buy himself a new suit, to warn Brisk of her husband's intentions.

Brisk failed to keep an appointment at the notary's, where he was to contribute a hundred pounds to Puntarvolo's venture. Not finding Brisk immediately, Deliro had time to reconsider his plan. His dotage prevailing, he decided not to foreclose on Brisk and he renounced Macilente's friendship because Macilente, he felt, had unreasonably urged him to be more realistic in his attitude toward his wife. Sogliardo, meanwhile, was delighted with his man Shift, who pretended to be an ex-highwayman, but who was, in reality, a shiftless, cowardly indigent. Brisk made his belated appearance at the notary's, with the explanation that he had been detained by ladies of the court. Fungoso, having gone to see his tailor, had failed in his mission to intercept Brisk.

Puntarvolo prepared for his journey to Constantinople with his dog and cat. Sogliardo, persuaded by Buffone and Brisk that the time had finally come, decided to become a courtier. All of his acquaintances conspired to make a fool of him. Fungoso, in what he thought was the latest fashion, discovered Brisk to be wearing a new suit and was unhappy.

At the palace foolish old Puntarvolo put his dog in the care of a surly groom. Macilente privately obtained the dog from the groom and poisoned it. Brisk and Puntarvolo told Saviolina that they were presenting to her an incomparable courtier, Sogliardo, and that this courtier enjoyed playing the part of a country boor. Confronted by clownish Sogliardo, Saviolina insisted that she could detect the gentleman in him; she was appalled to discover that Sogliardo, who was not aware of the joke, was a rude peasant.

When Puntarvolo missed his dog, he accused Shift of doing away with the animal and threatened to beat the man. Shift, frightened, confessed, to the disenchantment of Sogliardo, that he had never had the courage to commit even one of the crimes of which he had boasted.

At the Mitre Tavern, Buffone, who could not endure the follies and affectations of court life, greeted his companions. Puntarvolo, dejected by the loss of his dog and the loss of his wager, was chaffed by Buffone. In a rage, Puntarvolo sealed Buffone's lips with sealing wax. When the police arrived, everyone tried to flee. Brisk was seized. Fungoso, hiding under a table, was discovered and held to pay the reckoning for all the company had eaten and drunk.

Macilente, seeing in the situation a chance to rid Deliro and Fallace of their humors, sent Deliro to rescue Fungoso at the tavern and Fallace to the jail to comfort Brisk. Deliro paid the bill at the Mitre Tavern. Fungoso declared that he was through with fashion forever. Macilente then sent Deliro to the jail to obtain Brisk's release, after telling him that by so doing Deliro would be reconciled to his wife. At the jail Deliro, seeing Fallace's interest in Brisk, was suddenly awakened from his dotage. Brisk was doomed to serve a term for his debts. Thus the air was cleared and all who had been taken with a specific folly were cured.

Critique:

This drama is one of the few morality plays to survive, thanks to four printed versions of the sixteenth century. In addition, Everyman is almost the only morality play to appeal at all to modern audiences, and it has been produced several times within our century. Like other dramas of this type, it was written to teach a lesson, its characters being personified abstractions of virtue and vice. With the medieval church services largely conducted in Latin, short plays were adapted to moral teaching for the masses.

The Story:

One day a Messenger appeared to announce a moral play on the summoning of Everyman. In the beginning of his life, he declared, man should look to the ending, for we shall see how all earthly possessions avail little in the final reckoning. At first sin looks sweet, but in the end it causes the soul to weep in pain.

Then God spoke. All living creatures were unkind to Him. They lived with no spiritual thought in their worldly possessions. The crucifixion was a lesson they had forgotten. Man had turned to the seven deadly sins, and every year his state grew worse. Therefore, God had decided to have a reckoning of all men, lest mankind should become more brutish than the beasts.

At an imperative summons Death came to receive his instructions. He was ordered to search out every man and tell him that he had to make a pilgrimage to his final reckoning. Death promised to be cruel in his search for each man who lived outside God's law.

Spying Everyman walking unconcernedly about his business, his mind on fleshly lust and treasure, Death bade him stand still and asked him if he had forgotten his Maker. Then Death announced that God had dispatched him in all haste to warn Everyman. Everyman was to make a long journey, and he was to take with him his full book of accounts. He was to be very careful, for he had done many bad deeds and only a few good ones. In Paradise he would soon be forced to account for his life.

Everyman protested that death was farthest from his thoughts at the time. Death was adamant, setting no store by worldly goods or rank, for when he summoned all men must obey. Everyman cried in vain for respite. Then he asked if he must go on the long journey alone. Death assured him that he could take any companions who would make the journey with him. Reminding him that his life was only his on loan, Death said he would return very shortly; in the meantime Everyman would have an opportunity to find possible companions for his journey.

Weeping for his plight and wishing he had never been born, Everyman thought of Fellowship, with whom he had spent so many agreeable days in sport and play. Fortunately he saw Fellowship close by and spoke to him. Seeing Everyman's sad countenance, Fellowship asked his trouble. Everyman told him he was in deep sorrow because he had to make a journey. Fellowship reminded him of their past friendship and vowed that he would go anywhere with him, even to Hell. Greatly heartened, Everyman told him of Death's appearance and his urgent summons. Fellowship thought of the long trip from which there would be no return and decided against accompanying Everyman. He would go with him in sport and play, he declared, or to seek lusty women, but he definitely refused to go on that pilgrimage.

Cast down by this setback, Everyman thought of Kindred. Surely the ties of blood were strong. His Kindred swore that they would help him in any way they could, but when they heard that Everyman had to account for his every deed, good or bad, they knew at once the last journey he had in mind. They refused in one voice to go with him. Everyman appealed directly to his favorite cousin, who said he would have gone willingly if it had not been for a cramp in his toe.

Still reflecting on his woes, Everyman thought of turning to Goods. All his life he had loved Goods. Goods heard his plea and offered to help him, but when asked to go on that journey to the highest judge of all, Goods promptly refused. Everyman reminded him that money is supposed to right all wrongs. Goods disagreed with him. Anyway, if Everyman took Goods with him he would be the worse off, for worldly goods were not given, only lent.

Everyman became ashamed of having sought unworthy companions. Calling aloud to Good-Deeds, he asked again for help. Good-Deeds answered feebly, for he was lying on the cold ground, bound by sins. Good-Deeds already knew of the projected journey and wanted to go along, but he was too weak to stir. It was revealed that Good-Deeds had a sister, Knowledge, who would stay with Everyman until Good-Deeds could regain strength.

Promptly Knowledge offered to go with him and guide him in his great need. Knowledge led him to Confession, who lived in the house of salvation, to ask for strength for Good-Deeds. Confession in pity gave penance to Everyman to shrive his soul. Accepting penance joyfully, Everyman scourged his flesh and afterward Knowledge bequeathed him to his Savior. Thankfully Good-Deeds rose from the ground, delivered from sickness and woe. Declaring himself fit for the journey, Good-Deeds promised to help Everyman count his good works before the judgment throne. With a smile of sympathy Knowledge told Everyman to be glad and merry, for Good-Deeds would be his true companion. Knowledge gave a garment to Everyman to wear, a garment of sorrow which would deliver him from pain.

Asking Good-Deeds if his account were ready, Everyman prepared to start his pilgrimage. Good-Deeds reminded him that three other companions would go part of the way: Discretion, Strength, and Beauty. Knowledge proposed also the Five Wits, who would be his counselors. After Kindred had called the new companions together, Everyman, now well fortified, set out on his last journey.

Knowledge said that their first stop must be to see the priest, who would give Everyman unction and ointment, for priests perform the seven unctions as intermediaries of God. Surely priests were man's best hope on earth, in spite of the many weak and venal people who somehow were invested with holy orders.

After receiving the last rites from the priest, Everyman prepared to meet Death. Again he was troubled, however, for one by one his companions left him. Even Knowledge refused to go with him into the presence of his Maker. Only Good-Deeds stayed with Everyman until the end. So it is with every man who must die. Knowledge, Strength, Beauty—all the other companions are a help in the journey, but only Good-Deeds can face death.

The Angel greeted Everyman as an elected spouse of Jesus. Taking him on high, he announced that Everyman was thus exalted by reason of his singular virtue. When Everyman's soul was taken from his body, his reckoning was crystal clear. So shall it be with every man, if he will only live well before his doom.

Finally a Doctor appeared to remind all men that on the last journey, Beauty, Strength, Discretion, and the Five Wits forsake every man at the end; only Good-Deeds avail at the final judgment.

THE NARRATOR, a visitor

Critique:

One of Poe's greatest stories of terror, "The Fall of the House of Usher" combines plot and setting so that they seem one. From the first sentence to the last, the mood of desolation and impending doom never leaves us. There seems to be a series of climaxes, all building to the last horrible one. Poe's choice of words and his figures of speech, always impressive, here seem even more than usual to set a scene of terror and horror. It is little wonder that this short tale should be considered as one of the world's truly great short stories.

The Story:

As the visitor approached the House of Usher, he was forewarned by the appearance of the old mansion. The fall weather was dull and dreary, the countryside shady and gloomy, and the old house seemed to fit perfectly into the desolate surroundings. The windows looked like vacant eyes staring out over the bleak landscape.

The visitor had come to the House of Usher in response to a written plea from his boyhood friend, Roderick Usher. The letter had told of an illness of body and mind suffered by the last heir in the ancient line of Usher, and although the letter had strangely filled him with dread, the visitor had felt that he must go to his former friend. The Usher family, unlike most, had left only a direct line of descent, and perhaps it was for this reason that the family itself and the house had become one—the House of Usher.

As he approached closer, the house appeared even more formidable to the visitor. The stone was discolored and covered with fungi. The building gave the impression of decay, yet the masonry had not fallen. A barely discernible crack extended in a zigzag line from the roof to the foundation, but otherwise there were no visible breaks in the structure.

The visitor entered the house, gave his things to a servant, and proceeded through several dark passages to the study of the master. There he was stunned at the appearance of his old friend. In Usher's cadaverous face his eyes were liquid, his lips pallid. His web-like hair was untrimmed and floated over his brow. All in all, he was a depressing figure. In manner he was even more morbid. He was afflicted with great sensitivity and some strange fear. There were only a few sounds, a few odors, a few foods, and a few textures in clothing that did not fill him with terror. In fact, he was haunted incessantly by unnamed fears.

Even more strangely, he was imbued with the thought that the house itself exerted great influence over his morale, that it had obtained influence over his spirit. Usher's moodiness was heightened by the approaching death of his sister, Lady Madeline. His only living relative, she was wasting away from a strange malady which baffled the doctors. Often the disease revealed its cataleptic nature. The visitor saw her only once, on the night of his arrival. Then she passed through the room without speaking, and her appearance filled him with awe and foreboding.

For several days the visitor attempted to cheer the sick master of Usher and restore him to health, but it seemed, rather, that the hypochondria suffered by Usher affected his friend. More and more the morbid surroundings and the ramblings of Usher's sick mind preyed upon his visitor. More and more Usher held that the house itself had molded his spirit and that of his ancestors. The visitor was helpless to dispel this morbid fear and was indeed in danger of subscribing to it himself, so powerful was the influence of the gloomy old mansion.

One day Usher informed his friend that Madeline was no more. It was his intention to bury her in one of the vaults under the house for a period of two weeks. The strangeness of her malady, he said, demanded the precaution of not placing her immediately in the exposed family burial plot. The two men took the encoffined body down into the burial vault beneath the house and deposited it upon a trestle. Turning back the lid of the coffin, they took one last look at the lady, and the visitor remarked on the similarity of appearance between her and her brother. Then Usher told him that they were twins and that their natures had been singularly alike. The men then closed the lid, screwed it down securely, and ascended to the upper rooms.

A noticeable change now took possession of Usher. He paced the floors with unusual vigor. He became more pallid, while his eyes glowed with even greater wildness. His voice was little more than a quaver, and his words were utterances of extreme fear. He seemed to have a ghastly secret which he could not share. More and more the visitor felt that Usher's superstitious beliefs about the malignant influence of the house were true. He could not sleep, and his body began to tremble almost as unreasonably as Usher's.

One night, during a severe storm, the visitor heard low and unrecognizable sounds that filled him with terror. Dressing, he had begun to pace the floor of his apartment when he heard a soft knock at his door. Usher entered, carrying a lamp. His manner was hysterical, his eyes those of a madman. When he threw the window open to the storm, they were lifted almost off their feet by the intensity of the wind. Usher seemed to see something horrible in the night, and the visitor picked up the first book that came to hand and tried to calm his friend by reading. The story was that of Ethelred and Sir Launcelot, and as he read the visitor seemed to hear the echo of a cracking and ripping sound described in the story. Later he heard a rasping and grating, of what he knew not. Usher sat facing the door, as if in a trance. His head and his body rocked from side to side in a gentle motion. He murmured some sort of gibberish, as if he were not aware of his friend's presence.

At last his ravings became intelligible. He muttered at first, but spoke louder and louder until he reached a scream. Madeline was alive. He had buried Madeline alive. For days he had heard her feebly trying to lift the coffin lid. Now she had escaped her tomb and was coming in search of him. At that pronouncement, the door of the room swung back and on the threshold stood the shrouded Lady Madeline of Usher. There was blood on her clothing and evidence of superhuman struggle. She ran to her terrified brother, and the two fell to the floor in death.

The visitor fled from the house in terror. He gazed back as he ran and saw the house of horror split asunder in a zigzag manner, down the line of the crack he had seen as he first looked upon the old mansion. There was a loud noise, like the sound of many waters, and the pond at its base received all that was left of the ruined House of Usher.

THE FAMILY AT GILJE

Critique:

Ranking with Ibsen and Björnson, among nineteenth-century Scandinavian writers, Jonas Lie, unlike the other two, dealt almost exclusively with realistic effects. He was himself in many respects a romanticist, but that part of his personality did not often intrude into his novels. In The Family at Gilje the author portrayed the life of his neighbors, not moralizing or preaching but nevertheless changing attitudes and prejudices. His readers seem to experience the problems of characters in his stories, instead of merely witnessing them. It was this ability to project his readers into the plot that made Lie famous in his own time as well as in the present.

The Story:

It was obvious that Inger-Johanna was her father's favorite. He was an army captain, in charge at Gilje. When a fellow officer, Captain Rönnow, stopped at the house, Captain Jäger was delighted because the guest seemed so charmed by Inger-Johanna. Mrs. Jäger was a sister of the governor, and Captain Rönnow told the Jägers that he would petition the governor's wife, with whom he was in favor, to take Inger-Johanna into their home for a year, so that she could learn the ways of society in the city. Gilje was a deserted mountain post and not at all suitable for a young lady of Inger-Johanna's obvious charms.

Captain Jäger wanted his beloved daughter to visit her aunt, but when he learned the cost of the new clothing required, he stormed at his poor wife and could not be quieted. Perhaps his blustering was caused by sorrow at losing his favorite, even though he was happy that she would have such a fine opportunity.

Before Inger-Johanna left, she met a student named Arent Grip, the son of an old friend of her father's. In spite of his radical ideas, the girl found him interesting and was glad that he too would be in the city.

After the departure of his oldest daughter, the captain's house was desolate, for Thinka, another daughter, had gone to work for a judge in Ryfylke. Poor Jörgen, the only son, and a younger daughter were put through hours of lessons to ease their father's loneliness.

Each letter from Inger-Johanna was read again and again. After her first shyness had worn off, she loved her life in the city. Parties and balls delighted her. Both Captain Rönnow and Arent Grip were present at many of the functions, her aunt having secured a place for Grip in her husband's office. The aunt wrote also, confiding that she secretly hoped a match would develop between the girl and Rönnow, who was advancing rapidly and would be a good catch. The aunt was not so fond of Grip. She found him too spirited and unrestrained in expressing his unpopular ideas. But Inger-Johanna had completely won over her aunt, who insisted that the girl return home for a visit and then come back to the city for another season.

During his daughter's visit Captain Jäger was almost gay. Grip called on the family again and arranged to spend much time alone with Inger-Johanna. They took a surveying trip into the mountains with her father and Jörgen, and Grip found Jörgen a bright lad who deserved a better education. In his talks with Inger-Johanna, Grip claimed that fundamentals were all that mattered in life, not the external symbols of success. He wanted people to be themselves, not influenced by worldly values.

Inger-Johanna returned to the city before Thinka came home for a visit. The younger daughter had fallen in love with a young clerk in her uncle's office, but when her relative learned of the affair, he fired the clerk, who was poor and without prospects. Thinka thought often of him after her return home. Her parents urged her to forget him.

Sheriff Gülcke called at Gilje and found Thinka attractive. Because his wife had died only three months before, he could say nothing so soon after his loss; but during his stay he often cast an appreciative eye toward Thinka. She, in the meantime, wrote long letters to her sister, to tell of her love for the poor clerk, for whom she had promised to wait. Inger-Johanna, tiring of balls and city life, wrote that she remained only to please her aunt. Grip had changed her way of thinking, making her see the uselessness of such a life.

Jörgen went to the city to school. Grip tutored him, but said that Jörgen should be sent to England or to America to learn a mechanic's trade, because that was the field in which he had great talent. Later Jörgen did sail for England, then to America, a fact which Captain Jäger forever held against Grip.

Thinka was right in her fear that she would never be allowed to marry her clerk. Sheriff Gülcke asked for her hand, and because she was without will to deny her father's wishes, she accepted the older man. After the marriage she was a good and faithful wife, acting almost as a nurse to her husband. He was kind to her and gave her her every desire, but her heart was sad. Inger-Johanna, sorry that her sister had no will of her own, refused to accept the idea that women were to bend to the will of their fathers and husbands.

Inger-Johanna was soon to be tested. Captain Rönnow wrote her father for her hand. It was the proudest moment of Captain Jäger's life. At first Inger-Johanna accepted, for Grip had made no proposal and she knew that Rönnow was the man her father desired for her. Before the wedding, however, she returned suddenly from the city. She admitted to herself and to her family that she could love no one but Grip and could not marry Rönnow. Although her father was bitterly disappointed, he could not force his favorite daughter to marry against her will. Sorrowfully he wrote his old friend his decision.

From that day on Captain Jäger's health rapidly failed. He suffered dizziness and weakness. He was forced to take a leave of absence from his military duties. One day his carriage did not return home. When the servant went to look for him, he found the horse standing at the foot of Gilje hill, the reins loose on the ground. The captain of Gilje was dead.

Twenty years passed. Mrs. Jäger was dead and Jörgen doing well in America. Inger-Johanna, a schoolteacher, taught the children the ideas and ideals she had learned from Grip. He, meanwhile, wandered over the land, a drunkard and an ascetic by turn. He carefully avoided Inger-Johanna, but constantly sought news of her. Finally he went to her school and stood by the window to hear the sound of her voice. He saw her face again as she looked out into the night. He left then, sick with pneumonia. When word of his illness reached Inger-Johanna, she went to him and nursed him until his death. Often he was irrational, at times completely lucid. After his death she knew that he had given her her only reason for living, her spirit for truth and freedom.

THE FAMILY REUNION

Type of work: Drama

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888- )

Type of plot: Symbolic allegory

Time of plot: Twentieth century

Locale: England

First published: 1939

Principal characters:

AMY, LADY MONCHENSEY, an old lady

HARRY, her son

AGATHA, her sister

DOWNING, Harry's servant

MARY, Amy's ward

Critique:

This play, with references and images borrowed from the Orestes story, has many of the attributes of Greek tragedy. There is a chorus; the Eumenides take a part; and the tone is fatalistic. More than this, however, the treatment is poetical enough to allow complex meanings within a simple dramatic framework. One theme is the decay of an English gentle family, bound by conservatism. Another is the search man makes for a way of life. Probably the whole meaning is to be approached only through allegory. Eliot, in The Family Reunion, shows those rare gifts which have made him one of the truly great poets of our time.

The Story:

Amy, Lady Monchensey, was reluctant to have the lights turned on. She had to sit in the house from October until June, for in winter the sun rarely warmed the cold earth of northern England. Since all she could do was measure time, she hardly wanted to make night come too soon.

The whole family, except her three sons, had gathered to celebrate her birthday, and the sons were expected that evening. The conversation while they waited out the time was tasteless. Gerald and Charles, Amy's brothers-in-law, felt that the younger generation did not accept its responsibilities. Ivy and Violet, her younger sisters, agreed that youth was becoming decadent. When they asked Mary her opinion, as a representative of the new generation, Amy's ward was nettled. Nearing thirty, she had always been poor and had remained unmarried; she thought she belonged to no generation.

Amy lived only to keep Wishwood, the family estate, together. Since her husband's death, she had been head of the house. She knew her family, settled in its ways, was getting older; soon death would come as a surprise for them all. Only Agatha, her other sister, seemed to find a meaning in death. Harry, the oldest son, had been gone eight years. Amy hoped he could drop back into the old routine at the family home, but Agatha was doubtful. The past was over; the future could be built only on the present. When Harry came back he could not take up life where he left off, because he would be a new Harry.

The others began speculating. None had liked Harry's wife, a demanding woman who had persuaded him to take her away from Wishwood. On their travels she had been lost at sea, apparently swept overboard in a storm. Amy said they must feel no remorse for her death.

Harry surprised them by being the first of the sons to arrive. When he seemed upset because the blinds were not drawn, the others reminded him that in the country there was no one to look in. But Harry kept staring at the window. He could see the Eumenides, the vengeful spirits. They had been with him a long time, but only at Wishwood could he see them. He greeted the assembled company with an effort.

Harry became impatient when the relatives began talking of all the old things waiting at home for him. Nothing had ever happened to them; they had gone through life half asleep. Harry, however, was doing some soul searching. In mid-Atlantic he had pushed his wife overboard. Now the Furies were always with him.

Only Agatha seemed to understand him. The others thought him overtired and urged him to go lie down for a while. When he left, they decided to invite Dr. Warburton for dinner so that the family doctor could have a look at him.

Charles and Gerald called in Downing, Harry's servant, to question him. Violet and Ivy objected because they feared scandal. Agatha, however, made no objection, because questioning Downing was as irrelevant as calling in Dr. Warburton. Downing seemed to be frank. He hardly thought Harry's wife had had the courage to commit suicide, and while he was a little distraught, Harry had always appeared normal. The only thing amiss that Downing had noticed was that Harry had always been too much with his wife.

Mary appealed to Agatha for help in getting away from Wishwood. She knew that Amy wanted her to stay on and marry Harry; in that way Amy would have a tame daughter-in-law for a companion. But Agatha refused help. Mary should have had the courage to leave earlier; since Harry had returned she could not run away.

When Harry talked with Mary about his fears and doubts, she tried to understand his feeling that change was inevitable. They reminisced of the hollow tree in which they had played as children and of their regret when Amy had it cut down. Harry saw the Furies again in the window embrasure. Startled by his manner, Mary pulled back the curtains to show that nothing was there.

Dr. Warburton came early for dinner to have a confidential talk with Harry. He tried to attack Harry's disturbance indirectly by warning him that Amy's health was very poor and that Harry must take the burden of Wishwood off her shoulders. Harry recalled the unpleasantness of his boyhood when being good meant pleasing Amy. Abruptly, he demanded to know something of his father. The old doctor assured him that there had been no scandal. His father and mother had just agreed to separate, and his father had gone abroad to die.

A police sergeant came to tell the family that John, having suffered a slight concussion in an auto accident, could not be there for the birthday dinner. Although the family buzzed with the news, Harry shocked them with his statement that it hardly mattered because his brother John was unconscious all the time anyway.

A long-distance call came from Arthur, the other brother. He had been in an accident too, and his license had been suspended for drunken driving.

Still troubled about his father, Harry pressed Agatha for more details. Agatha remembered his father's failings, but his mother had complemented his weaknesses. Then Agatha lost her repressions and told the truth. While Amy was pregnant with Harry, her husband had plotted to kill her. Agatha had talked him out of his scheme; she could not bear to think of destroying the new life Amy was carrying.

At that news Harry felt a great release, for the curse of the house seemed clearer. When the Eumenides appeared again, Harry was no longer frightened. He knew at last that the Furies were not pursuing him; he was following them. Harry decided to leave Wishwood.

Amy, furious at the news that Harry was going away, blamed Agatha, the younger sister who had stolen her husband thirty-five years ago and now was taking her son.

Mary pleaded with Agatha to stop Harry's departure, but to no avail; Harry had crossed the frontier of reality. Then Mary asked her help in getting a situation, perhaps a fellowship, so she could leave too. As the two women became more confidential, they each revealed they had also seen the Eumenides. That knowledge was a bond uniting them outside the stifling confines of Wishwood. When they talked with Downing, he confessed he had seen the Furies but he had paid little attention to them; they were Harry's ghosts.

Just before she died, Amy began to understand what was happening at Wishwood. Agatha and Mary brought in the birthday cake and blew out the candles as they circled around it. The rest of the family began talking about the will.

William Henry Hudson wrote his autobiography while in bed during a six-weeks' illness. On the second day of his illness, beginning to have a clear and vivid vision of his childhood, he decided to write out the picture. The vision stayed with him, and, between bouts of fever and sleep, he continued to record the impressions he had of his early life on the pampas of Argentina. The result was aptly named Far Away and Long Ago, for he was an old man writing of his life between the years of three and sixteen. This book, revealing Hudson as a naturalist, a poet, and a mystic, is written in the beautiful and limpid prose of which he was a master.

The Story:

W. H. Hudson's father was a colonist in South America, engaged in raising cattle, running a store, and being so amiable to everyone that he finally lost almost all his possessions. The mother was a stanchly religious New Englander, known in the whole section south of Buenos Aires as a good woman and kind friend. Hudson's parents loved people so well that their house became a regular stopping place for all travelers.

Even in childhood Hudson was interested in people of all sorts and in every kind of bird, animal, and insect. Though there were many children in the family, he himself was almost a solitary wanderer. At one time his mother, who shared his intense love of nature, was worried because he often stood alone and transfixed. Finally she followed him, only to find he was watching a bird on its nest; she was satisfied that he was not eccentric but that he merely wanted to be by himself.

Hudson believed that in little children the sense of smell was as important to their pleasure as sight and sound. To him, as far back as he could remember, the smells of the pampas grasses and flowers, of the cattle and horses, of the garlic and cumin-seed seasoning, of the Saladero or slaughtering grounds were as vivid as the coloring of the parakeets and flamingos, the feel of bristly thistleweed, or the lovely sounds of flocks of pipits.

The house in which he was born was called "The Twenty-five Ombu Trees" because that many huge, century-old Ombu trees around the house made the place a landmark on the open pampas. There was also one other tree on the place—an unnamed variety—which blossomed so freely and deliciously each November that neighbors, smelling the blossoms on the wind, would come to beg a branch to perfume their own houses.

When the family moved, Hudson found around his second home many other kinds of trees, black acacia, Lombardy poplar, red willow, peach, pear. These he came to love by smell, sight, and touch when he was still too small to wander far from the house.

There were birds—hawks, cowbirds, doves, pigeons, eagles, pipits—and animals, domestic and wild, to entertain him. There were thousands of rats nearby that had to be smoked out periodically. One day, while the men were pouring deadly fumes down the rat holes, Hudson was watching. Suddenly he saw a small armadillo trying to escape by furiously digging a new hole. He caught hold of its scaly tail and tried to pull the animal backwards. The armadillo paid no attention to him but kept on digging, kicking the dirt back into his face. Before long Hudson found himself pulled to the ground as he clung stubbornly to the animal's tail. The contest was small-boy pride against animal desperation, and it was not until his arm had been pulled down into the hole that Hudson let go.

He found snakes fascinating, particularly a colony that lived under the flooring of the house. As he lay in bed, he could hear them moving around, and he often wondered whether they would coil around his legs if he slid to the floor. Until he fell asleep, he could hear their conversations go on, conversations that were a series of sighing sounds, then twenty or thirty ticks, then the sighing sounds again.

When he was six years old, he was given a pony and allowed to roam at will over the pampas. His interests in nature increased, as did his acquaintance with new species.

He also learned to know people better because he learned that his neighbors were invariably kind to a little boy who wanted only to find out what new birds were around.

One place he visited often was Los Alamos, near a stream that was a delight to him because of the running water, the earthly odors, and the numbers of birds. Doña Pascuala lived at Los Alamos; she was old and wrinkled, her hair white, and her face as brown as the cigar she had constantly in her mouth. She was always interested in the Hudsons. One day she came to tell them that rain which had fallen for weeks would surely stop soon. Her saint was St. Anthony, and she had always treated him well with candles, flowers, and devotion. And this was how he treated her! She thought it was time he learned how so much water felt; she had tied a string to his legs and let him down the well with his head in the water, and there he would stay until the rain stopped.

The Hudsons' nearest neighbors were the Royds, the husband a handsome Englishman who wanted to make his fortune from cheese made of sheep's milk, and the wife a huge, indolent woman, a native of good birth. They had colored servants and two daughters. Their younger daughter was, Hudson thought, the most beautiful child he had ever seen. Her constant companion was a child of her own age, a mulatita, as dark as the white child was fair, with features so refined that no one supposed her father had been anything but a handsome Englishman.

The family and servants lived happily together, but the native servants thought it below them to milk sheep and the cheese project fell through. Then Mr. Royd went to Buenos Aires and slit his throat. His wife considered her meeting with him in her girlhood the great calamity of her life.

As he grew older, Hudson came to know Don Evaristo Peñalva, who was regarded as the grand old man of the plains. At first it was a little difficult for Hudson to reconcile his religious teachings with Don Evaristo's home life, but he realized that all the countryside thought well of the old man who, when called upon, always responded in time of need. The thing that worried young Hudson was that Don Evaristo had six wives all living happily together.

About the time Hudson was fifteen, he caught typhus fever while on a visit to Buenos Aires, an unsanitary town on a plain with no water to be had other than the silted river water bought by the bucketful at the door. While he was ill, he began to realize that he might have to leave all the pleasures of childhood behind him. Before he could reason with himself that he could keep his reactions to nature and make them the basis of his life's work, he was brought down with a case of rheumatic fever so acute that the doctors despaired of his life. The disease left him with a permanently weak heart. He went through a bad time trying to straighten out his religious beliefs until an older brother came back from England and brought him up-to-date on the course of religion vs. science, the battle being fought over Darwin's Origin of Species. Then he worked out a philosophy of life which convinced him that he was a mystic. That belief served to make life easier for a man who did not know whether he had one or fifty years left to him.

Critique:

This play deals with the problem of a man's relationships with his mother and his wife. Rejected by his own mother, the captain had tried to find a mother-wife, who, assuming that role, rejected the lover-husband. Since the wife loathed her role of wife, she tried to undermine the man who had destroyed her maternal relationship to him. The problem here is the battle of the sexes which concerned

Strindberg in most of his work. Also a factor in the domestic relationship is the antagonism of science and religion, with the wife showing ignorance and suspicion of the former. The theme of the play is initiated by a relatively trivial problem; that of Nöjd's paternity, which expands first into a study of marital differences and then into an analysis of antagonism between Man and Woman.

The Story:

When a trooper named Nöjd got a servant girl in trouble, the Captain sent an orderly to bring Nöjd to face the Pastor. The culprit, vague about his affair with Emma, hinted that the paternity of her child was uncertain. The Pastor told Nöjd that he would have to support the child, but the soldier claimed that Ludwig should contribute also, since it was possible that Ludwig was the real father. The Captain declared angrily that the case would go to court. After Nöjd had gone, the Captain berated the Pastor for his gentle treatment of the soldier. The Pastor said he thought it a pity to saddle Nöjd with the support of a child if he were not the real father.

The Captain was married to the Pastor's sister Laura. In his house, complained the Captain, there were too many women: his mother-in-law, a governess, old nurse Margaret, his daughter Bertha. The Captain, worried about his daughter's education, which was being influenced in all different directions by the people around her, deplored the incessant struggle between men and women.

After the Pastor had gone, Laura entered to collect her household money. His affairs near bankruptcy, the Captain asked her to keep an account of the money she spent. Laura asked him his decision about Bertha's education. Laura objected when he announced his intention to send her to town to board with Auditor Säfberg, a freethinker, but the Captain reminded her that a father had the sole control of his children. When Laura brought up the subject of Nöjd's affair, the Captain admitted that the paternity would be difficult to decide. Laura scoffingly claimed that if such were the case even the child of a married woman could be any other man's offspring.

Laura confided to Dr. Östermark, the new village doctor, her suspicion that her husband was mentally ill. He bought books he never read, and he tried to fathom events on other planets by peering through a microscope. He had become a man who could not stand by his decisions, although he was most vehement when he first uttered one.

Speaking privately with his old nurse, the Captain expressed his fear that his family was plotting against him and that something evil was about to happen.

The family quarrel was clearly outlined when Bertha complained to her father that her grandmother was trying to teach her spiritualism and had even told the girl that the Captain, who was a meteorologist by profession, was a charlatan. Bertha agreed with her father that she ought to go away to study, but Laura boasted that she could persuade Bertha to stay home. She hinted again that she could prove the Captain was not Bertha's father.

Dr. Östermark explained to Laura that she had been mistaken about her husband; he had used a spectroscope, not a microscope, to examine the elements on other planets. Still, the doctor said, he would watch the Captain for further signs of insanity. Laura also told the doctor that the Captain feared he was not Bertha's father; quite obviously Laura had planted this idea in the Captain's mind. When he began to worry over his daughter's paternity, old Margaret tried to reassure him.

It became impossible for the Captain to allow his wife to continue her persecution of him. She had intercepted some of his mail, thereby thwarting him in the progress of his scientific ventures. He further accused her of spreading among his friends the idea that he was insane. Afraid that under such provocation he might lose his reason, he appealed to his wife's selfishness. It would be to her best interests for him to remain sane, he said, since insanity might lead to his suicide, which would invalidate her right to collect his life insurance. She could assure his sanity by confessing that Bertha was not his child, a suspicion which was undermining his sanity.

When she refused to admit a sin of which she was not guilty, he reminded her that in doing so she would gain sole control of Bertha's future. The tables were turned. Now the Captain began to believe that Bertha was not his child and Laura began to insist that she was. The Captain, recalling the circumstances of Bertha's birth, recollected how a solicitor had told Laura that she had no right of inheritance without a child. At that time the Captain had been ill. When he recovered, Bertha had been born.

The Captain understood the power his wife had held over him. He had loved her at first as he would love a mother; she had loathed him after he became her lover. Laura showed him a letter she had forged in which he confessed his insanity and said that she had sent the letter to court. Boasting that she had employed him only as a breadwinner, she declared that she would use his pension for Bertha's education. In anger, the Captain hurled a lamp at her.

Laura succeeded in locking her husband in another room while she examined his private papers. Although the Pastor saw through her scheme, she dared him to accuse her. The doctor arrived with a strait jacket shortly before the Captain, armed with literary evidence of cases in which a child's paternity had been questioned, burst into the room. His talk was so erratic and his raving about conjugal fidelity so wild that when the doctor told him he was insane, the Captain acknowledged his own madness.

Bertha, accusing him of a deliberate attempt to injure her mother, announced that he was not her father if he behaved so badly. The Captain, in reply, told her that her soul was in two parts; one was a reflection of his own, and to preserve it he intended to destroy the part which was not his. He seized a revolver but found it empty. Bertha ran out screaming.

Old Margaret soothed the raving man by talking softly to him of his childhood, and when he was off guard she slipped the strait jacket on him. Seeing him seated, helpless and dejected, on the sofa, Laura nearly repented the course she had taken as the Captain piteously described his life of torment with mother, wife, and child, all of whom had rejected him. After she had assured him that Bertha was his own child, the Captain, calling to old Margaret for comfort, suffered a stroke. As he lay unconscious Bertha ran to her mother, who caressed her and called the girl her own daughter.

Critique:

The Fields is the second novel in a trilogy, beginning with The Trees and ending with The Town, which traces the growth of a pioneer settlement in Ohio. In The Fields the primeval trees have begun to disappear and farming becomes important. The settlement builds a meeting house and a school, and cabins spring up close to each other along the riverbank. Sayward Wheeler is still the mainstay of her family and of the settlement as well, but Portius, her husband, begins to assume an important position as a schoolteacher and a lawyer. Very little of historical importance happens in the novel, but the reader can feel the gradual lightening of the pioneers' minds as they come out from under the trees and slowly build up their community.

The Story:

Portius Wheeler's family had written from Boston to the trader at the post near Sayward's cabin to inquire about the woods girl Portius was living with. Sayward told the trader to write back that she was a woods girl, all right, and she could not read or write, that she had married Portius legally even if the ceremony had taken place while Portius was drunk, but that she was not keeping him from returning to the Bay State because she had not known that his family had written Portius to come home. She said Portius could have gone back if he had had a mind to, but since he wanted to remain she was staying with him.

Genny helped Sayward when the Wheelers' first boy was born. At the time Portius had gone on business to the territory seat. He was away for days. Knowing he was no woods man, Sayward remembered stories of Indian atrocities along the trace. When he finally came home, he would not look at his son, but in his powerful voice told Sayward that the Chillicothe convention had ratified the constitution. Now they lived in Ohio State. He warmed so to his subject of politics and government in the wilderness that he scared the baby, who yelled until Portius had to look at his son. It was a question of who was the more scared, father or child. Sayward thought Portius should get used to children because she intended to fill the cabin with them.

The handiest meeting place the neighbors had when a circuit rider came around was a sawmill, open to the sky and hemmed in by trees, but Sayward felt that the Lord knew it was His place when folks gathered there. Genny felt His presence too as she sang the hymns, with her beautiful voice reaching out farther than any other. Sayward could not believe it was Genny singing; that was the first time Genny had sung since her husband, Louie Scurrah, went off to the English lakes with her sister Achsa. Portius, a disbeliever, refused to go to the meeting, but Sayward took her son with her and had him christened Resolve.

Sayward had three boys and a girl by the time their township was formed. On Old Christmas Portius asked everybody in the settlement to come to his cabin to make out a taxing list. That was what Sayward liked, a lot of people in the house, particularly in winter when a body was not apt to see neighbors often. They made a party of it. By the time the men worked out the taxing list, everybody realized that their township was a reality.

THE FIELDS by Conrad Richter. By permission of the publishers, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Copyright, 1945, 1946, by Conrad Richter.

Sayward named her first girl for her lost sister Sulie. Sayward's Sulie was the liveliest and brightest child she had ever seen, but she never forgot the tokens she had had before Sulie was born. Resolve thought he had seen a strange little black boy, all dressed in white, peeking in the window. The day before Sulie was born, Resolve saw his first colored man, a new hired man in the settlement. He could not stop talking about Caesar's color. When her blonde baby girl came, Sayward could only sigh with relief. Sulie was burned to death when she was about three years old. Resolve, seeing her charred body in the coffin, pulled at his mother's skirts to show her that it was not their Sulie lying there but the colored boy who had peeked in the window.

The farmers complained so much about night dogs and other wild animals getting their stock that they banded together for one big hunt. Men, closing in from four sides, chased the animals down into a low place called the Sinks. There they fired on the beasts until nothing moved. Wyitt, with a new rifle much like Louie's, joined in the hunt. Later on he realized that there would be no more game left in the woods and he decided to follow his father and head west. He hated not saying goodbye to Sayward, but he was afraid she might keep him on the farm if he did.

The winter Sayward had five children living and one dead followed a cold summer when the crops could not grow. No one had enough meal to last. Portius took Resolve with him into Kentucky when a number of the men from the settlement went there to get meal on credit. The men were gone so long that Sayward had no food left for the children. Weak because she had fed the young ones instead of herself, she went out and shot a turkey, though she could barely hold the gun. Resolve did not come back with Portius. He had broken his leg and had to stay in Kentucky.

The next time the circuit rider came around, the sawmill had been deserted and sprouts had grown up to stand between the meeting-folk and the preacher. Sayward gave a piece of land, over next to the burying ground where Jary and Sulie lay, for a meeting house. When the men built it she could see it from her doorstep.

The day Resolve came home he went with his father to Judah MacWhirter's. Jude had been wolf-bitten by a slobbering night dog he caught in his cattle pen. Three weeks later his fits had begun. Between times he was rational and wanted Portius to help him make a will. The night Resolve was there, Jude had to be tied to his bed because his fits were coming faster. Resolve never forgot Jude's dying after begging someone to kill him before he hurt anyone he loved.

Portius and the children wanted Sayward to sell her place and move to the new town upriver, but she could not leave her fields. Instead, she persuaded Portius to start a school, primarily because Resolve wanted so much to learn that he deliberately broke his leg again to have time to read. Portius kept school for a year until his law practice in Tateville grew so large that he spent a good deal of time there. About that time Sayward decided that seven living children were enough and she was not sleeping with Portius.

The children heard that Portius was seeing the new lady schoolteacher who had taken over his school, but they could not tell Sayward. When Mistress Bartram hurriedly married Jake Tench, Sayward insisted upon going to the wedding because she felt sorry for a girl who had to get married and who was obviously not marrying her child's father. Genny told Sayward that folks were saying Portius was the father.

She worked out her feeling of shame without saying anything to Portius. When Sayward's baby Mercy was small, Jake had a celebration for his keelboat, the first built in the township. Sayward, hating to face Jake's wife with the baby that filled the gap between Dezia and Mercy, could not stay home. She had heard that Jake's wife seldom left her cabin, but she was surprised not to find her at Jake's party.

Riding down the river on the keel-boat, Sayward realized that a real town was springing up along the river. Now her children no longer deviled her about moving to Tateville. And Portius, after making a fine speech in honor of Jake's industry, was solicitous of her comfort on the boat ride.

THE FISHER MAIDEN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Björnsterne Björnson (1832-1910)

Type of plot: Pastoral romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Norway

First published: 1868

Principal characters:

PETRA, the fisher maiden

GUNLAUG, her mother

PEDRO, her father

HANS ÖDEGAARD, the pastor's son

Critique:

Björnson's name stands high among Norwegian writers. His ability seems to come not so much from artfully contriving a clever plot or from outlining dramatic scenes, but rather from a deep-bodied spiritual love for mankind which expresses itself in the pastoral and the romantic. In this novel one feels tempestuous simplicity in Petra, the simplicity of the Norwegian peasant who knows the routine of the seasons, the poetry and drama of the church—as reflected in the rites of baptism, confirmation, marriage, and death—and also the passionate simplicity of her devotion to her dramatic art.

The Story:

Pedro Ohlsen, the son of Peter Ohlsen and the grandson of old Per Ohlsen, was not like either his father or his grandfather. They had tended to their businesses like the shrewd, practical men they were. But Pedro was a dreamer. Scolded from morning to night by his father and his schoolfellows, he began to seek out the poor children in the community for companions, among them a sprite-like girl named Gunlaug, whom people called the fisher maiden.

Peter died, leaving enough money for his widow and Pedro to live quietly without working. Pedro devoted his time to flute playing. He and the fisher maiden separated after a quarrel; she thought him a weakling. She left the town.

Nine years later she returned with a child, Petra, a little girl who also became known as the fisher maiden.

One day Petra, audacious as her mother had been, went to steal apples from a tree belonging to Pedro Ohlsen. He caught her and identified her as the child of his lost love. When Petra escaped, she told her mother of the encounter. Gunlaug told her never again to speak to Pedro Ohlsen.

Hans Ödegaard, the pastor's son, asked permission to teach Petra to read, and under his guidance she learned rapidly. Hans was disturbed, for a tragedy had befallen his best friend, and in his grief he could not be persuaded to take up his career. His indifference was a bitter thing for his father, the old pastor. Petra wept when at last Hans left the village. She did not know why.

Young men came to woo Petra. Gunnar, the sailor, was one of her suitors. Another was a stranger who kept his name from her and who mystified her with strange songs and tales. Finally he gave her a gold chain and told her his name was Yngve Vold. Unlike Gunnar, who was poor, Yngve Vold owned his own ship. Both went suddenly to sea. At last Yngve returned and told her that he intended to marry her. He was the richest man in the town. His wealth frightened Petra, for she knew many of the townspeople would not approve of the marriage of the wealthy shipowner and the fisher maiden.

At the same time Gunnar sent her a ring and a love letter. Before she could decide between her two suitors, however, Hans Ödegaard returned, and she realized that he was the man she loved the most.

The next day Hans beat Yngve with his cane for announcing his plan to marry Petra. Hans then told Petra that his life was ruined, for she had betrayed him. Gunnar returned, and he, too, beat Yngve Vold. The whole town buzzed with the gossip that Petra had three men engaged to her, all at the same time.

A mob went to Gunlaug's house and threw stones through Petra's window. Gunlaug aided her daughter to escape from the town by dressing her as a sailor, and Pedro rowed her out to a boat that would take her to Bergen, where she was not known.

In Bergen, Petra was greatly humiliated. The theater attracted her, but because she was awkward and unlettered no theater manager would hire her. At last she left Bergen and made her home among shepherds to the north. A pastor took her in for a time. He was a friend of Hans Ödegaard; and when he learned that Petra also knew Hans, he permitted her to stay in his household. There, for the next three years, she studied the great plays under the pastor and his daughter Signe. At last, however, the pastor became suspicious of Petra and suspected that she was artfully concealing secret admirers. At that difficult time Hans arrived. Signe had brought Hans to the village, for in her letters she had gently explained how much Petra had suffered.

He gradually forgave Petra the harm she had done him and encouraged her desire to go on the stage. Then Pedro Ohlsen died and left Petra enough money to begin her career. Taking her courage from her experience with suffering and her knowledge of life, she followed her greatest desire, happy at the same time in the knowledge that Signe would marry Hans Ödegaard.

FOMA GORDYEEFF, a gilded youth

IGNAT, his father

MAYAKIN, his godfather

EZHOFF, a brilliant youth

LIUBOFF, Mayakin's daughter

Critique:

Foma Gordyeeff is a study of gilded youth. Foma, the hero, is drawn with profound insight. Ironically, Foma ruins himself not by his worst instincts but by truth and innate nobility. In a similarly keen fashion Gorky describes the rise of the merchant class and the beginnings of the radical intellectuals who gave impetus to the Russian Revolution. Most of the scene centers around the Volga. Although local color enters largely into the work, the moral basis of the novel is universal.

The Story:

Ignat began as a water pumper, but by the time he was forty he was a rich owner of barges and tugs and a determined and ruthless trader on the exchange. At times, however, he was subject to fits of depression when he would carouse with the dregs of the city; sometimes he would exult fiercely when one of his barges burned. He was a huge man with boundless energy. His greatest disappointment was that he had no son; his fat wife had borne only daughters who had died in infancy.

When he was forty-three his wife suddenly died, and within six months he had found a young bride. Natalya was tall and handsome, brought up in a cult of milk drinkers. She was dutiful but mysterious. Although ordinarily submissive, she had strength of character which made boisterous Ignat afraid to beat her. She died after the birth of Foma, Ignat's long-desired son.

Until he was six, Foma was brought up in his godfather Mayakin's house. Under the watchful, stupid eye of a female relative, he played unimaginatively with Liuboff, Mayakin's daughter. Ignat took back his son then, and Foma's Aunt Anfisa looked after him. Anfisa told him many fanciful tales which whetted the young boy's imagination.

When he was eight Foma discussed the family business with Ignat and was cast down that his father was only a river merchant instead of a pirate. To clear up his misapprehensions, Ignat took the boy on a business trip down the river. Foma got along well with the peasants until he told his father how one worker had been uncomplimentary to the capitalistic class. Ignat knocked the worker down. This incident always seemed brutal to the boy.

At school Foma made two friends: Smolin, a fat, rich boy, and Ezhoff, a quick-thinking poor boy. Foma kept up rather well in his classes because Ezhoff helped him study and prompted him during recitations. In and out of school pranks, Foma was a daring leader. His courage was due in part to his father's wealth, but he was really honest and fearless. As he grew up, Liuboff was the only girl he knew. Mayakin hoped that they would marry and unite the two family fortunes.

When Foma was not yet twenty, Ignat put him in charge of a trading expedition and told the tug captain to keep an eye on the young man. Foma quickly established his superiority over the older captain and took complete command. He did quite well, except that he was often too generous in giving grain to the peasants. He noticed on deck one night a peasant woman with attractive eyes. Although she was older than he, Foma desired to meet her and the captain arranged to have her come to Foma's cabin at night. The woman was thirty, delightfully mature to the naïve Foma. He left her with regret when Mayakin sent a message requiring him to come home as soon as possible.

Mayakin told Foma that his father was in the clutches of a designing woman who had already got large sums of money from him. At first Foma was afraid that Ignat had taken a mistress. To Mayakin the situation seemed even worse; Madame Medynsky had induced Ignat to give liberally to charity. Mayakin had no use for charity. The merchant class, he thought, should use its money to make more money.

For a time Foma helped his father and faithfully attended to business. It was hard work for him, although he was far from stupid. He could see no point in trading, no excuse for amassing a fortune. Liuboff confused him when he talked with her. She read books, to Foma a foolish pastime, for in them he found no answers to his questions. Foma never read much; in polite society he was always ill at ease.

When Ignat died, Foma felt more insecure. Attending a public gathering to dedicate a building to which his father had contributed, he had to leave before the ceremony was over. He did, however, take much interest in Madame Medynsky, the moving spirit in his father's philanthropies. Afterward he visited her often and she was very gracious to him, for he was handsome as well as rich. All the while, however, Foma felt troubled, for she seemed to play with his affections. When Foma heard she was an abandoned woman, he refused to believe the tales. In fact, one night he soundly thrashed an official who spoke slightly of her chastity.

When Mayakin tried to hush up the affair and set Foma back in the path of commercial rectitude, Foma rebelled. He went on a spree with several others and finally wound up on a raft in company with coldly attractive Sasha. Drunk enough to be affected greatly by Sasha's duets with her sister, he cut the mooring lines. As the raft floated away, Sasha swam to shore. She and Foma laughed immoderately as the others in the party floated helplessly down the river.

After some days he and Sasha came upon one of his barges, and Foma forced the captain to let him take command. Promptly he steered the barge into a collision and the craft sank. It was an expensive and scandalous business to raise it. In the midst of their liaison Sasha left Foma. She could not stand his continual questioning as to the purpose of life. When Mayakin heard what had happened to the barge, he took a power of attorney and left Foma to his own devices.

By chance Foma encountered Ezhoff, now a brilliant, satirical journalist. Fascinated by his former schoolmate, he was puzzled because Ezhoff had had so little worldly success. He went with Ezhoff once when the journalist made a revolutionary speech to a gathering of printers, but mostly the two drank together.

At last Foma went home, soberer but scarcely wiser. There he learned Liuboff had become engaged to Smolin, who had turned into an unctuous, polished trader. Mayakin, still hoping to redeem Foma, took him to a ship launching. As he listened to the laudatory speeches and heard the blatant congratulations to the owner, Foma lost control of himself. He compelled the rich businessmen to listen as he probed beneath their smug shells of respectability.

One man had barely escaped trial for seducing a little girl; another had falsely accused his mistress and had her sent to prison; a third had turned out his nephews to starve; still another had kept a bawdy house. As Foma bawled out his terrible accusations, the men fell on him and bound him. His godfather had him confined in an asylum. In after years he could be seen in the streets of the town, shabby, half-witted, and intoxicated. He lived in a little wing off Liuboff's courtyard.

THE FOOL OF QUALITY

Author: Henry Brooke (1703?-1783)

Type of plot: Didactic romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1766-1770

Principal characters:

HENRY CLINTON, Earl of Moreland
MR. FENTON, his foster father
NED, Henry's friend
FANNY GOODALL, Mr. Fenton's cousin
ABENAIDE, Princess of Morocco

Critique:

In reality, The Fool of Quality was an instrument whereby Henry Brooke could expand his views on theology, politics, government, family life, child training, and other philosophical subjects. To these matters he sacrificed plot and character, but not unduly. In spite of the fact that Brooke filled his novel with pathos and the stilted sentiments of the time, the book is still interesting and appealing to any reader who can follow the threads of the plot through a maze of moralizing, anecdote, and illustrative fable. In many ways his sentimentalism is less objectionable than Mackenzie's in The Man of Feeling. At the same time the reader can never doubt the complete sincerity of the author.

The Story:

Put out to nurse when he was a baby, Henry Clinton, second son of the Earl of Moreland, saw little of his noble parents and their favorite older son. At the age of five and a half, young Harry, as he was called, made the acquaintance of an old man of the neighborhood, one Mr. Fenton. The old gentleman was so impressed by the innate goodness of Harry's nature that he stole the boy away from his nurse, after leaving a note for the parents telling them that he would one day return their son. It was Mr. Fenton's purpose to train young Harry to become the most accomplished and perfect of men. The parents grieved for a short time but soon forgot the boy in favor of his older brother.

Mr. Fenton removed Harry to a mansion at Hampstead. With them they took Ned, a beggar lad whom Harry had befriended. There Harry's education began. Mr. Fenton, a very wealthy man, gave Harry large sums of money and hundreds of garments to distribute to the deserving poor. It was Harry's task to weed out the deserving from the rascals. At the same time the boys were instructed in academic subjects, body building, and other suitable lessons. Ned had irrepressible spirits and he constantly tormented his teachers. Sometimes Harry joined in the fun, but he was such a good boy that he immediately performed a favor for anyone who might have suffered because of Ned or himself.

Harry was so tender-hearted that he frequently brought whole families to live at the mansion, and gave them money, clothing, and work. Mr. Fenton was highly pleased with the boy, who had purity of heart and a willingness to be instructed in all phases of life. The old gentleman taught him theology, principles of government, moral rules, and many other forms of philosophy.

Harry became the champion of all those who were set upon by bullies, even though the ruffian was often larger and stronger than he. He soundly thrashed many boys and men, then immediately helped them to their feet and became their friend. Once he trounced the son of a nobleman. The mother, not knowing Harry was also an earl's son, would have had him severely punished, but the father saw Harry's good character and defended the lad. Most of the people Harry thrashed became his devoted servants, seeing and loving the nobility of character he possessed.

One day Mr. Fenton called on a lady who had issued several invitations to him. He was delighted to learn that the woman, now Lady Maitland, was his cousin Fanny Goodall. They had in their youth loved each other, but he was many years older than Fanny and there had been nothing but longing on the part of each of them. Now Fanny, recognizing Mr. Fenton, called him Harry Clinton. He was the brother of young Harry's father, the Earl of Moreland; thus he was Harry's uncle. Cast out with a small inheritance, as was the custom with younger sons, he had made his fortune as a merchant, married a wealthy woman, and prospered still more. But his beloved wife, his children, and his dear father-in-law all died, leaving him bereft of any emotion but sorrow. Although he gained a great fortune on the death of his father-in-law, he considered himself the poorest of men. Fanny was also a widow, and the two friends comforted each other as they talked of their sad lives. Mr. Fenton, seeing that Fanny was almost overcome with grief, promised to tell her the rest of his story later, but the good lady was called away before she could hear more.

Harry's education continued. Mr. Fenton, as he was known to all but Fanny, sent him to the prisons to pay the debts of deserving persons, thus securing their release. He continued to take unfortunates home with him, much to the joy of Mr. Fenton. Ned, too, was improving although he still did not have the nobility of character that Harry possessed.

One day Ned's parents were found. Harry had helped some people who had suffered an accident nearby, and these people became friends of the household. By a scar which his old nurse recognized, Ned was known to her and then to his parents. The boy had been stolen in infancy. It was with great joy that the parents greeted their son. Although Ned hated to leave Mr. Fenton and his beloved friend Harry, he went joyfully with his rightful parents.

Countless numbers of people became Harry's friends because of his concern for their well-being. Mr. Fenton sent him and his tutor, one of Harry's charities, to London to learn the ways of the city and the court. Even the king was impressed by the lad. But Harry retained his modesty through all the adulation he received, a fact which added to his popularity. The queen and other noble ladies sought his company, but he eluded them all, making them better, however, for having known him.

When Mr. Fenton learned of the death of Harry's mother and brother, he returned the boy to his father, the Earl of Moreland. Great was that man's joy at finding his lost son. When he learned that the child's abductor had been his own brother, thought dead, the earl was filled with remorse for having treated his brother so badly many years before. The brothers were united publicly and everyone learned that Mr. Fenton was in reality the second son of the house of Moreland. The earl was grateful to his brother for stealing the boy and making a perfect man of him.

Mr. Clinton, as Mr. Fenton was called from then on, told the rest of the story of his life. After the death of his loved ones, he lived in sorrow for many years. Then he married again after almost losing his life in his suit of the girl he loved, Louisa d'Aubigny. They had a lovely daughter called Eloisa. But sorrow again haunted Mr. Clinton, for Louisa died from a fall and Eloisa was washed from a ship and seen no more. The bereaved man had lived in solitude and misery until he had met and abducted Harry.

Not long after learning his brother's story, Harry's father died and the boy became the Earl of Moreland. He now had a huge fortune to spend for charity, and he spent wisely so that those who received would profit from the money in all ways.

Before long, Mr. Clinton learned from his dead wife's brother that he was coming to England, accompanied by Fanny Goodall. For Fanny had married Louisa's brother and thus had become Mr. Clinton's sister-in-law. The old friends rejoiced at their reunion. Fanny was accompanied by a dark Moorish page to whom Harry was instantly attracted. The boy told Harry that he had a sister Abenaide, as fair as he himself was dark. She would soon accompany their father the emperor, who was coming to England with his wife. The boy had been sent ahead as a page to be trained in genteel conduct. When the girl arrived, Mr. Clinton found her to be the daughter of his own supposedly dead Eloisa, for Eloisa, saved from the sea, had married the Emperor of Morocco. The Moorish princess was, to Harry's extreme surprise, the same page whom he had loved so dearly. She had been in disguise to escape an unwanted royal lover and had continued the deception in order to tease Harry.

The Princess Abenaide and Harry were married, their wedding being blessed with the prayers of the countless hundreds the perfect young man had befriended.

FORTUNATA AND JACINTA

Type of work: Novel

Author: Benito Pérez Galdós (1845-1920)

Type of plot: Social chronicle

Time of plot: 1869-1875

Locale: Madrid, Spain

First published: 1886-1887

Principal characters:

FORTUNATA, a woman of the lower class

JUANITO SANTA CRUZ, her lover

MAXIMILIANO RUBÍN, her husband

JACINTA, Juanito's wife

MORENO ISLA, her admirer

COLONEL EVARISTO FEIJÓO, Fortunata's protector

Critique:

Published in four volumes, appearing about five months apart, this realistic study of bourgeois life in Madrid is considered one of the best Spanish novels of the nineteenth century. The longest work of the prolific Benito Pérez Galdós, it re-creates the life of shopkeepers and the professional class during the restoration of the Bourbon regime. The author wrote many sentimental and problem novels, a series of forty-six historical romances, and twenty plays, but his best-proportioned story is this lengthy and thoroughly documented novel of a faithful heart. In addition, the book contains his best-rounded masculine character, Maximiliano Rubín. In every way Fortunata and Jacinta illustrates the writer's theory that a novel ought to be an image of life itself.

The Story:

The Santa Cruz dry-goods store in Madrid, established in the eighteenth century, provided an income for Juanito Santa Cruz. Having graduated from the university at twenty-four, he was not yet ready to take his place in the family business. He wanted to enjoy life and Barbara Santa Cruz, his mother, spoiled him. Her chief adviser was a former clerk, Plácido Estupiñá, who smuggled goods into the city in his spare time.

At the home of a fellow student Juanito met the attractive Fortunata and took her as his mistress. Shortly afterward Estupiñá found out about the affair, and Juanito's mother contracted for him a marriage with his beautiful but passive cousin, Jacinta. They were married in May, 1871. When the couple returned from their honeymoon, Fortunata had left Madrid.

The passing years showed Jacinta that she could not have children. Learning some details of her husband's earlier affair with Fortunata, including the fact that his mistress had borne him a son nicknamed Petusin, she wondered whether it was her duty to take care of the child. In the meantime Juanito had been told that Fortunata was back in Madrid. He immediately began to look for her, but his search ended when a lung infection made him an invalid for a long time.

Among Fortunata's admirers was the ill-favored and schizophrenic Maximiliano Rubín, the orphan of a goldsmith, who, like his two brothers, was subject to violent headaches. Thin and weak, he had been brought up by his Aunt Lupe, who allowed him to live in a world of his own imagination. While studying to become a pharmacist, he met Fortunata at a friend's house. Because of her poverty she overlooked his ugliness and took up with him. When she confessed her past, Maximiliano proposed marriage in order to redeem her.

Hearing of his plan, Aunt Lupe sent one of his brothers, a priest, to talk to Fortunata. The woman said frankly that Maximiliano was the only one of her lovers—except one now married—for whom she had ever cared. The priest proposed that she spend some time in a home for wayward girls; if she benefited by the experience, he would agree to the marriage. After a term in the institution Fortunata married Maximiliano on a day when he was suffering from one of his worst headaches.

Having known beforehand of the proposed marriage, Juanito had taken a room in the boarding-house Fortunata and her husband were to occupy. At first he had intended only to see Fortunata again, but on the night of the wedding her husband was ill and they resumed their old intimacy. Maximiliano, finding out about the affair, quarreled with Juanito, who overpowered the puny pharmacist and sent him to the hospital with an injured larynx. After the fight Fortunata packed her belongings and left her husband.

Juan Pablo, the second of Maximiliano's brothers, spent his afternoons in one café or another with his cronies, among them the elderly Colonel Evaristo Feijóo. While watching the parade marking the restoration of the monarchy in 1874, one of the loiterers saw Juanito and Fortunata sharing a balcony. Through gossip Jacinta learned of her husband's infidelity. When she accused him, he aroused her sympathy for Fortunata by telling how badly she had been treated by her husband. But he did promise to break off relations with the woman. His farewell message, with an enclosure of one thousand pesetas, so angered Fortunata that she went to his house in order to create a scandal. The sight of Jacinta's gentle beauty tempered her anger, however, and while she was trying to decide what to do she saw Colonel Feijóo. He pointed out that, untrained as she was for any career, she had only three choices: go back to her husband, accept the attentions of any man with money to pay her, or take him as her protector.

She chose Feijóo as her lover, at the same time planning to make her future secure after his death and to reinstate herself in the good graces of the Rubín family. On one occasion Fortunata came face to face with Jacinta, who did not know her husband's former mistress. Torn between a realization of Jacinta's beauty and goodness and her hatred for her as Juanito's wife, Fortunata finally blurted out who she really was, much to Jacinta's confusion.

Only one woman present during the encounter knew what to do. Guillermina Pacheco asked Fortunata to come to see her the next day and discuss the situation. The frank conversation between the two women was overheard by Jacinta, who was in the next room. The cruelest blow to Jacinta was Fortunata's insistence that Juanito needed her, since she had given him the son his wife could never bear him. When Fortunata discovered the eavesdropper, her angry words showed that she was still essentially of the lower class.

Later Fortunata had a scene with Maximiliano, who was gradually losing his mind. At last he drove her out of the house. Before long she and Juanito became lovers once more.

Maximiliano, trying to earn a living, worked in a drugstore owned by the Widow Samaniego, but his mental state caused him to make dangerous mistakes in mixing drugs. His employer had two daughters. One was Aurora, the thirty-three-year-old widow of a Frenchman killed while fighting the Prussians in 1870. She wore clothes with a Parisian flair and soon caught the eye of Juanito, as Fortunata learned to her dismay.

In the meantime Moreno Isla had fallen violently in love with Jacinta. Both he and Guillermina Pacheco, bribed by Moreno, tried to convince her that her husband would never be faithful, but Jacinta gave Moreno no encouragement. At the same time Aurora, for her own purposes, tried to convince Juanito that his wife was in love with another man.

Fortunata, pregnant, was afraid to live with Maximiliano any longer. Because he talked constantly of a philosophy of death she hid herself at Aunt Lupe's house. While looking for her, Maximiliano discovered proof that Juanito and Aurora were having an affair. He finally discovered his wife's hiding place after Estupiñá took the news of Fortunata's baby son to the Santa Cruz household. No longer wanting to kill her, Maximiliano forced his way into Fortunata's room, where he told her what he knew about Juanito and Aurora. Although the doctor had ordered her not to leave her bed, Fortunata rushed out to revenge herself on Jacinta's enemy and her own. The exertion caused her death. Before she died she sent a letter by Estupiñá to Jacinta. In it she asked Jacinta to care for Juanito's son.

Being compelled to acknowledge his paternity was a blow to Juanito, for it lost him his wife's remaining esteem. He realized sadly that his philandering had brought him to old age in spirit while he was still young in years, with nothing but an empty and unhappy future before him.

THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL

Type of work: Novel

GEORGE HERIOT, a goldsmith, friend of Nigel's father

MARGARET RAMSAY, Heriot's goddaughter

THE EARL OF HUNTINGLEN, an old nobleman

LORD DALGARNO, his son

DAME SUDDLECHOP, a gossip

TRAPBOIS, a usurer

JAMES I, King of England

Critique:

In The Fortunes of Nigel, Sir Walter Scott surpassed even his former efforts to introduce literally dozens of characters and plots into one novel. Although the multiplicity of people and events and the use of Scottish dialect may make this novel a difficult one for some readers, the reward in the end is worth the effort. For this novel is an exciting tale of intrigue and mystery, one of the great adventure stories in the language. As is also common in stories by Scott, the novel takes much of its romantic atmosphere and dramatic vigor from the author's use of many characters drawn from the lower levels of society. To balance these creatures of his imagination, Scott presents also in the figure of James I, King of England and Scotland, his finest historical portrait.

The Story:

The threatened loss of his family estates in Scotland sent Nigel Olifaunt, Lord of Glenvarloch, and his servant, Richard Moniplies, to London, there to petition King James I for the repayment of large loans made to the crown by Nigel's late father. After Richie Moniplies had made an unsuccessful attempt to deliver his master's petition, he was followed from the court by George Heriot, the royal goldsmith, who went to Nigel and offered to help him gain favor with the king. Heriot gave as his motive friendship with Nigel's late father. He succeeded in presenting Nigel's petition to the king. King James, in royal good humor, ordered Heriot to provide Nigel with money needed to outfit himself properly for an appearance at court, so that he could speak in his own behalf. The king gave Heriot a small crown of jewels, with instructions that the gems were to remain in Heriot's possession until the state repaid him for the money he would lend to Nigel. The state's finances were seriously depleted, and the king was forced to do business by warrant.

While dining at Heriot's house the next day, Nigel met Margaret Ramsay, Heriot's godchild and the daughter of David Ramsay, the royal clockmaker. Margaret promptly lost her heart to Nigel, but because he was a nobleman she was too shy to talk with him. That same night, however, she commissioned Dame Saddlechop, a local gossip, to find out more about Nigel and his business. The dame already knew that Nigel had powerful enemies in court, enemies who were interested in seeing that he was prevented from taking rightful possession of his estates. On the promise of more money in the future, the old gossip agreed to learn all she could about Nigel and his affairs.

Dressed in clothing bought by money advanced by Heriot, Nigel went to the king with his petition. At first he had difficulty in gaining admittance, but at last he managed to see the king. The king confessed that there were no funds available for the debt, but he made a notation on the petition to the Scottish Exchequer and told Nigel that perhaps he could borrow from money-lenders on the strength of the royal warrant. Nigel left the court with Heriot and the Earl of Huntinglen, who had also befriended him because of his father's name.

Anticipating a session with the money-lenders, the three decided to have a paper drawn up, a document which would allow Nigel ample time to redeem his estates by means of the king's warrant. Trusting Heriot and the old earl to handle his business, Nigel devoted himself to becoming acquainted with the earl's young son, Lord Dalgarno. Pretending friendship, Dalgarno in reality began a campaign to undermine Nigel's character and reputation and complete his financial ruin. Dalgarno himself hoped to gain possession of Nigel's estate.

Dalgarno took Nigel to gaming houses and other questionable places until Nigel's reputation began to suffer in the city and at court. At last even faithful Richie asked for permission to leave his service and return to Scotland. Immediately after Richie's departure, Nigel received an anonymous note, telling him of Dalgarno's plot to ruin him. At first Nigel refused to consider such a possibility, but at length he decided to investigate the charges. When he confronted Dalgarno in the Park and accused him of knavery, Dalgarno was so contemptuous of him that Nigel drew his sword and struck Dalgarno. The young courtier was not injured. There was a severe penalty for drawing swords in the Park, however, and Nigel was forced to flee in order to avoid arrest. He was befriended by a young man he had met in a gaming house and hidden in the house of an old usurer named Trapbois. His refuge was in Whitefriars, known as Alsatia, the haunt of bravos, bankrupts, bully-boys, thieves.

Meanwhile Margaret Ramsay was trying to help the young Scottish lord. In Heriot's house was a mysterious lady who stayed apart in a secluded apartment. She had seen Nigel once, during his first visit at the house. This lady was Lady Hermione, who was in seclusion in Heriot's house following a tragic affair of the heart. Because she was extremely wealthy, Margaret begged her to help Nigel out of his difficulties. Lady Hermione revealed to Margaret that she was of the House of Glenvarloch and thus a distant relative of Nigel's. When Margaret told her of Dalgarno's plot to ruin Nigel, Lady Hermione gave her the money, but warned her not to lose her heart to Nigel, for he was too high-born for a clockmaker's daughter.

Margaret arranged with an apprentice for Nigel's escape. The apprentice was willing to aid her because he was in love with Margaret and had been advised by old Dame Suddlechop that he might win the girl's heart by helping Nigel. In the meantime Nigel killed one of two Russians who had murdered Trapbois. Nigel took Trapbois' daughter Martha with him when he escaped from Alsatia with the help of the apprentice sent by Margaret.

Nigel sent Martha to the house of a ship chandler with whom he had lodged for a time and then set out to find the king and present his own account of the quarrel with Dalgarno. Martha, having had difficulty in gaining admittance to the house where Nigel had sent her, for the ship chandler's wife had disappeared, was discovered and protected by Richie Monipplies, who had returned to London to look for his master and try to help him. Nigel, in the meantime, tried to approach the king. James, believing that Nigel wanted to kill him, called out for help. His attendants seized Nigel and carried him off to the Tower. Dalgarno, one of the royal party, was only too glad to see Nigel imprisoned.

In his cell Nigel was accused by Heriot of adultery with the ship chandler's wife and of duplicity in the disappearance of Martha Trapbois. Nigel denied his guilt in either of these affairs. Heriot, while refusing to believe him, nevertheless said that he would again try to help Nigel for his dead father's sake, and he asked Nigel for the royal warrant. His plan was to collect the money from the state and satisfy the money-lenders who were pressing for the repayment of Nigel's loan. Nigel was in despair when he discovered that the royal warrant had been taken from his baggage.

Through a noble friend, Nigel was cleared of the charge of treason—that is, his supposed attempt on the king's life in the Park. However, he still had to stand trial for drawing his sword against Dalgarno. Richie went to Nigel in his cell and promised to help his master out of his troubles.

In the meantime the king received a letter from the Lady Hermione, in which she charged that Dalgarno was the man who had betrayed her. The king in an attempt to amend the wrong forced Dalgarno to marry Lady Hermione, but after the ceremony Dalgarno informed the king that he now possessed his wife's wealth and through her a claim upon the Glenvarloch estates. If the redemption money were not paid by noon of the following day, he would, he announced, take possession of Nigel's property. Convinced at last that Nigel was the injured party in the affair with Dalgarno, the king informed Richie that his master would be restored to royal favor. Richie, armed with money given to him by Martha Trapbois, paid the mortgage on Nigel's estates. Dalgarno, after trying to show that the redemption papers were gained unlawfully, proceeded on his way to Scotland to claim the property, but on the way he was killed by the same ruffian he had hired to murder Trapbois some time before. His death restored to Lady Hermione the fortune which Dalgarno, as her husband, had claimed. She gave a large portion of her wealth to Margaret and the rest to Nigel, her kinsman. Nigel and Margaret declared their love for each other and were married. During the ceremony Richie appeared with Martha Trapbois, whom he had married. Martha told Nigel that her father had stolen his royal warrant, and by returning the paper to him she made his estates secure. In gratitude to Richie for his part in restoring honor in the court, the king made the faithful servant a knight of the land.

THE FORTUNES OF RICHARD MAHONY

Type of work: Novel

Author: Henry Handel Richardson (Mrs. Henrietta Richardson Robertson, 1880?-1946)

Type of plot: Social chronicle

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Australia

First published: 1917, 1925, 1929

Principal characters:

RICHARD MAHONY, a doctor

POLLY, his wife

PURDY SMITH, his friend

JOHN TURNHAM, Polly's brother

HENRY OCOCK, Richard's solicitor

Critique:

Written and published separately as three novels, Australia Felix, The Way Home, and Ultima Thule, this story of Richard Mahony has had wide popularity, and some critics have ranked the trilogy with the great books of this century. The central character is a doctor who starts his practice in humility, reaches dizzying heights, and ends his life a madman. It is also the story of a woman who shared that life completely, spending herself unmercifully in a vain attempt to help her husband find peace of mind. Uncompromisingly realistic, the novel is the most distinguished work of fiction out of Australia.

The Story:

Richard Mahony was ill-suited to life in the Australian gold mines. A moderately successful doctor, he had left his practice in England and gone to the colonies in hopes of a quick fortune. Having found the life of digger completely wrong for him, he had taken what little money and goods he had left and set up a store. But he hated the raw country with bitter passion, and longed for England and his native Ireland.

To that life he brought his bride, Polly Turnham, whom he had met through an old schoolfriend, Purdy Smith. Purdy was as crude as Richard was fastidious. Polly wept at her new home, but she loved her husband, and she set about making the best of matters. The death of her baby matured and quieted her, but it did not kill her spirit.

When her sister-in-law died, Polly gladly cared for her children. Her other brothers and sisters, separated from their home in England, turned to her as they might a mother, and she comforted and encouraged them as she did her husband.

When Richard found his business declining, he decided to sell out and take Polly back to England. But Polly persuaded him instead to stay in Australia and set up a medical practice. With the help of Polly's brother, John Turnham, Richard borrowed enough money to get a decent house and the necessary medical supplies. Henry Ocock, the son of a neighbor and a successful solicitor, arranged a loan and in other ways advised Richard.

Richard had a sudden stroke of luck. On Henry Ocock's advice he had invested a small sum in some mining stock, Australia Felixes. The stock suddenly boomed and Richard found himself overnight a wealthy man. As he prospered, so did his practice, until he had more than he could handle. But Richard began to assume an air that worried Polly. Thinking his old friends uncouth and crude, he wanted Polly to join more fashionable circles. She did so, but she quietly retained the old friendships as well.

After an exhausting illness, brought on by overwork, Richard finally sold out his practice and prepared to return to England. He could return as he had always dreamed he would, rich and honored. They set sail, Richard with pride and Polly with sorrow.

In England, and during their short visit in Ireland, Polly and Richard Mahony were welcomed and entertained. But when Richard settled down to practice medicine again, he was twice scorned as a bushman from Australia, unfit to treat or to meet socially English snobs of the middle class. Worst of all were the snubs to Polly. These Richard could not tolerate, and so they returned to Australia. There Richard learned that his Australia Felix stocks had taken a new turn upward; he was wealthy beyond his wildest dreams. He bought a splendid house and called it Ultima Thule. To Polly's sorrow, he did not return to his practice. Feeling that he could retire and enjoy the quiet he had always longed for, Richard turned to spiritualism and spent long hours in seances with charlatans and quacks, in spite of Polly's remonstrances and those of his friends. In the great house he lived at times like a recluse with his books and fancies. Polly resumed her old ways with her friends and relatives. John, remarried, had been widowed again, and Polly once more had to care for her brother's children and soften his bitterness toward the world. John, successful in business and politics, was still dependent on Polly. Even after he married the third time, he could not find and hold the happiness that came naturally to his sister.

At last Polly and Richard had the family they had hoped for. Polly gave birth to a son and, a year later, twin girls. Although they were getting on in years, Polly and Richard lavished all their love and attention on the children. But Richard was withdrawing more and more from the world, and it was Polly who guided the children through their early days. Their happiness was marred by the death, from cancer, of Polly's brother John. Richard, although he no longer practiced medicine, did everything possible to ease the sick man's pain. Then, because of Polly's grief after John's death, Richard decided to return to England. Ultima Thule was sold before the family left for the land Richard would always call home.

In England, Richard continued his preoccupation with spiritualism. He had for some time, even back in Australia, been bothered by weird dreams which became more frequent and confusing. Richard was convinced that he was actually communicating with the dead, but Polly could see that her husband was deteriorating in body and mind.

The worst blow of all came when he received news that the broker in charge of his financial affairs had absconded from Australia to America. Richard was completely ruined. Leaving Polly and the children to follow later, he left at once for Australia.

On his arrival in Australia, Richard learned that he had left only about three thousand pounds, and he was forced to resume his medical practice. When Polly and the children arrived, she found that in spite of his poverty he had lost none of his grand ideas. As they went from one miserable village to another, Richard's mental deterioration increased rapidly in the squalor in which they lived. His temper was short; he still scorned the old friends as louts to be avoided, and Polly had to meet them in secret. She herself suffered a shock that was almost too much for her to bear when Lallie, one of the twin girls, died a horrible, agonizing death. The tragedy brought Polly and Richard close again, Richard being her only comfort and strength. He insisted that Polly take the two remaining children for a vacation. Alone, Richard could no longer fight his strange dreams and illusions. His dead daughter appeared to him often, and the servant heard him talking to himself like a madman. In his depressed state of mind he lost the pitifully few patients he had.

When Polly and the children returned, she found her husband really ill. After selling the house and her own few trinkets, she moved with Richard to an even more miserable town. There he grew steadily worse and once attempted suicide. Trying to manage, Polly put Richard in a private mental hospital and took a position as postmistress in a hovel far removed from any home they had ever known. When she had no more money to pay the hospital, she placed Richard, now mad, in a public asylum. When she tried to visit him and learned that he was being treated like an animal, she turned to her old friend, Henry Ocock, to help her get Richard out of the institution. At all costs, Richard should not die like a beast.

Richard went home at last. His sanity never returned, but on his deathbed he looked at Polly and called her his dear wife. His words were all the reward Polly needed for her life of sacrifice for the husband buried in a strange land that could never claim his soul.

In both his novels and his plays Galsworthy reflected the social problems of his age. His conscience was bothered by the lack of understanding shown by the members of his own class, the intellectual and moneyed upper middle class. In this novel, as in the others, his social satire is expressed by a delineation of the complacency of the upper classes, rather than by an analysis of the lower classes and their situation. Here also, as in other works, his diagnosis is not profound, nor does he attempt to offer any remedy for the problems he shows. Some readers may feel that this volume shows how Galsworthy's efforts to understand his age and his indignation at what he finds lead to no satisfactory solution in the end. Yet Fraternity is generally regarded as one of Galsworthy's best works of fiction, aside from that series of upper middle-class novels upon which his fame rests, The Forsyte Saga.

The Story:

Bianca Dallison had begun the chain of events by asking her writer husband to find a model for her painting "The Shadow." Through a friendly artist Hilary had located a girl from the country who suited his wife. The girl, Ivy Barton, was very attractive, and after she had finished posing for Bianca the Dallisons tried to help her find work. They had also found her a place to live with the Dallisons' seamstress, a Mrs. Hughs.

But Ivy Barton, through no fault of her own, began to create trouble in the Hughs household when Mr. Hughs became enamored of her and Mrs. Hughs became extremely jealous. One day Mrs. Hughs told Cecilia Dallison her troubles at home. Cecilia told Mrs. Hughs' story to the rest of the family. The Dallisons, all very much interested in social problems, wished to help the girl and the Hughs family. But the situation was a delicate one. Their interest was heightened by the comment of Mr. Stone that in the lower classes each of them had a counterpart, a shadow, and that everyone was bound together by the bonds of fraternity in the brotherhood of man. Mr. Stone was writing a book on that very subject.

Hilary Dallison found that the girl's work as a model was not regular and that she was finding it necessary to pose in the nude. He found her steady employment as a copyist for his father-in-law, Mr. Stone, who in his old age had embarked upon his strange philosophical work on the brotherhood of man. Bianca Dallison did not like the idea, for Mr. Stone lived with her and her husband. She began to be extremely jealous of the little model, even though it had been years since she and her husband had lived as man and wife.

In spite of his wife's jealousy, it was Hilary who first investigated the trouble at the Hughs'. He found no one but Mr. Hughs at home. The visit only made the situation worse, for Hughs became convinced that Hilary was having an affair with Ivy. Hughs began to loiter about the Dallison house and to follow the model home when she finished her work with Mr. Stone. When Cecilia also learned that Hughs was beating his wife, the family decided that the situation was dangerous for the model and for Hilary. Cecilia tried to convince Hilary that the girl should be sent away and that he should stop trying to help Mr. and Mrs. Hughs. He only smiled at her suggestions.

Sometime later Hilary followed Hughs when the latter trailed Ivy home. Hilary was somewhat dismayed to discover that Hughs followed only to prevent the girl from meeting anyone else, including Hilary. Nevertheless, Hilary met the girl in a park after she had shaken her follower. Ivy let Hilary notice that her clothing was very shabby, and he, feeling sorry for her, took her into a shop and purchased a complete outfit for her. His deed won her complete devotion; she was in love with Hilary Dallison.

After leaving Ivy at the store where they had purchased her outfit, Hilary went to spend the evening at his club; he knew that his wife would not mind his absence from her. When he got home, however, he found her in his room. They kissed, and for a moment forgot they had agreed not to live as man and wife. Then the moment passed, and Bianca fled to her room. Needing someone to talk to, Hilary went down to Mr. Stone's room and had a cup of cocoa.

The daughter of Stephen and Cecilia Dallison, Thyme, also tried to help the Hughs family. Her interest was the Hughs' tiny baby. She also noted that Ivy had new clothes and guessed that her uncle had bought them for the girl. The word quickly ran through the family, and Stephen, trying to make Hilary see how the others looked at the situation, told him that Bianca was bound to be jealous, even though they did not live as man and wife. Hilary felt that the celibacy she imposed on him had taken away any grounds for jealousy she might have.

That same afternoon Hughs went to the Dallison home and tried to tell Bianca about her husband's affair with Ivy. Although she refused to listen to the man, the incident roused her emotions and suspicions. At least her pride was hurt. That evening Hilary and Bianca tried to talk over the matter, but all they succeeded in doing was hurting each other. Bianca refused to believe that her husband was innocent of any intentions toward the model and had simply bought the girl some clothing because he felt sorry for her.

With his sister-in-law's help, Hilary found another room for Ivy. Hoping to solve the problem of Bianca's jealousy, he also told her not to come to his house to copy for Mr. Stone. When Hughs returned home that night and learned that Ivy had left his house, he beat his wife and wounded her with a bayonet. As a result, he was put into prison for several weeks. During the time he was in prison the Hughs' baby died, for Mrs. Hughs was too upset to nurse him.

Old Mr. Stone became very ill and unhappy at the same time, for he missed the company of the model as well as the copying she had done for him. In an effort to help her father, Bianca sought out Ivy and had her return to be with the old man part of every day. Because of his child's death and the girl's return to work at Hilary's house, it seemed as if the problem would still be unsolved when Hughs returned from prison.

To avoid a repetition of the whole distasteful situation, Hilary resolved to go to Europe. He made up his mind that he would go alone, even though Ivy was in love with him and wished to go along. His wife, because of her conscience, resolved to help the girl in Hilary's absence. When she went to the girl's rooms, however, she found her belongings packed. It dawned on her that in spite of his resolve her husband was taking the model with him. Bianca left the house in a fury just as her husband arrived. Her jealousy and anger were wasted, however, for after she left, when Ivy kissed him, Hilary realized that he could never live for long with a girl from the lower classes. Flinging all the money he had with him on the bed, he left alone. He took rooms for himself in London and then sent a letter to Bianca through his brother Stephen. He told her of his decision to stop seeing Ivy and his further decision not to return to a marriage that was only a mockery.

FRIAR BACON AND FRIAR BUNGAY

Author: Robert Greene (1558-1592)

Type of plot: Pseudo-historical chronicle

Time of plot: Thirteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: c. 1589

Principal characters:

HENRY III, King of England

EDWARD, Prince of Wales

LACY, Earl of Lincoln

ROGER BACON, a Franciscan friar
BUNGAY, a Suffolk conjurer
JAQUES VANDERMAST, a German conjurer
ELINOR, Princess of Castile
MARGARET, daughter of the Keeper of Fressingfield Park

Critique:

This chronicle play does not show true dramatic structure; it is simply a series of scenes presenting interesting happenings. Although Greene professed to have used historical material, the action is pure fiction. So far as is known, neither the Emperor of Germany nor the King of Castile ever made a visit to England. For the modern reader the interest of the action lies in the magical powers of Friar Bacon and in the love affair between Lacy and Margaret. The Honorable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay is regarded as one of the most notable of pre-Shakespearean dramas.

The Story:

When Prince Edward returned from hunting in a downcast mood, Lacy remarked on his lord's temper. It remained for Ralph, the court fool, to hit on the truth. The hunting party had stopped for refreshments at the keeper's lodge in Fressingfield Park, and Prince Edward had fallen in love with Margaret, the keeper's daughter.

Plans were laid to win Margaret's love for Edward, for the maid was modest and would keep her virtue for her husband. Ralph proposed that Edward should dress in the jester's motley, and Ralph should dress as the prince. They would then go to Oxford and enlist the help of Friar Roger Bacon, since only magic would win over the girl. Lacy was to go to the fair at Harleston to spy on Margaret there and to press a suit on behalf of the prince.

At Oxford, Friar Bacon and his poor scholar Miles received a deputation of learned doctors. Burden, their spokesman, asked about certain rumors they had heard. It was said that Friar Bacon had fashioned a great head of brass and with it he was going to raise a wall of brass around all of England. Bacon admitted that he planned such a project. Burden doubted whether even Friar Bacon could accomplish such a mighty deed.

To demonstrate his power, Friar Bacon had a devil bring a tavern hostess from Henley, a woman with whom Burden had spent the previous day. Thus the doctors were convinced of Bacon's powers.

At Harleston, Lacy approached Margaret. Although the earl was dressed as a farmer, his manners were so elegant that Margaret was attracted to him. Lacey was minded to press a suit in his own behalf.

At court, meanwhile, King Henry received the King of Castile, his daughter Elinor, and the Emperor of Germany. Negotiations were under way to betroth Elinor to Prince Edward. The princess, having seen a portrait of Edward, was much inclined to love the prince. The emperor had brought with him a German conjurer, Vandermast, to test his powers against the wise men of England. The royal party departed for Oxford to find Friar Bacon.

With the jester disguised as the prince and Edward disguised as a gentleman in waiting, the prince's party met the friar and Miles at Oxford. An argument developed between Miles and the others. To save his scholar, Friar Bacon froze Edward's sword in its scabbard. After rebuking the prince for trying to disguise himself, he invited Edward into his cell. There he let the prince look into a magic glass which showed Margaret and Lacy at Fressingfield.

Friar Bungay was revealing the secret of Lacy's identity to Margaret as Edward watched from afar. Margaret was troubled, for she had fallen in love with Lacy. When Lacy entered, he declared at once his desire to wed Margaret. Friar Bungay was about to perform the ceremony on the spot, but the anguished prince called on Friar Bacon to stop the wedding. The friar obliged by striking Bungay dumb and whisking him away to Oxford.

Edward, posting to Fressingfield in great haste, charged Lacy with treachery and threatened to kill him. Lacy admitted his guilt and prepared to submit, but Margaret pleaded valiantly for the cause of true love and begged Edward to kill her instead. Edward, marveling at his own weakness, changed his mind and gave his permission for Lacy to marry Margaret.

At Oxford, the Emperor of Germany had Vandermast dispute with Friar Bungay. Bungay conjured up the tree that guarded the Garden at Hesperides. In return Vandermast brought in Hercules and commanded him to tear the branches from the tree. Triumphantlly the German challenged Friar Bungay to make Hercules stop, but Bungay had to admit that he was vanquished. When Friar Bacon arrived, Hercules, to the emperor's chagrin, ceased his task immediately for fear of Bacon. To demonstrate the eminence of Oxford, Friar Bacon then forced Hercules to transport Vandermast back to Hapsburg.

Two squires came to seek the hand of Margaret. Both were wealthy and insistent, and the keeper asked his daughter to choose between them. Margaret was evasive and put off her answer for ten days, for she was sure Lacy would return by that time. After the squires left, a messenger came with a letter and a sack of gold. In the letter Margaret read that Lacy had chosen to marry a Spanish lady in waiting to Princess Elinor, and he sent the gold as a dowry for her own wedding. In great grief, Margaret gave the gold to the messenger and vowed to enter a convent.

Working in his cell, Friar Bacon was at the climax of his experiments, for he had completed with much labor the brazen head. Tired from wrestling with spirits, he lay down to sleep. Miles was to watch the head and wake his master as soon as it should speak. During the night the head made a great noise and said, "Time is." Thinking those words unimportant, Miles rested on. The head made more noise and said, "Time was." Again Miles did not arouse the friar. A third time the head spoke: "Time has been." Lightning flashed and a great hand appeared and broke the head with a hammer.

Then Miles awoke Friar Bacon, who knew at once that the blundering Miles had ruined his work. No wall of brass would ever surround England. In his wrath the friar sent Miles to wander homeless with a devil to torment him. After he left Oxford, however, Miles made the best of a bad situation. He got on the devil's back and went with him to Hell, where he was engaged as a tapster.

King Henry and the King of Castile were both pleased that Elinor and Edward had made a match. Lacy, thinking still of Margaret, spoke so persuasively of her beauty that the king sanctioned their marriage as well. Elinor was particularly gracious in suggesting a double wedding. The happy Lacy set out for Fressingfield to seek his bride.

Friar Bacon broke the sad news of the brazen head to Friar Bungay. As he finished his tale, two young scholars came in to ask permission to look into Friar Bacon's glass; they wanted to see what their fathers were doing. The fathers, who were the two squires seeking Margaret's hand, were fighting a duel. As the sons watched, the squires were stabbed to death. The sons then fought and each mortally wounded the other. In sorrow, Friar Bacon broke his magic glass.

In spite of her father's remonstrances, Margaret was preparing to enter a nunnery when Lacy rode up to claim his bride. Reproached for his cruel letter, he explained he had written it to test her constancy. Margaret, yielding to his entreaties, accompanied him back to court.

The double wedding was solemnized with royal pomp. Before the wedding feast Friar Bacon made a prophecy of the future of England. He foresaw a period of triumph and peace under a fair ruler who would exalt the glory of England over all other nations. Not understanding that reference to Queen Elizabeth, Henry called the prophecy mystical and led the guests to the dining hall.

FRITHIOF'S SAGA

Type of work: Poem

Author: Esaias Tegnér (1782-1846)

Type of plot: Heroic epic

Time of plot: Eleventh century

Locale: Scandinavia

First published: 1825

Principal characters:

FRITHIOF, a Viking adventurer and fighter

INGEBORG, a noblewoman loved by Frithiof

HELGE, and

HALFDAN, brother-kings in Scandinavia

HRING, a petty king married to Ingeborg

Critique:

Though a tale of ancient Scandinavia, Frithiof's Saga was told in a modern spirit by Tegnér when he put the old story into a narrative poem of twenty-four cantos, each canto done in a different meter. Frithiof himself is more akin to a modern hero than he is to the great warriors of other Scandinavian tales, folk heroes like Beowulf. Tegnér's effort is similar to that of Tennyson, in that he attempted to shape the epic material of an ancient Norse story into nineteenth-century poetic form. Although the poem lacks the simplicity and power of true Norse poetry, the imagery is memorable and the lyricism sweet and beautiful.

The Story:

In the ancient days of Scandinavia there was a king named Bele, who had two sons, Helge and Halfdan. King Bele also had a daughter, Ingeborg, a very beautiful girl. As King Bele grew old and near death, he called to him his friend of former days, Thorsten Vikingsson, who had been loyal to the king in peace and battle for many years and who was also near the end of his days. The king told his sons of the help that Thorsten Vikingsson had given him in past days and warned his sons to keep the friendship of Thorsten's son, Frithiof.

Frithiof had grown up with the companionship of King Bele's daughter Ingeborg and loved her and her brothers. But after the deaths of King Bele and old Thorsten, who were both laid to rest in burial mounds overlooking a fjord, the sons of Bele forgot the warning that their father had given them, and their friendship toward Frithiof cooled.

When Frithiof, who had long loved Ingeborg sued for her hand from her brothers, they refused his request. Frithiof, angered and humiliated, vowed that he would find his revenge and that he never would carry out his father's request to help the brother-kings.

Not long thereafter, when King Hring made war upon the brothers, they sent for Frithiof to help them. Frithiof, remembering his vows, continued to play at chess and ignored their summons.

King Hring, successful in his campaign against the sons of Bele, made them promise to give him Ingeborg as his wife.

Meanwhile Ingeborg had taken refuge in the temple of Balder. Frithiof, disdain-ful of the sanctity of the temple, had visited her there, where they exchanged rings. Frithiof thus ran the risk of Balder's wrath.

To punish him for violating the temple, the brother-kings sent Frithiof to collect tribute from the inhabitants of the Faroe islands. Frithiof, with his foster brother, set sail for the Faroes in Ellida, the best ship in the North country. It was said of Ellida that it could even understand the speech of men.

During the trip a violent storm came up and the ship almost foundered. Frithiof broke the ring he had received from Ingeborg and gave the shards to his men, so that none of the crew might enter the kingdom of the sea-goddess without gold. When the storm subsided, as it did after the men had conquered a pair of sea-spirits who rode against them on the backs of whales, the ship reached the Faroe islands in safety. Yar! Angantyr, ruler of the islands, let the tribute be collected for friendship's sake, and then Frithiof departed again for his homeland in Scandinavia.

Upon his return Frithiof heard that the brother-kings had burned his hall. Learning that the kings were celebrating the midsummer feast at the grove of Balder, he went there to confront them. Upon his arrival he found few people, but among them were Helge and his queen, who was anointing the image of the god.

Frithiof threw the purse with the tribute money into Helge's face with such force that Helge's teeth were knocked out. As Frithiof turned to leave, he saw on the arm of Helge's queen the great ring of gold he had given to Ingeborg when they had exchanged vows. Frithiof snatched the ring from the queen's arm, and when she fell to the ground because of his violence the god's image overturned into the sacred fire which, blazing up, destroyed the temple.

Helge pursued Frithiof to punish him, but pursuit was impossible because the royal ships had been damaged by Frithiof and his men. In his anger Frithiof pulled with such might upon the oars of his ship that its powerful oars broke like kindling.

Frithiof's violence against Helge and his queen and the double profanation of Balder's temple made the warrior an outcast from his homeland. A true son of the Vikings, he took to the sea and battled with haughty sea-kings, whom he slew. But in spite of his outlawry he permitted traders to travel the seaways unmolested. When he earned great glory as a fighter and much gold through his exploits, Frithiof sought once again to return to his homeland in the North.

Disguising himself as a salt-burner, he visited the land of the brother-kings' enemy, King Hring, who had long since married Ingeborg, Frithiof's beloved. Hring, recognizing Frithiof but keeping his counsel to himself, commanded that the warrior be seated next to him at the head of the table.

Frithiof remained in the hall of King Hring. Ingeborg spoke but little to him, because she was now the wife of another man. But she remembered that she and Frithiof had once exchanged rings, and she was still in love with him.

During his stay with Hring, Frithiof saved the king and Ingeborg from death when their sleigh fell through the ice and went under the water. Frithiof dragged the sleigh, with its occupants and horses, back upon the surface of the ice.

One day, while he and the king were alone in the woods, Frithiof was tempted to kill Hring while he slept, but he conquered his temptation and threw away his sword. Awaking, the king told Frithiof, who was still disguised, that he had known from the first night who his guest was.

Frithiof wished to leave the household of Hring, but the good king would not allow him to depart. Instead, Hring gave up Ingeborg to Frithiof and made the warrior guardian of the kingdom. Soon afterward Hring died and Frithiof was named to follow him upon the throne. When

Helge and Halfdan, the brother-kings, went to war against their old enemy, they were defeated. Helge was slain in battle by Frithiof, and Halfdan was made to swear fealty to his conqueror.

THE FUNERAL

Type of work: Drama

Author: Sir Richard Steele (1672-1729)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Early eighteenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1701

Principal characters:

THE EARL OF BRUMPTON, a British nobleman

LADY BRUMPTON, his wife by a second marriage

LORD HARDY, his son by his first marriage

MR. CAMPLEY, Lord Hardy's friend and junior officer

LADY SHARLOT (CHARLOTTE), Lord Brumpton's ward

LADY HARRIOT (HARRIET), Sharlot's sister

TRUSTY, Lord Brumpton's servant

Critique:

The Funeral, Or, Grief à la Mode was Sir Richard Steele's first and best-constructed play, but it is far less serious than his later work. Nevertheless, the drama has moral overtones and some highly sincere social criticism. Through the characterization of the hypocritical widow who gives the play its subtitle, Steele ridiculed manners of the time, as he was to do so often in his later plays and in his familiar essays. Notable in the play are the two young army officers, Lord Hardy and Ensign Campley, who are more reputable and honest than most of their dramatic predecessors, a circumstance probably due to Steele's own career in the military service. Steele boasted, quite rightly, in his preface to the play that his drama was more innocent than the prevalent style of comedy. In many ways his characters and actions show an innocent freshness quite unlike the atmosphere of intrigue found in Restoration drama and the comedies of the early eighteenth century.

The Story:

Young Lady Brumpton was quite happy when her husband, the Earl of Brumpton, died suddenly. A second wife, many years her husband's junior, she could look forward to a lively life as soon as her mourning period was over. Indeed, she intended to begin enjoying life discreetly long before she doffed her widow's weeds. Meanwhile she had the enjoyment of the earl's entire fortune, for she had persuaded him to disown his only son, Lord Hardy. The task had been easy. The elderly earl, foolishly fond of his pretty young wife, never guessed that she had been plotting against his own best interests and his son's.

The earl's servant, Trusty, remained with his master's corpse when everyone else left it. Much to his surprise and joy, he discovered that the earl had only lapsed into a coma, and before long the nobleman regained consciousness and health. Trusty, seeing an opportunity to prove that his mistress was an intriguer and an adulteress, persuaded the earl to remain hidden and allow everyone to believe he was really dead. The only person taken into the secret was the funeral director, who agreed to keep silent after the earl paid him an amount equal to what the funeral charges would have been.

In addition to planning ways for the enjoyment of her late husband's wealth, Lady Brumpton also gave some thought to the problem of ridding herself of the earl's two teen-age wards, Lady Sharlot and Lady Harriot. The girls were a very real threat to her freedom and to a portion of the earl's estate, since Lady Sharlot was in love with the earl's son and Lady Harriot with his friend Mr. Campley.

Despite the fact that he had been put out of his father's house, Lord Hardy, an officer in the army, refused to believe ill of his father, and with Campley's help he plotted to release the two girls from his stepmother's clutches before some evil should befall them. He was right in his fear; Lady Brumpton planned to have the girls spirited away and seduced by her brother and a friend.

Help for Lord Hardy and Campley came unexpectedly from Trusty, who went to Lord Hardy's apartment and outlined his plan to the earl's son. Lord Hardy, he said, was to send a detachment of troops to the earl's house and the casket containing the earl's body would be turned over to the soldiers. In the meantime, with the help of Lord Hardy's servant and a French seamstress, Campley managed to win Lady Harriot's confidence and persuaded her to escape with him from the Brumpton mansion. They escaped by dressing in the clothes of the French seamstress and a servant girl.

The earl, hidden in the house, eavesdropped on various conversations and learned that his wife had abused him terribly in her conduct with other men and had plotted to bring his son to disfavor. He also learned that the lawyer he had trusted with the drafting of his will had written it in such a way that most of the estate would go, not to the rightful heirs, but to court and legal fees. The earl, seeing his wife as she really was, resolved to reinstate his son as his rightful heir.

When the detachment of soldiers arrived at the house, the casket was delivered to them, but not before a fight between the soldiers and the servants in order to make it seem as if the delivery had not been voluntary. Actually, the casket contained Lady Sharlot. The plot was a ruse to get the girl out of the house before she could be kidnaped and seduced by Lady Brumpton's brother.

As soon as she discovered what had happened and who the commanding officer of the detachment of soldiers was, Lady Brumpton went to confront Lord Hardy. When she arrived, she found Lady Harriot and Campley, who defied her to stop his marriage to the girl. Bitter words were spoken on both sides. At last Lord Hardy entered, to take his turn as the recipient of Lady Brumpton's invective. She railed against him for taking away his father's body and desecrating it. When she had finished, Lord Hardy accused her of poisoning his father, an accusation which made her furious. They went into another room to view the body. When the casket was opened, Lady Sharlot emerged, much to Lord Hardy's joy. His stepmother then told him he had been cut off from his father's fortune, and she handed him the one shilling which had been left to him according to his father's will. She demanded again that he and his soldiers return the body, for she still thought that they had somehow spirited it away. All the while the earl was listening in another room and gaining further evidence that his second wife was entirely dishonorable and evil.

To Lady Brumpton's consternation, the earl showed himself. Although her plans for enjoying a fortune and independence were gone, she felt that the delay was only temporary, for she believed that she could once again put herself in his esteem in spite of the facts he had learned. The earl was not happy to return to a life with an adulteress and a shrew.

Once more Trusty saved the situation. He produced a letter written by a man who had married Lady Brumpton some months before her marriage to the earl. The earlier marriage made the later one void, a fact which took the scheming woman out of the earl's life. The first husband had been induced to write the letter when he saw the earl sitting reading in his study. Like everyone else, he thought that the earl was dead, and he therefore believed the nobleman had returned to haunt him for not telling what he knew about Lady Brumpton's past. Instead of being either a rich widow or a countess, Lady Brumpton found herself the wife of a man who had no money and who was forced to live by his wits. Her plans were utterly undone.

The earl, overjoyed to see his son after many years, promised to reinstate Lord Hardy as the rightful heir to his estates. He also gave his blessing to the approaching marriages between Lord Hardy and Lady Sharlot and Campley and Lady Harriot. He was, indeed, delighted that his two wards were to marry his son and his son's closest friend.

POLINA, his stepdaughter

Mlle. BLANCHE, a French adventuress

THE MARQUIS DE GRIEUX, a factitious French nobleman

ASTLEY, a young English capitalist

ANTONIDA TARASYEVITCHEV, the General's wealthy old aunt

Critique:

Dostoevski, having done considerable gambling at one time in his life, wrote this short novel with authority. His description of the fatal attraction of gambling to young and old alike is terrifying; for the rest, except for Polina's infatuation for the spurious French marquis, and for Alexey's Slavic penchant for self-torture, The Gambler seems a comparative ray of sunlight in the world of Dostoevski's art. Perhaps the background of a fashionable German spa with its international clientele accounts for this effect. Aunt Antonida, if not the most original of Dostoevski's creations, is one of the most delightful, even though she is little more than lightly sketched in.

The Story:

Alexey Ivanovitch returned to Roulettenburg, a German resort, after two weeks in Paris. He was tutor in the family of a Russian general who had come to the resort to repair his dwindling fortune. The General wooed an apparently wealthy young French woman, Mlle. Blanche. Polina, the General's stepdaughter, was attracted to Mlle. Blanche's alleged distant relative, the Marquis de Grioux. Alexey was Polina's creature; he loved her and accepted any humiliation at her hands.

Alexey went to the casino with money Polina gave him. After winning a tidy amount, he felt that his stay in Roulettenburg would affect his life seriously. Believing that he could not lose at the gambling tables, Alexey told Polina that henceforward he would gamble only for himself. But Polina, knowing her power over Alexey, easily persuaded him to share his winnings with her.

An affluent young English capitalist, Astley, came to Roulettenburg and, much to the General's discomfort, diverted the attentions of Mlle. Blanche, who was growing tired of waiting for the General's old aunt to die. The General telegraphed Moscow every day to inquire about the condition of the old lady, who, he was sure, would leave him a fortune.

It was soon evident that Astley was in love with Polina. Alexey, suspecting the French pair to be imposters, wanted to get away from the machinations of Roulettenburg existence, but his love for Polina held him. At the casino he lost a large amount of Polina's money; his possession of the money aroused renewed interest in the General on the part of Mlle. Blanche. The General, it seems, was deeply in debt to de Grioux.

Unable to win with Polina's money, Alexey offered to win with his own and lend her whatever she wanted. Alexey hoped that he could win Polina's love by becoming wealthy through gambling. He confessed his ardent love for her, and when he told her that he could even commit murder for her she impishly ordered him to speak in French to a stuffy German baroness who was passing by with her husband. After Alexey brashly insulted the Germans, he was, in spite of his plea that he was mentally aberrant during the escapade, discharged by the General. Alexey managed to maintain his self-respect when he told the General, who had apologized to the baron for him, that he was capable of making his own apologies, that as the son of a nobleman he objected to the General's patronizing treatment. The General, fearful of the consequences of Alexey's further impetuosity, unsuccessfully tried to mollify the youth.

De Grioux, as mediator, told Alexey that any further indiscretion on his part might spoil the chances of the General's marrying Mlle. Blanche. He also promised that the General would re-employ Alexey soon and would continue, meanwhile, to pay him his salary. Alexey, however, chose Astley to be his second in a duel with the baron. De Grioux then produced a letter from Polina asking Alexey to drop the matter. The young man obeyed, even though he knew for certain that Polina loved de Grioux.

Astley indirectly confirmed Alexey's suspicions that Mlle. Blanche and de Grioux were adventurers. During previous exploits at Roulettenburg, Mlle. Blanche had made advances to the baron and, at the direction of the baroness, had been escorted out of the casino by the police. Alexey suspected the General of being indebted somehow to Mlle. Blanche, and Polina of being involved with the French couple.

The General's old aunt, Antonida Tarasyevitchev, arrived from Moscow with a large retinue. Quite alive, she wickedly chaffed the General on his urgent solicitations and criticized him for squandering his children's inheritance. The General was visibly shocked by her arrival. The old lady, accompanied by the General's party, visited the casino and won fabulously at the gaming tables. In her triumph she gave money to her servants and to beggars.

Polina became more of an enigma to Alexey when she had him deliver a letter to Astley. Despite the General's pleas to the young tutor to prevent Antonida from gambling away her fortune, Alexey and the old lady frequented the casino together. Obsessed with the fever to win, she lost heavily. When she prepared to return to Moscow, she invited Polina to return with her. Polina declined. Antonida, unable to resist one last try at the gambling tables, again lost heavily. She converted bonds into cash and again lost. The old lady now possessed nothing but land and the houses on it; she borrowed money from Astley in order to return to Moscow.

The General's inheritance having been lost at roulette, Mlle. Blanche and de Grioux broke off relations with him and prepared to leave Roulettenburg. The General was a ruined man. Polina was distracted by her impending loss of de Grioux, but she was shaken out of her infatuation when de Grioux offered her consolation money from the proceeds of the General's property, which was mortgaged to de Grioux. In distress, Polina turned to Alexey, who went to the casino and won a fortune for her to hurl in de Grioux's face. She spent the night with Alexey in his hotel room. The next morning she took his money, then threw it in his face. She fled to Astley. Alexey went with Mlle. Blanche to Paris, where he lived with her while she spent his winnings. Tired of the life of an adventuress, Mlle. Blanche, persuaded by Alexey, decided to marry the General.

Alexey, now a confirmed gambler, returned to the gambling tables of the German resort towns. Once he went to jail for debt. In Homburg he saw Astley, who told him that Polina, recuperating from an illness, was in Switzerland with Astley's family. Meanwhile the General had died of a stroke in Paris, and Mlle. Blanche had received his inheritance from Antonida, who had died in Moscow. Alexey regretfully reminded Astley of Polina's infatuation for de Grioux and was momentarily hopeful when Astley told him that Polina had sent him to Homburg to bring Alexey back to her. Alexey knew that he had no choice, really—he had given his heart and soul to gambling.

Critique:

The qualities which make this novel a book of rare and rich experience are the writer's exquisite, unspoiled perceptions of childhood and his memories of a lost world which delighted a small boy. Behind this tale of nostalgic reminiscence there is a subtle contrast of backgrounds and characters, and this blending of temperamental differences of race and culture gives a more tangible flavor and substance to L. A. G. Strong's biographical novel.

The Story:

The first time Dermot remembered coming into an Irish port he was so young that he had to keep reminding himself to look for his Granny. He, his younger sister Eithne, and his mother came to Dublin each year to spend the summer at Granny's house. Dermot remembered only that there had been a monkey and a cat there the summer before.

After the trip by boat across the Irish Sea, they rode in a carriage, a train, and then a tram before they reached Sandy-cove, where Grandpapa was leaning over the gate waiting to meet them. To Dermot, as to his mother, the cottage at Sandycove was really home, a place they loved as they could never love their home in England.

Besides such delights as Paddy-monkey and Pucker the cat, Dermot was glad to see once more the comfortable dining-room with its loaded table. He loved the china, the little bone spoon with which he ate his egg, the different foods, and the corner where Grandpapa kept the well-worn books he taught Dermot to read.

Granny's garden was all mixed up in his mind with the Garden of Eden. That summer he spent most of his time there, playing with Paddy-monkey who was chained near the kitchen door, hunting for snails among the plants, investigating the farther reaches of the orchard which he had not known when he was smaller, and helping the gardener chase the half-wild cats that tore down the bushes.

There were two things he did not like about Sandycove. One was the walk far out on the pier in wild weather, while nurse wheeled Eithne. The other was to be surrounded by Granny's gushing friends before and after church. He felt closer to his Grandpapa when the old gentleman stubbornly refused to stand in front of the church with the women but waited instead in a park across the way.

Often on Sunday afternoons Dermot's cousins from Dalkey came to visit, sometimes accompanied by Uncle Ben, a boisterous retired mariner who was also, Dermot discovered, a strict puritan. Of Uncle Ben's four children, two came often: Con, a strapping lad of twenty-one, and Eileen, a lovely girl a few years younger. They were tremendously alive. Dermot, who had always been considered delicate, was exuberant when he was with his cousins.

The McManuses lived at Delgany, on a cliff running down to the sea. Their house was full of all kinds of wonders, such as a telescope, the dried jaws of a whale, a painted wooden pig, a bathroom with no taps. Uncle Ben and his family lived a happy-go-lucky life that left Dermot breathless; it was so unlike the precise life he lived in England. Too, Uncle Ben could answer Dermot's questions in more exact detail than anyone else, excepting perhaps Grandpapa; and even Grandpapa was likely to go on after the interesting part had been answered.

That year Uncle Ben, Con, and Eileen took Dermot in a boat to an island out from their home. There, while they were having their picnic, they looked up to see a ring of goats ranged on the rocks above them. It was a picture Dermot could not forget, and the trip was the first of countless excursions with the McManuses. That fall, as he sailed home to England, he looked back as long as he could see the Dalkey coast. Two years passed before he came back.

In England, before the plumbers laid a pipe in the Grays' yard, Dermot decorated a length of it by printing the plumber's name. Because he had used a chisel for the printing, he pierced the pipe. After it had been laid, the pipe leaked until the yard was a morass. Dermot confessed to his mother his fears that he had ruined the pipe but asked her not to tell his father. She had to tell Mr. Gray, of course, but he spoke kindly to Dermot when he asked the boy to be more careful the next time. A week later Dermot was still amazed at his father's unusual patience. To please Mr. Gray, he decorated the halls with horses' heads in chalk. His father blasted him for defacing the house and Dermot slunk away, cowed by the anger he had inadvertently brought on. He was afraid of his father, but when Mr. Gray became very sick Dermot was afraid for him as well.

After two years the Grays again went to Ireland. They did so each summer until the year of the first World War. As Dermot grew older his Granny hired a crippled lad to teach the boy to fish and to watch over him. It was a grand day when Dermot caught his first conger.

Paddy Kennedy and his pals, Long Mike Hogan and Peg-leg O'Shea, taught Dermot a great tolerance for the poor people that he could never have learned elsewhere, but they were careful not to allow any obscenity in his presence. That he learned in his public school.

Mr. Gray always arrived for his holiday just before the time came for the family to return to England. One year he connived with the gardener to rid the place of the worst of the marauding cats that Grandpapa had refused to kill. Mr. Gray, to Dermot's surprise and delight, set the boy to watch for Black Tom and Lord Spenser and let him, without the old gentleman's knowledge, shoot them.

As Eithne grew older she was asked to accompany Dermot to Delgany. The children thrived at the house, adoring their cousins, until it became a ritual for them to spend a full week there each summer. Con, who had never really grown up, always put himself out to make some diversion for Dermot and his sister. If he could think of nothing else, he drove them around the country on his motor bike. Eileen, too, entered into their entertainment. For her Dermot had a fondness verging on adoration.

The last year the Grays went to Ireland Dermot was studying to enter Oxford. That summer Dermot, Con, and Eileen, riding the motor bike to take Eileen to a tennis match, all felt a strange lowering of their spirits at the same time. Soon afterward another bike with two riders passed them and crashed into a post. Con and Eileen took care of the dead man and the injured one. Dermot, finally grown up, realized that he could face such a scene.

Although Eithne was only fourteen, Con asked Dermot if he thought his sister would have him. Dermot recommended that Con wait. He knew, however, that Eithne adored her cousin.

Both Dermot and Con were killed during the war, only a day apart. When Eithne went back to Ireland to visit Eileen and Aunt Patricia, the only ones left in the family, she told them that a letter from Con had arrived just after Dermot died, a letter written the day before Con himself was killed. Eithne had felt torn apart at losing the two who had meant most to her, but she felt better, after reading the letter, to think that Con and Dermot were together and surely happy.

Critique:

The Gardener's Dog has proved to be one of the favorite comedies of Lope de Vega since its first performance, sometime around 1615. It is based on the old tale of the dog who would not eat its food, yet would allow no other dog to have it. Such was Diana. For a time, at least, she herself did not want Teodoro, but she would not let Marcella have him. The play is a comedy of character and manners, reminiscent of some of Shakespeare's work. The technical perfection is amazing when one remembers that this most prolific of all writers turned out more than sixteen hundred plays during his lifetime.

The Story:

The Countess Diana was enraged when she heard that a man had been seen leaving the upper chambers of the palace. He had thrown his cap at the candle, snuffing out the only light so that he could not be identified. Diana sent for her ladies in waiting and questioned them in order to learn who had been visited by a lover during the night. Dorotea and Anarda pleaded innocent, but whispered to Diana that Marcella had a lover in the palace. He was Teodoro, secretary to the Countess Diana herself. Marcella confessed her love but protested that it was a pure love. Teodoro wanted to marry her. Diana gave her consent to the marriage but cautioned Marcella to stay away from Teodoro until the wedding day; otherwise passion might consume honor. After her ladies had left her alone, Diana realized that she too loved Teodoro, but since he was not high-born she could not proclaim her love.

Teodoro, who had indeed been the man involved in the midnight escapade investigated by Diana, feared that he would be found out and banished or executed. But he could not get Marcella out of his heart. Tristan, his lackey, begged him to forget Marcella and never see her again lest Diana punish them both severely, for it had been Tristan who had thrown the cap and snuffed out the candle so that his master would not be recognized while escaping. Soon afterward Diana did learn the truth of the escapade, when she tricked Tristan into revealing his part in the affair. She also sent for Teodoro and subtly hinted at her love for him in a letter she feigned was intended for someone else.

Marcella went to Teodoro and told him that Diana had blessed their betrothal. Confused, Teodoro took Marcella in his arms just as Diana appeared. When he thanked her for giving Marcella to him, their capricious mistress ordered Marcella locked in her room, to await Diana's desires concerning the wedding. Then Diana again hinted that she loved Teodoro, and because of her words he renounced Marcella. To himself he regretted his rejection of Marcella, but he could not put aside the lure of wealth and power that would be his if Diana took him for a husband. Meeting Marcella a short time later, for Dorotea had let her out of the locked room, he spurned her love and disgraced her. Angered, Marcella swore revenge on him and on Anarda, who had, as Marcella learned, betrayed her and Teodoro to Diana because Anardo thought Marcella encouraged Fabio, a gentleman with whom Anardo was in love. Marcella, meeting Fabio, offered him her love and greatly confused that poor man by her words and actions.

Two noblemen, the Marquis Riccardo and Count Federigo, both begged for Diana's hand, and suddenly she sent Teodoro to tell Riccardo that she chose him for her husband. Deserted by the lovely countess before she was really his, Teodoro turned again to Marcella and said that he loved only her. At first she spurned him and declared that she would marry Fabio, but at last love won out over jealousy. Falling into Teodoro's arms, she made him forswear Diana forever. While the lovers called their mistress a devil, an ass, and a bore, they did not know that Diana and Anarda were hidden nearby and listening to their conversation. Suddenly they appeared, frightening the lovers almost to death. Diana dictated a letter to Teodoro, in which she stated that if a noble lady loved a man he dared not love another. When she cautioned him to interpret its meaning correctly, Teodoro again renounced Marcella and told her to marry Fabio in order to please Diana.

Riccardo, appearing in answer to the summons from Diana, was told that Teodoro had misunderstood her words and that she had not intended to marry Riccardo. Teodoro, believing then that his mistress truly loved him, declared his love for her. Instead of listening to his pleas, Diana berated him for daring to speak of love when he was low-born and she a lady. Then he asked her to give Marcella to him, since Diana would not have him. But, like the gardener's dog who would allow no other dog to eat what he himself did not want, she would not let Teodoro have Marcella. Instead, she struck at Teodoro with her knife. He half-believed that she had wounded him because she loved him, and, when she returned and wiped the blood from his wound, he was sure that it was love that made her cruel to him.

Count Federigo and the Marquis Riccardo, hearing that Diana had wounded Teodoro, were convinced that he had threatened her honor, and they decided to have him killed. For their assassin they hired Teodoro's faithful lackey, Tristan, who took their gold and then informed Teodoro of their plot. Tristan had other plans for helping his master.

He had learned of one Count Lodovico, who had lost a son named Teodoro twenty years before. The boy had been captured by the Moors and was never heard of again. Tristan planned to convince the old count that Teodoro was his long-lost son. Then Teodoro would have a family of birth and wealth and would be good enough to wed Diana. Teodoro, too honorable for such knavery, went to Diana and told her that he was going to Spain, to avoid both the death planned for him by her suitors and the torture he endured while in her presence. Diana, not knowing her own mind, alternately told him to leave and to stay. When Marcella went to Diana and asked for permission to accompany Teodoro to Spain, Diana told the girl that she must marry Fabio.

Meanwhile Tristan carried through his plot to make Count Lodovico think Teodoro his lost son, and the old man was delighted at the prospect of having his child returned to him. Before the old count saw Teodoro, Diana, knowing that her true love was to leave her, told him at last that she loved him. Still she refused to marry him because of his humble birth. When Count Lodovico appeared with the announcement that Teodoro was his son, Diana opened her arms to Teodoro and said that they would be married that very night. Marcella, seeing at last that she could never have Teodoro, agreed to marry Fabio.

Teodoro, in one last attempt to save his honor, confessed to Diana that Tristan had tricked the old nobleman into believing Teodoro his own missing son. But by that time Diana had learned that love did not respect position. She declared that they would marry anyway and keep the secret between themselves and Tristan. Federigo and Riccardo confessed their plot to have Teodoro killed, and Diana gave Dorotea to Tristan as his bride. So all ended well, with honor saved and love triumphant. The gardener's dog had made a final choice.

THE GAUCHO: MARTÍN FIERRO

Type of work: Poem

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Part the Second, 1879

Principal characters:

MARTÍN FIERRO, the gaucho

CRUZ, his friend

PICARDIA, Cruz' son

TWO SONS OF MARTÍN FIERRO

Critique:

Although it is not well known in the English-speaking world, the tale of Martín Fierro has had great popularity in the South American countries, particularly in Argentina. Fierro gave hope to a people long oppressed by the government and cheated by corrupt officials. He became a legend and his tale was repeated over and over again. Hernández himself was identified with his hero, and everywhere he went he was idolized as the spokesman for the gaucho. It is said that much of the romantic appeal of the poem is lost in translation; nevertheless, the English version is musical, vigorous, and exciting.

The Story:

Martín Fierro was a gaucho, born and raised on the rolling plains of Argentina. A gaucho was a mixture of the Spaniard and the Moor, transplanted to South America and mixed again with aboriginal Indians. He was God-fearing, brutal, superstitious, ignorant, lazy, and kind. His type was but a passing one, but while he roamed the plains he became a legend. Martín Fierro played his guitar and sang his songs, songs that told of his unhappiness and the sorrows of the gaucho all over the land.

There was a time when Martín had a home and a wife and children to comfort him. He had owned land and cattle and a snug house. He rode the plains and lived in peace with his neighbors. Then officers appeared to take Martín and his neighbors away from their homes and families to serve the government in wars with the Indians. Martín was among those chosen because he had not voted when the judge was up for election, and the judge said that those who did not vote helped the opposition. The government promised that the gauchos would serve only six months and then be replaced. Martín took his horse and clothes and left his wife and children.

The men lived in filth and poverty. Complaints brought a staking out and lashes with leather thongs. There were no arms; the colonel kept the guns and ammunition locked up except when the Indians attacked. The Indians came and went as they pleased, killing, plundering, and taking hostages. They pulled babies from mothers' arms and killed them for sport. But the Indians were not much worse than the officers. The men had no pay, no decent food. They wore rags, and rats crawled over them while they slept.

At last Martín escaped and returned to his home. There he found his wife and sons gone, the house destroyed, the cattle and sheep sold by the government. Martín swore revenge and set out to find his sons. He was soon in more trouble. He killed a Negro in a fight. Another swaggering gaucho picked a quarrel and Martín killed him. These killings brought the police after him. They had tracked him down and were about to kill him when one of their number joined him in fighting the others. Cruz, his new friend, fought so bravely that the two of them drove off or killed their attackers.

Cruz, telling Martín his story, sang it like a true gaucho. He had lost his woman to the commandante of the army and so had left his home. He, too, had killed a man and been hunted by the law before an influential friend got him a pardon and a job with the police. But Cruz had no heart for the police. Seeing Martín prepared to fight against great odds, he had decided to join him. The two decided to leave the frontier and go to live among the Indians.

Martín and Cruz traveled across the desert to the land of the savages. But before they could make friends and join a tribe, they were captured by a raiding party. For two years they suffered tortures inflicted by the Indians; then they were allowed to pitch a tent and live together, still under guard. They had to ride with the savages on raids against the Christians. When smallpox ravaged the tribe, Cruz gave his life by nursing a chief who had been kind to them.

Martín was alone once more. At last he escaped from the Indians. He rescued a white woman who had been beaten with the bowels of her own baby son. After weeks of weary travel they returned to the plains, where Martín left the woman with a rancher and went on his way. He knew by then that even the evils of the government were better than life with savage Indians.

Martín, returning to his homeland, learned that he was no longer wanted by the government. The judge who had put him into the army was dead and no one any longer cared about the Negro and the gaucho he had killed in fair fights. In his new freedom he went to a racing meet and there was reunited with two of his sons. From them he learned that his wife was dead and that they had also been tortured and cheated by the government.

The older son sang his song first. He had been arrested and convicted for a killing which he did not do. Beaten, starved, abused, he spent a long time in the penitentiary. In his loneliness he had had no friend to share his woes. He cautioned all who heard his tale to keep away from the law, for the law was not for the gaucho.

The second son sang his song. An aunt died and left him some property. The judge appointed a tutor who robbed the boy of his inheritance and beat him and starved him. Penniless, Martín's son had roamed the land like a tramp until he was sent to the frontier with the army.

Father and sons sat singing and talking when a stranger called Picardia appeared and sang his song. Like the others, he had been sent to serve in the army and endure the tortures of the wicked officials. At the end of his song Picardia told Martín that he was the son of Cruz, Martín's old friend. The friends celebrated the meeting with wine and song, and while they sang a Negro joined them. He and Martín held a singing match, a common thing among the gauchos. The Negro sang that he was the brother of the Negro Martín had killed long years before and that he would avenge the death. Before they could fight, other gauchos stepped between them and sent Martín, his sons, and Picardia on their way.

They rode only a short distance together, then separated to seek new lives, each man alone. Before they departed, Martín Fierro gave the young men some advice out of his own experience. He told them to be true to their friends, to give every man his due, to obey the law, and never to cheat. If ever a woman should win their hearts, they must treat her well and be true. The four scattered, each one taking a new name from that day on. Martín, ending his song, commended his words to gauchos everywhere, for they came from the wisdom of an old man. Then he laid down his guitar, never to sing again.

GERMINAL

Type of work: Novel

Author: Émile Zola (1840-1902)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: France

First published: 1885

Principal characters:

ÉTIENNE LANTIER, a socialist laborer
MAHEU, a miner
MAHEUDE, his wife
CATHERINE,
ZACHARIE,
JEANLIN, and ALZIRE, Maheu children
CHAVAL, another workman

Critique:

One of the first books written about the conflict between capital and labor, Germinal was based on an actual strike that took place in France in 1884. Completely realistic, the book manages to exaggerate the truth without blaspheming it. Its most commendable quality is its lack of preaching. In a literary sense Zola triumphs here by portraying mob scenes with a painter's success. The emotions and movements of masses of people are so completely depicted that the characters in the story become mere results of the pressure of events around them. The idea of socialism and the nature of the men who uphold it is a principal theme here, yet the book is no manifesto in spite of its social intent.

The Story:

Étienne Lantier set out to walk from Marchiennes to Montsou looking for work. On the way he met Vincent Maheu, another workman, called Bonnemort because of successive escapes from death in the mines. Nearing sixty, Bonnemort suffered a bad cough because of particles of dust from the mine pits.

Bonnemort had a son whose family consisted of seven children. Zacharie, the eldest son, twenty-one years old; Catherine, sixteen years old, and Jeanlin, eleven, worked in the mines. In the morning, as they were dressing, they listened to the sounds of Levaque leaving the next door apartment. Soon afterward Bouteloup joined the Levaque woman. Philomène Levaque, the eldest daughter and Zacharie's mistress, coughed from her lung ailment. Such was the life of those who worked in the mine pits.

Étienne was given a job in the mine. He descended the mine shaft along with Maheu, Zacharie, Chaval, Levaque, and Catherine. At first he mistook the latter for a boy. Chaval, during lunch time, roughly forced the girl to kiss him. This act angered Étienne, although the girl insisted that the brute was not her lover.

The head captain, Dansaert, came with M. Négrel, M. Hennebeau's nephew, to inspect Étienne, the new worker.

There was bitterness among the workers, danger lurking in the shafts, and so little pay that it was hardly worth working. Étienne, however, decided to stay in the mine.

M. Grégoire had inherited from his grandfather a share in the Montsou mines. He lived in peace and luxury with his wife and only daughter, Cécile. A marriage had been arranged between Cécile and Négrel.

One morning Maheude, Maheu's wife, and her small children went to the Grégoires to seek help. They were given warm clothing but no money, since the Grégoires believed working people would only spend money in drinking and nonsense. Maheude had to beg some groceries and money from Maigrat, who kept a shop and who would lend money if he received a woman's caresses in return. He had Catherine in mind. But Catherine, escaping him, met Chaval that night and allowed him to seduce her. Étienne happened to witness the seduction and was disillusioned by the young girl.

Étienne quickly adapted himself to the mine, so expertly that he earned the profound respect of Maheu. He made friends with the other workers. Only toward Chaval was he hostile, for Catherine now openly showed herself the man's mistress. At the place where Étienne lived he would chat with Souvarine, a friendly man who despised the company of women. Étienne discussed a new movement he had heard about from his friend Pluchart, a Lille mechanic. It was a Marxist movement to free the workers. Étienne who had come to loathe the working conditions and the lives of the miners and their families, hoped to collect a fund to sustain the forthcoming strike. He talked about his plan to Rasseneur, with whom he boarded.

After Zacharie married his mistress Philomène, the mother of his two children, Étienne came to the Maheu household as a boarder. Night after night he urged them to accept his socialistic point of view. As the summer wore on he gained prestige among the neighbors. His fund grew. As the secretary he drew a small fee and was able to put aside money for himself. He began to take on airs.

The threat of strike was provoked when the company lowered the wages of the workers. As a final blow to the Maheus, a cave-in struck Jeanlin, leaving him a cripple. Catherine went to live with Chaval, who had been accusing her of sleeping with Étienne. In December the miners struck.

While the Grégoires and the Hennebeaus were at dinner arranging the plans for the marriage between Cécile and Négrel, the miners' delegation came to see M. Hennebeau, but he refused to give any concessions. The strike wore on through the weeks while the workers slowly starved. Étienne preached socialism and the strikers listened; as their misery increased they became more adamant in their resistance to M. Hennebeau. The endless weeks of strike at the Montsou mines ended in a riot when the people advanced to other pits to force the workers to quit their labors and join the strike. All day the mob destroyed property and raged against their starvation.

Catherine had remained faithful to Chaval, but when, during the riot, he turned renegade and ran to get the gendarmes, she deserted him to warn her comrades, especially Étienne.

Étienne went into hiding, assisted by Jeanlin, who had become a street urchin and a thief. The Maheu family fared poorly. Crippled Alzire, one of the younger children, was dying of starvation. Everywhere neighbors quarreled fretfully over trifles. Étienne frequently slipped into Maheu's house for a visit. For the most part he wandered alone at night. After the strike had been going for two months, there was a rumor that the company was bringing strikebreakers to the pits, Borain workers. Étienne began to despair. He suggested to the Maheus that the strikers bargain with M. Hennebeau, but Maheude, who once had been so sensible and had resisted violence, shouted that they should not give in to the pressure of their want.

One night at Rasseneur's, while Étienne was discussing matters with Souvarine, Chaval and Catherine entered. The animosity between Étienne and Chaval flared up, and they fought. Chaval, overpowered, ordered Catherine not to follow him but to stay with Étienne. Left alone, Catherine and Étienne were embarrassed and confused. Étienne had no place to take the girl. It was not possible for her to go home, since Maheude could not forgive her for having deserted the family and for working during the strike. Resignedly, Catherine went back to her lover.

After Catherine had gone, Étienne walked by the pits, where he was a witness to the murder of a guard by little Jeanlin. Étienne dragged the body away and hid it.

When the strikebreakers began to work, the strikers stormed the entrance to the pit and threatened the soldiers who were on guard. After a while the soldiers fired into the mob. Maheu was among those killed. Twenty-five workers had been wounded and fourteen were dead.

Company officials came to Montsou to settle the strike. The Borains were sent away. Étienne's popularity ended. He brought Catherine home and began to stay at Maheu's house again. The bleak house of mourning filled Étienne with remorse.

Souvarine resolved to leave Montsou. Before he went, he sneaked into the pit and committed enough damage to cause a breakdown in the shafts. That same morning Étienne and Catherine decided that they must go back to work. Chaval managed to be placed on the same work crew with Étienne and Catherine. Repeatedly the two men clashed; Chaval still wanted Catherine.

Water began rushing into the shaft. Below, Chaval, Étienne, and the rest were trapped when the cage made its last trip up and did not come down again. The people above waited and watched the mine slowly become flooded by subterranean torrents of water.

Négrel set about to rescue the entombed workers, for as long as they were below they must be assumed to be still alive. At last he and a rescue party heard faint thumpings from the trapped workers. The men began to dig. An explosion injured several of them and killed Zacharie.

Meanwhile the trapped workers had scattered, trying to find a place of safety. Étienne and Catherine came upon Chaval in the gallery to which he had climbed. There the animosity between the two men led to a fight which ended when Étienne killed Chaval. Alone, the two lovers heard the rescuers' tapping. For days they continued to answer the tapping. Catherine died before the men outside reached them. Étienne was still alive when help came.

After six weeks in a hospital Étienne prepared to go to Paris, where more revolutionary work awaited him.

Critique:

The story of Germinie Lacerteux is not a pretty one, nor did its authors mean it to be a pretty tale. They consciously set out to show how the life of a very minor figure in the city of Paris could contain the real essence of tragedy, despite the heroine's low station. According to Zola, a great admirer of the Goncourt brothers, the study of the lower classes in fiction began with this novel. The story of Germinie, a servant, is presented with the clinical detachment of the dissecting room. No details are spared the reader, and the emotions, pains, and joys of such a life are carefully analyzed in realistic fashion. The authors, who neither condemned nor praised, but simply presented what they saw, are the literary forerunners of such American novelists as Stephen Crane, Frank Norris, and Theodore Dreiser.

The Story:

Germinie Lacerteux, left an orphan at the age of four years, was taken care of by her sisters. At the age of fourteen she was sent to Paris to live with an older sister who had settled with her husband in the city. Not wishing to pay for all the expenses of the child from their own meager income, the sister and her husband found Germinie a job as a waitress in a café. After she had worked in the café for several months, she was seduced by one of the waiters. Becoming pregnant, she suffered many indignities from her relatives because she would not say to them that she had literally been raped; they thought she had invited seduction. Her child was born dead, and her sickness almost killed Germinie. Finally a retired actor took pity upon her and hired her as a maid and companion. For Germinie this was a step upward in the world; unfortunately for her, the old actor died within a few months. Germinie then filled a host of positions as maid to kept women and boarding-school mistresses.

One day the maid of Mlle. de Varandeuil died suddenly, and through the influence of her sister Germinie was given the position. Mlle. de Varandeuil was an old maid. Her father had prevented her from being anything but a servant to him until his death, so that Mlle. de Varandeuil had few friends and acquaintances. Other members of her family had died, and she herself was an old woman. She had a sufficient income to live more or less comfortably, but it could not tolerate many extravagances. In her old age she needed someone to look after her, as much a companion as a maidservant.

For a time after her entry into the service of Mlle. de Varandeuil, Germinie was a devoted Christian. She spent a great deal of time at church and went to confession regularly. Through her devotions she fell in love with a young priest, but he, sensing her state of mind, sent her to another confessor and refused to speak to her. When he took that course of action, Germinie's devotions ceased.

Germinie's next devotion was to her sister's niece, who was left to Germinie's care when the mother died. But Germinie's happiness was short-lived, for the child was taken to Africa by another sister. When word came by letter that the child was ill and the sister's husband out of work, Germinie sent everything she could to aid the stricken child and the family that was taking care of her. After depriving herself of necessities for two years, Germinie learned that the child had died shortly after leaving Paris and that the letters from the aunt and uncle were only a ruse to get Germinie's hard-earned money.

About that time a dairy store was opened very close to the house in which Germinie lived with Mlle. de Varandeuil. In her dealings with the store Germinie found a friend in Madame Jupillon, the proprietress. Madame Jupillon had a son, who was at a trade school learning to become a glove maker. Germinie, quite taken with the youngster, often went with his mother to see him on visiting days. One day, when Madame Jupillon was ill, Germinie went by herself to the school. Upon her arrival she learned that the young man was in trouble because some questionable books had been found in his possession. Germinie helped him out of his difficulty, but when she tried to lecture him found herself unable to do so.

Soon Germinie realized that she had a great deal of affection for the young man, who was ten years her junior. In order to be near him and to have company, she spent a great deal of time with the Jupillons, who took advantage of her willingness to help in the store. She was exceedingly jealous when Jupillon was attracted to a woman of notoriety and did everything she could to keep the two apart. By her actions she left herself open to the advances of young Jupillon, who was not above taking advantage of her unselfish devotion.

Germinie was extremely happy as the lover of young Jupillon; she had a need, both physically and psychologically, for someone to love. But she soon discovered that Jupillon spent much time in the company of other women. To help keep him for herself, Germinie spent all her money to buy him a place in which to open his own business, meanwhile providing him with an apartment of his own. But shortly after she had done so much for him Germinie was turned away from Jupillon's door by another woman who had become his mistress. In the meantime Germinie had become pregnant; a baby daughter was born. Since it was impossible to keep the child at home while acting as Mlle. de Varandeuil's maidservant, Germinie farmed out the child. The death of the baby a few months later brought Germinie great sorrow.

Some time after she had been turned out by Jupillon, the young man was unfortunate enough to be called for military service. He had no money to secure his release, but he knew that he could get the money from Germinie, who still loved him. Germinie, after some trepidation, went into debt to keep her false lover near her. She was compelled to borrow so much money that the bare interest on it took everything she could spare from her small income.

As the years passed Jupillon took less and less interest in Germinie, so that she finally gave him up and turned to liquor for comfort. Drunkenness became her one joy, although she managed to keep the secret of her vice to herself; old Mlle. de Varandeuil never even guessed the truth. Everyone noticed, however, that she had become slovenly in her person and in her work. Mlle. de Varandeuil kept her on only because the old woman could not stand the thought of a new servant in the house. Germinie had two grave problems: she had no one to love, and she was miserably in debt because of a man who cared nothing for her.

At last Germinie found herself approaching forty years of age. About that time she met a man in his fifties, a painter, and took him as a lover. She did not love Gautruche except as an object upon which her pent-up affections could be lavished. Before long she felt much better, behaved much better, and was a better servant to her mistress. But Gautruche saw in her only a servant for himself, and he believed that she would be only too happy to leave her job and marry him. Much to his surprise, she refused his offer of marriage, and the two parted forever. Once again Germinie was left with no one who cared for her or upon whom she could lavish her affections. She turned in her desperation to picking up any man she could find on the streets. One night, as she roamed Paris looking for a lover, she saw Jupillon. She followed him to a house and spent the night outside in the rain, while waiting for a chance to see him again. The next morning she was desperately ill with pleurisy. She kept on working in spite of her illness, until her condition became much worse. At last Mlle. de Varandeuil sent her to a hospital and there Germinie died. After her death all her secrets were revealed, for everyone to whom she owed money attempted to collect from her employer. At first Mlle. de Varandeuil was outraged; then she came to realize the agony and frustration of Germinie's life, and felt only pity for the wretched girl.

Critique:

Gettysburg gave Elsie Singmaster's writing its center and its roots, and this collection of her short stories is one of the best books ever written about the battle fought there and its aftermath. Living on the site of that great conflict, the writer heard at first hand the stories of many men and women who remembered vividly the events of those three decisive days of July first, second, and third, 1863. The people of that time are dead and buried now, but Elsie Singmaster has preserved their recollections in this book, to which she gave the simple yet evocative title, Gettysburg. Her treatment is both realistic and legendary. The book opens with a picture of the town when news came that a battle was to be fought there, continues with an account of the battle and the Confederate retreat, and ends with a group of stories dealing with characters whose experiences are presented in retrospect—blind Gunner Criswell, whose name was missing from the roll of honor; old Daggett, the substitute who had been cheated of honor and pay; Grandfather Myers, who saw the marching ranks once more before he died; Mary Bowman, widowed during the fighting, who saw General Early on his white horse, the ghostly leader of that grim retreat through wind and rain. Gettysburg may be read as a work of fiction. The stories, however, are based on actual people and events.

The Stories:

Mary Bowman, scraping lint for wound-dressings, found it difficult to keep her mind on her work. Close by, her three small children played that they were General Early and his ragged Confederate troops, who had passed through Gettysburg several days before. Yesterday Union soldiers had marched into town and headed toward Chambersburg. Mary Bowman was glad that the village was not to see fighting, thankful that her husband was with Hooker's unengaged forces. But she had dreamed of marching men in the night. Suddenly uneasy, she went to her front door. Hannah Casey, a neighbor, came from her garden across the street. While they stood talking a soldier rode by and warned them to take shelter. The Army of Northern Virginia was advancing from the north, the Army of the Potomac from the south. The women looked at each other in dismay as cannon roared threateningly from the ridge west of town.

For months young Parsons had dreamed of fields filled with dead men. Sometimes he wanted to run away. Marching along the dusty road from Taneytown, he suddenly realized that the army was moving toward Gettysburg, where he had been born. Firing sounded in the distance. As his company marched that night past the cemetery where his father was buried, he could stand the thought of death and battle no longer. Turning, he ran blindly through the darkness to his mother's farmhouse. Finding the door locked, he entered through a window and crept upstairs to his own bed. He awoke in late afternoon, to find the house empty, his mother nowhere about. Looking from a window, he saw men in blue and other men in gray skirmishing outside. His fears forgotten, he began to fire on the Confederates. All that afternoon he and the Union soldiers held the strategic ground around the Parsons house, where, toward evening, his friends carried him with a bullet wound in his throat. Lying on the kitchen floor, he saw his mother as she came from the cellar where she had hidden herself when the firing began. On Parsons' face was a look of peace; he had come home.

Near a clump of trees, on the third day of the battle, Colonel Frank Haskell waited in a stone-fenced field. Around him were long lines of infantry, re-formed since yesterday's fighting. A mile away, on the opposite ridge, Lee's men also waited. The cannonading began. Smoke drifted across the field. Men fell, but still the Union lines waited. The bombardment ended with heavy, ominous silence. Then through the smoke the Confederate ranks appeared, eighteen thousand men, a rolling sea of gray. Shells, shrapnel, canister failed to stop them. When the Union lines began to waver, the young officer drew his sword and urged his men back. The troops were fighting hand to hand as the smoke closed down. Then the Confederate charge broke. By a clump of trees behind a stone wall Pickett's charge ended in defeat.

Although she had been forewarned, Mary Bowman was startled by the sound of reveille on the morning of November 19, 1863. The night before a train from Washington had brought President Lincoln to Gettysburg for the dedication of a cemetery for the dead soldiers. Out there on the battlefield, among the unknown dead, lay Mary Bowman's husband, for whom she had looked in vain. Sad and embittered by her loss, she went to the ceremony only because the judge, a kindly man concerned for her welfare, insisted that she take her children. She heard little that the orator of the day said, for her mind was on the wounded she had nursed, on the grim debris of the battle she had uncovered in her search. As she turned to leave, someone said that the President was about to speak. Abraham Lincoln, lank and sad-faced, spoke only a few words, but, hearing them, Mary Bowman took heart. It was as if he were telling her to be of good comfort, that her duty was to the living as well as the dead.

The explosion which cost Gunner Adam Criswell his eyesight on the second day of the battle had not disabled him. A vigorous old man, he returned to Gettysburg with his friend, Carolus Depew, in September, 1910, for the dedication of the great monument containing the names of all Pennsylvania soldiers who had fought in the battle. While Carolus looked for his own name, a boy read to the blind man the names of those in Criswell's battery. The townspeople had opened their homes to the old soldiers; Criswell and Depew stayed with Professor James and his wife. Another guest was a pompous general who took credit for the plan to inscribe the veterans' names on the monument. The next day Criswell went to the exercises with Mrs. James. Afterward the general offered to find the blind man's name on the memorial tablets. Then Criswell told them what he himself already knew. His name had been overlooked.

Frederick Daggett had fought as a substitute. The other man had promised him a thousand dollars, but the money had never been paid. All Gettysburg, knowing Daggett as a drunkard and braggart, laughed at his foolish story. Congressman Ellison Brant, arriving in Gettysburg on the eve of Memorial Day, was unable to find accommodations or a guide until Daggett offered his services. Brant, impatient and demanding, was dissatisfied with the old man's efforts and tried to pay him off contemptuously in the crowded lobby of the Keystone Hotel. Before all the people there, Daggett demanded his thousand dollars, for he had recognized Brant as the man who had cheated him years before. The politician reached for his checkbook before he realized that his gesture was an admission of guilt. Hurriedly he wrote the check. Daggett took it and deliberately tore the slip of paper in two. Ragged and disreputable, he could always boast that he had thrown away a thousand dollars.

Grandfather Myers, invalided home after Chancellorsville, had watched the Confederates retreating through rain and mud from Gettysburg. Ever since, he had regretted the illness which had kept him from offering food or comfort to the tired, defeated men. He himself was an old man when the state militia held a summer encampment on the battlefield. His son, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren went to see the review, but Grandfather Myers stayed at home because there was no room for him in the buggy. That afternoon he dressed himself in his blue uniform. He was sitting on the front porch when a detachment of the National Guard came marching by on maneuvers. To the old man they were Lee's soldiers in retreat, their uniforms yellow with dust instead of tattered and rain-soaked. When they asked for water he could only nod smilingly. At last he had given Lee's men something. He could die content.

Although Mary Bowman lived to see the fiftieth anniversary of the battle, she never talked of those days. But she remembered all her life her husband, lost on that battlefield, the voice of Abraham Lincoln, and most vividly of all the figure of General Early, as she had seen him riding by on his white horse, the spectral leader of a stumbling, ghostly host on that rain-muffled retreat toward Hagers-town.

RUTH BOLTON, a Quaker

Critique:

Satire was Mark Twain's forte, and in this novel his wit finds a wide range. In fact, he and his co-author planned to attack almost every aspect of contemporary society. The weakness in the story lies in its co-authorship; it hangs in uncertain balance between sober reality and sheer hilarity, with no clear demarcation between the two attitudes. Mark Twain's contribution can easily be recognized by readers familiar with the humorist's style. The book was apparently intended to do for the novel what The Knight of the Burning Pestle did for the drama. Diffused in its effects, the novel does contain one memorable element, the unforgettable character of Beriah Sellers.

The Story:

Squire Hawkins of Obedstown, Tennessee, received a letter from Colonel Beriah Sellers asking Hawkins to come to Missouri with his wife Nancy and two Hawkins children, Emily and George Washington. Moved by the colonel's eloquent account of opportunities to be found in the new territory, the family traveled West. On the journey they stopped at a house where a young child was mourning the death of his mother. Taking compassion on the orphan, Hawkins offered to adopt him. His name was Henry Clay.

The travelers boarded the Boreas, a steamboat headed up the Mississippi. In a race with a rival the two boats collided, causing a fire on the other steamboat and killing or injuring scores of passengers. In the confusion Hawkins found a stray child, Laura, whose parents apparently had died in the fire. The Hawkinses, although now burdened with four children to care for, took hope in the promise of Tennessee lands which they still owned.

After a tiresome journey they reached their new home, a log cabin surrounded by a dozen or so other ramshackle dwellings. There Colonel Sellers helped the Hawkinses start their new life. But Squire Hawkins did not prosper as he had hoped and before long his affairs became hopelessly involved.

Ten years later found Colonel Sellers living in Hawkeye, a town some distance away. Squire Hawkins, by that time, was impoverished. Clay had gone off to find work and Laura, now a beautiful young girl, volunteered to do so. Washington and Emily could not decide what to do. Clay brought money to the destitute family and paid Washington's stagecoach fare to Hawkeye, where he found Colonel Sellers as poorly off as the Hawkins family. But Colonel Sellers was a magnificent talker. His fireless stove became a secret invention, his meager dinner a feast, his barren house a mansion, and under the spell of his words Washington's dismal prospects were changed to prospects of a glowing future. Colonel Sellers spoke confidentially of private deals with New York bankers and the Rothschilds. He confided that he was working on a patent medicine which would bring him a fortune.

Colonel Sellers took Washington to the real estate office of General Boswell. It was arranged that the young man should live with the Boswells while working for the general. Before long he fell in love with Boswell's daughter Louise.

Squire Hawkins died, leaving his family only the lands in Tennessee. Among his papers Laura found some letters from a Major Lackland, who apparently had come across a man believed to be Laura's father. Before Hawkins could get in touch with the man, he had disappeared. Laura's doubtful parentage made her an object of scorn in the region.

Two young New Yorkers, Philip Sterling and Harry Brierly, set out for Missouri to work as construction engineers for a railroad company. In St. Louis they met Colonel Sellers, who entertained them with boasts about his investments and treated them to drinks and cigars. When he showed embarrassment at having lost his money, Philip relieved him by paying the bill.

In Philadelphia, Ruth Bolton, the daughter of Eli and Margaret Bolton, both Quakers, received a letter from Philip. Rebelling against the rules of the Friends, she told her parents that she wanted to do something different, perhaps study medicine.

Colonel Sellers continued to befriend the two young men in St. Louis. He went so far as to suggest that the railroad should be built through Stone's Landing, a small village not along the route planned for the road. Like the colonel, Harry was a man of imagination. When their money ran out, Harry and Philip went to an engineers' camp near Hawkeye, and the colonel joined them to plan the city to be built there.

Philip and Harry arrived in Hawkeye eight years after the death of Squire Hawkins. The Civil War had been fought; the Hawkinses were still supported by Clay, and Laura had become a beauty. During the war she had married a Colonel Selby, who, already married, had deserted her when his regiment was transferred. After that calamity she turned her eye upon Harry Brierly, who fell in love with her.

When Senator Dilworthy went to Hawkeye to investigate Colonel Sellers' petition for funds to improve the area, the senator met Washington Hawkins. Thinking Washington a fine young man, the senator hired him as a secretary. Laura charmed Senator Dilworthy to such an extent that he invited her to visit his family in Washington.

Ruth Bolton was in school at Fallkill, where she stayed with a family named Montague. On their way to New York, Philip and Harry stopped to see her. Philip was disappointed in the manner in which Ruth accepted him. Alice Montague was kinder to him; Ruth seemed too attentive to Harry. In Washington, Harry saw the appropriation for Stone's Landing passed by Congress. When the New York office sent no money with which to pay the workers at Stone's Landing, Harry went to New York to investigate. Speculation was everywhere; even Mr. Bolton decided to buy some land near the railroad in Pennsylvania. Unfortunately, Harry learned that the cost of obtaining the Congressional appropriation had been so high that there was no money left to pay for the work at Stone's Landing.

Hired by Mr. Bolton, Philip went to develop the natural resources of a tract of land in Ilium, Pennsylvania. He became a frequent visitor at the Boltons'.

Senator Dilworthy invited Laura to come to Washington, where she immediately became a belle—much to Harry Briery's consternation. Many people believed her an heiress. The senator attempted to use her influence in getting congressmen to vote in favor of a bill in which he was interested. At a party Laura saw Colonel Selby, who had come to Washington to claim reimbursement for some cotton destroyed during the war. When the former lovers met, Laura knew she still loved Selby and the two began to be seen about town together. When he left Washington, Laura followed him to a New York hotel, where she shot him.

The opening of the Ilium coal mine found Philip and Harry hard at work. Before they had located the main vein, however, Mr. Bolton went bankrupt and surrendered all his property to his creditors, and Philip was able to buy the Ilium tract. Ruth, graduated from medical school, had gone to work in a Philadelphia hospital. Harry was in New York, a witness at Laura's murder trial. Philip, hoping to read law in the squire's office, visited the Montagues in Fallkill. Mr. Montague, seeing value in Philip's mine, offered to finance a further excavation.

Laura's trial attracted much attention. Claiming that she was insane, her lawyer tried to show that her mind had been deranged from the time she lost her parents in the river boat fire.

Senator Dilworthy's bill, a measure to establish a university for Negroes on the Hawkins land in Tennessee, had been for some time in committee. Washington Hawkins and Colonel Sellers expected to make a fortune when the bill passed. Then Dilworthy, up for reelection, attempted to buy votes and was exposed, and his bill was defeated on the floor of the Senate. Washington and Sellers were crestfallen.

Laura was acquitted of the murder charge. Penniless, she tried to begin a lecture tour, but on her first appearance she found only an empty auditorium. On the streets she was attacked by angry citizens and driven home to a cold room, where she died of grief.

Philip finally found coal in his shaft, but his elation subsided when a telegram from the Boltons told him that Ruth was gravely ill. He hurried to her bedside, where his presence helped to hasten her recovery.

STANJA VESILIC, Mirko's betrothed

JUVAN, a student

THE PHYSICIAN

Critique:

The damage that can be done by the fear and superstition of an ignorant people is amply demonstrated in Goat Song, in which the rebirth of brutishness in man is symbolized by the birth of a human monster. In their zeal to find a sacrifice for their sins, the peasants and gipsies elevate the human monster to sainthood and then sacrifice a young girl to him. This is a dynamic plot, the horror touched with mysticism and poetic symbolism.

The Story:

Stanja Vesilic was the betrothed of Mirko Milic. The parents had arranged the marriage, as was the custom. It was a marriage of convenience, the exchange of money for position in the community. It was the custom also for the bride-to-be to stay in the groom's home for a month, in order that she might learn the ways of her prospective mother-in-law. Neither Stanja nor Mirko took much interest in the arrangements. It was to be and that was all.

Unknown except to a very few was the existence of another son born to Stevan Milic and his wife. This boy, now grown, was a human monster, hidden from the world and his brother in a little cottage. He crawled on all fours like a goat and at times let out terrible screams which had to be explained away to passers-by. The mother had never seen the child since his birth, he having been suckled by a servant girl, but her heart yearned for him even while she knew she could never see him lest the secret of his existence be revealed.

A physician called and urged them to place the monster in a home for such beings, but when Stevan learned that his name must be registered, he would not allow the plan to be carried through. No one must learn the secret. At last Stevan decided to kill his son so that the creature would be free of his troubles and Stevan and his wife free of worry about him. But when Stevan took his gun and went to the hut, he found that the physician, who had visited the monster in the name of science, had left the door open and the monster had escaped. Now he was really free.

The farmers of the area had been plagued by vagabonds and gipsies seeking to settle near the village. Most of these wanderers had once lived on land nearby and wanted a little of it again. When their leaders went to the council with their petition, the wealthy farmers would not listen to their pleas. Stevan presided at the council on the night the monster disappeared, his mind so filled with his own fear that he did not really hear the pleas of the gipsies. He ordered them away, telling them that they were the lucky ones, smiled on by fortune. His actions and words convinced everyone present, even the other elders of the council, that he was a madman.

The intellectual leader of the vagabonds was Juvan, a student. He stirred up his followers to kill and plunder the farmers who would not give them land. Stanja and Mirko talked with him. Each hated Juvan, but Stanja was drawn to him in spite of her hate. Feeling compassion for Juvan's homeless people, she wanted Mirko to join him in getting land. But Juvan insulted Stanja, and so the two men prepared to fight. Before they drew blood, the gipsies found the monster and ran to Juvan with the news. The ignorant gipsies thought the monster had been sent to punish them for their greed. Juvan, who knew the monster was the secret hidden by Stevan Milic, planned to use his knowledge to enforce his will on the landowners.

The monster was taken in bonds to the church and installed behind the altar, hidden from view. The gipsies secured arms, thought by the villagers to be provided by the monster, and attacked the peasants. As they murdered and plundered, thinking always that they were appeasing the monster, Juvan used the creature to work the mobs into a frenzy. At last they demanded to see the monster. Their lust for blood lessening, they wished to see the strange god who would avenge all their wrongs and return their homelands.

When they gathered at the church, Stevan, his wife, their son Mirko, Stanja, and the elders appeared. The mob would have killed them if Juvan had not silenced the rioters. Stevan tried to bargain with Juvan: if Juvan and his mob would lay down their arms and release the monster, the gipsies would be forgiven and allowed to take some land. After forcing Stevan to claim the monster as his son in the presence of all the people, Juvan said that the monster would be released only to Stanja, who was to go in and cut the creature's bonds. Mirko and his father and mother tried to get the girl to flee, but by that time Juvan ruled her completely. Scorning the words of everyone, she took the knife to cut the bonds. Mirko attacked Juvan and was instantly killed by a guard. Mirko's mother was happy, without understanding why she wanted her good son dead.

Stanja went into the sanctuary to free the monster, while the mob sang in ecstasy. When Juvan tried to go to Stanja, to save her, the mob held him back and demanded a sacrifice to the unknown god. Suddenly the doors to the altar opened of their own accord, and the monster stood in the shadows before them.

Soldiers came to the farms and villages and drove off the gipsies. The monster had fled into the woods and there burned, or so they said. Juvan, taken prisoner, was to be hanged. The farmers were now poor, but Stevan was strangely happy. He felt young, now that his sons were dead. He and his wife had found each other again after their guilty secret had been disclosed.

Now that her betrothed was dead, Stanja's parents came to take her home. But Stanja, refusing to go, begged to stay with Stevan Milic and his wife. Because she told them that she was still true to their son they kept the girl and loved her as their own. When Juvan was brought to Stanja under guard, the privilege of the condemned, he told her that he loved her, that she had changed him, by her sacrifice to the monster, from an animal knowing only lust to a man wanting a woman's love. Stanja loved Juvan too and wished to die with him, but he insisted that she live so that he would leave a part of himself on earth when he went off to his death on the gallows.

Later the hangman went to Stanja and the mother told them that he had found the monster lying dead in the charred forest but with not a hair singed. The mother wept that there would never be a trace of the son she had carried in sorrow and in secret. Stanja told her she was wrong. Before long the girl would be delivered of the monster's child.

THE NARRATOR

WILLIAM LEGRAND, who found the gold bug

JUPITER, his colored servant

Critique:

One of the best known of all American short stories, "The Gold Bug" grips its readers with the eternal fascination of the detective story. Poe, regarded by some critics as the greatest genius of American literature, has here combined romance and adventure in a tale of buried treasure. There are inaccuracies in geography and measurements, defects in character portrayal, but these are quickly forgotten in the fascinating web Poe weaves of a mystery and its solution.

The Story:

William Legrand had been reduced to poverty by a series of misfortunes. In order to avoid the embarrassment of meeting friends of his more prosperous days, he left New Orleans and went to live on Sullivan's Island, near Charleston, South Carolina. It was a small island, usually uninhabited except for Legrand and his colored servant, Jupiter. Jupiter would not leave his master, even though he was a free man and could have found work to support himself in comfort.

Winters on the island were mild and fires were usually unnecessary, but on a night in October when a friend from Charleston visited Legrand, he found Legrand and Jupiter away from the house and a fire blazing in the fireplace. The two returned soon after from a quest for entomological specimens. Legrand was in rare good humor. He had stumbled upon an entirely new specimen, a bug of gold. On his way home he had met a Lieutenant G—, who took the bug to examine it. Because the friend could not examine it before morning, Legrand took from his pocket an old piece of parchment and drew a picture of the specimen.

As the friend took the drawing, Legrand's dog entered, jumped upon the guest, and licked his face in joy. When the friend finally looked at the paper, he found that the drawing resembled a human skull. Legrand, somewhat disgruntled at this slur on his drawing, took the paper back and prepared to throw it into the fire. After one last glance, however, he paled visibly, rose and seated himself at the table. Then he carefully placed the paper in his wallet. As Legrand appeared distracted and a little sulky, the friend canceled his plans for spending the night and returned to Charleston.

About a month later the friend received a visit from old Jupiter. The servant reported that his master was not well. Going around as if in a daze, Legrand worked constantly at a cipher. Once he had eluded Jupiter and stayed away the whole day. Jupiter knew that the gold bug was to blame, for it had bitten Legrand on the day he captured it. Jupiter knew that the bug was the reason for Legrand's talk about gold in his sleep. He produced a letter from his master begging the friend to return to the island with Jupiter.

At the island the friend found Legrand in a state of great excitement. Filled with plans for an expedition to the mainland, he asked the friend to accompany him. After getting Legrand's promise that he would consult a doctor before long, for the man was obviously deranged, the friend joined Legrand and Jupiter in their adventure. Taking the dog with them, they left that evening. Jupiter carried picks and shovels for the three. Legrand took with him the gold bug, attached to a long cord.

After traveling about two hours, they stopped at the foot of a huge tulip tree situated near an almost inaccessible hill. There Legrand commanded Jupiter to take the bug and climb the tree to the seventh limb. Jupiter obeyed, climbing out to the very tip of the limb. On the outer edge he found a human skull, nailed to the wood. Then Legrand told him to drop the bug through the left eye of the skull. After this strange act, Jupiter climbed down. Legrand, working in feverish anxiety, then began a series of measurements. By the light of lanterns, the men, following Legrand's lead, dug out a hole four feet in diameter and seven feet deep. When they failed to unearth the treasure Legrand obviously thought he would find, he questioned Jupiter again about the eye through which he had dropped the gold bug. The old man, they learned, had mistakenly dropped the bug through the right eye. Again Legrand measured and drew circles. By that time the friend shared Legrand's excitement. Again they dug, and at last they came upon an old chest, too heavy to move. Prying open the lid, their eyes fell upon gold and jewels of unbelievable value. They later computed that the total worth was over a million and a half dollars. Leaving Jupiter and the dog to guard what they could not carry, Legrand and his friend took one load home. Then they returned and with Jupiter carried the rest of the treasure back to the island.

Legrand told his friend in detail how he had solved the riddle of the treasure. The piece of parchment upon which he had drawn the picture of the gold bug had been found near the bug, on the beach. Although the paper had been blank on both sides when he drew the picture, the friend had seen the shape of a skull. He remembered then that the dog had leaped on the friend, causing the paper to come near the fire. Heat from the fire had brought out the outline of a skull. Legrand, seeing the skull when he took the parchment, had begun a feverish attempt to solve its meaning. By dipping the paper in warm water, he had found a numerical code. Deciphering had long been a hobby of his, and thus after a month he had found the secret of the parchment. It was his belief that the treasure was a fabulous one believed to have been buried by Captain Kidd. Even after he had deciphered the numbering, transposing the figures into words, he had had trouble finding the location of the landmarks revealed in the writing. But on the day he had slipped away from Jupiter he had discovered the hill and the tree. On the day of their search Jupiter's mistake about the left eye had caused an error, but the rectifying of that error had brought the treasure to light. The deciphered code had instructed that a bullet was to be dropped through the left eye of the death's head. Legrand, using the gold bug, wished only to punish his friend for suspecting his sanity.

PRINCE AMERIGO, an Italian nobleman married to Maggie Verver

CHARLOTTE STANT, a school friend of Maggie Verver

MRS. ASSINGHAM, a friend of the Ververs and the Prince

Critique:

This novel is full of the subtleties of the minds of cultured people. It is a collection of psychological shades and discriminations which are, at times, overwhelming to the reader, and it is also a forerunner of modern expressionism in literature. The novel is completely aloof from the homely realities of life. The characters are shut off in a world of their own, a world which will not tolerate crudities.

The Story:

Maggie Verver was the daughter of a wealthy American widower who had devoted all his life to his daughter. The Ververs lived a lazy life. Their time was spent in collecting items to decorate their own existence and to fill a museum which Mr. Verver was giving to his native city back in the United States. They had few friends. Maggie's only confidante was Mrs. Assingham, the American-born wife of a retired British army officer.

It was Mrs. Assingham who introduced the Ververs to Prince Amerigo, a handsome, quiet young Italian nobleman who struck Maggie's fancy. When she informed her father that she would like to marry the Prince, Mr. Verver provided a handsome dowry so that the wedding might take place.

A few days before the wedding a painful scene occurred in Mrs. Assingham's home, where the Prince and Charlotte Stant, deeply in love with each other, met to say goodbye. Each was penniless and a marriage had been out of the question. Since both were friends of Maggie, the present situation was painful for them. As a farewell lark they spent the last afternoon in searching for a wedding present for Charlotte to present to Maggie. In a tiny shop they discovered a golden bowl which Charlotte wished to purchase as a remembrance for the Prince from her. He refused it because of superstitious fears that a crack in the golden bowl might bring bad luck.

After the wedding of the Prince and Maggie, the lives of the pair coincided with the life that the Ververs had been living for years. Maggie and her father spent much of their time together. The Prince, although he did not complain, was really only a convenience that they had purchased because Maggie had reached the age when she needed to have a husband.

After a year and a half a baby was born to the Prince and Maggie, but the child made no apparent difference in the relationships between the girl and her father or the girl and her husband. Maggie decided that her father also needed a wife. She went to Mrs. Assingham and told her friend that she planned to have Charlotte Stant marry her father. Charlotte was a quiet person aware of the love between the girl and her father, and she was the sort of person who would be so thankful to marry a wealthy man that she would cause little trouble. Neither Maggie nor Mrs. Assingham put this aspect into words, but it was tacitly understood.

Mr. Verver, anxious to please his daughter in this as in everything else, married Charlotte a short time later. This second marriage created a strange situation. Maggie and her father both took houses in London where they could be together a great deal of the time. The association of father and daughter left the Prince and Charlotte much together. Maggie encouraged them to go out, to represent her and her father at balls and dinners. But Maggie did not know that her husband and her stepmother had been intimate before her own marriage to the Prince.

Several years went by in this manner, but slowly the fact that there was something strange in the relationships dawned upon Maggie's sensitive feelings. She eventually went to Mrs. Assingham and poured out her suspicions to her. Mrs. Assingham, in full knowledge of the circumstances, decided to keep silence.

Maggie resolved to say nothing of her suspicions to anyone else. But her attitude of indifference, her insistence in throwing the Prince and Charlotte together, aroused their suspicions that she knew they had been sweethearts, that she suspected them of being lovers after marriage.

Each one of the four speculated at length as to what the other three knew or suspected. Yet their mutual confidence and love prevented each one of them from ever asking anything of the others.

One day Maggie went shopping for some unusual art object to present to her father on his birthday. She accidentally happened into the same shop where the Prince and Charlotte had gone several years before, and she purchased the golden bowl which they had passed over because of its flaw. The following day the shopkeeper visited her. The name and address had told him that she was the wife of the Prince who had passed up the bowl years before. He knew that the existence of the crack would quickly come to the attention of the Prince, and so he had hastened to inform Maggie of the flaw and to return part of the purchase price. He also told her of the Prince's first visit to the shop and of the young woman who had been with him. Maggie then knew that the Prince and Charlotte had known each other before her marriage and that they had spent an afternoon together the day before she was married. She was upset. Again she confided in Mrs. Assingham.

Having learned that there was no serious relationship between the Prince and Charlotte, Mrs. Assingham informed Maggie that she was making a great ado over nothing at all. To point up her remark, she raised the bowl above her head and smashed it to the floor, where it broke into several pieces. As she did so, the Prince entered the room and saw the fragments of the bowl. After Mrs. Assingham's departure he tried to learn how much Maggie knew. Maggie and her husband agreed to say nothing to either Maggie's father or to Charlotte.

Charlotte, too, began to sense that something had disturbed Maggie, and she shrewdly guessed what it was. Then Maggie tried to realign the relationships of the four by proposing that she and Charlotte stay together for awhile and that the Prince and her father go to the Continent to buy art objects. This proposal was gently put forward and as gently rebuffed by the other three.

Maggie and her father began to realize that their selfishness in trying to keep up the father-daughter relationship which they had had before her marriage was wrong. Shortly after that selfishness had been brought into the open and discussed by Maggie and Mr. Verver, Charlotte told Maggie that she wished to return to America and to take her husband with her. She bluntly informed Maggie she was afraid that if Mr. Verver continued to live so close to his daughter he would lose interest in his wife. Mr. Verver agreed to accompany Charlotte back to the United States. It was a difficult decision for him to make. He realized that once he was away, Charlotte would never agree to his coming back to Europe to live.

On an autumn afternoon Mr. Verver and Charlotte went to have tea with Maggie and the Prince before leaving England. It was almost heartbreaking to Maggie to see her father's carriage take him out of sight and to know that her old way of life was really ended. The only thing which kept her from breaking down completely was the look on the Prince's face as he turned her face away from the direction her father's carriage had taken. At that moment, seeing his eyes, Maggie knew she had won her husband for herself and not for her money.

Critique:

Another of the favorite comic operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan is The Gondoliers, Or, The King of Barataria. Unlike most of their works, which were set in England and which poked gentle fun at Victorian customs and institutions, The Gondoliers has an Italian background. But the tone is the same, light and humorous throughout. It was the last truly successful operetta on which Gilbert and Sullivan collaborated before the famous break in their personal and business relationship.

The Story:

Twenty-four lovely maidens were in love with two gondoliers of Venice. In order to be fair, the two young gondoliers, Marco and Giuseppe Palmieri, had themselves blindfolded and then each caught a girl. The lucky ones were Gianetta and Tessa, and the two couples went off to be married.

A short time later the Duke of Plaza-Toro, a Grandee of Spain, arrived with his duchess and his daughter Casilda. They were accompanied by the duke's attendant, Luiz. The duke had come to Venice penniless, to pay his respects to the Grand Inquisitor and to learn the whereabouts of Casilda's husband. For much to that young lady's surprise, her father told her now that she had been married when a baby to the son of the King of Barataria. The king had become a bigoted Wesleyan Methodist and the Grand Inquisitor, to punish the turncoat king, had spirited his baby son away to Venice. Now the king was dead, killed in an uprising of his people, and the son, Casilda's husband, was entitled to the throne.

Casilda heard the news with mixed emotions. She would like to be queen but, unknown to the duke and duchess, she and the attendant Luiz were lovers. Luiz knew something of the story which had so surprised Casilda, for his mother, Inez, had been the baby prince's nurse. But Luiz could not persuade Casilda to renounce the marriage; the prospect of being a queen was stronger than love. But when the Grand Inquisitor received the duke and his wife and daughter, he had confusing news. He had given the baby to a worthy gondolier, to be reared with that man's own son. The gondolier had died from drink and gout, and the children, also gondoliers, could not be told one from another. However, the nurse to whom the young prince had been entrusted still lived. She would be sent for in the hope that she could identify the rightful king. Should she have difficulty making a decision, she would be tortured until she chose the right one.

The Grand Inquisitor thought the problem was almost solved. Coming upon Marco and Giuseppe and their new brides, he announced that one of them was the King of Barataria. Since he was not sure of the rightful king, a matter which could not be determined before the nurse arrived and settled the point, they must both go to Barataria and rule as one.

Marco and Giuseppe hated a monarchy and loved a republic, but when they found that they, as one, were kings, they suddenly loved a monarchy as well. Under their rule everyone would be equal, and their fellow gondoliers would be given important positions so that no one would serve another. The only drawback was that they must leave their new wives for three months, until the nurse could arrive and make her decision. The Grand Inquisitor did not disclose the fact that one of them already had another wife, the bride of his infancy. Gianetta and Tessa sadly bade their husbands goodbye, each one seeing herself a queen in three short months. The two kings sailed away for Barataria.

Three months went by. The government of the new rulers was indeed strange. The kings lived in the attic and did all the work while the gondoliers, now officers of state, reaped all the advantages reserved formerly for the monarch. Since the two men were one king, they were given only enough food for one man until their subjects relented and gave them a double portion. But the new rulers were pleased with their republican monarchy and thought it only right that they should serve their subjects for the privilege of being king.

Missing female company, the kings thought often of their wives. They were happily surprised, therefore, when Gianetta and Tessa and the other girls arrived in Barataria before they had been sent for. The two wives wanted to know instantly who was queen, but since the nurse had not yet appeared no decision could be made.

When the Grand Inquisitor found the two wives established in Barataria, he was forced to tell Marco and Giuseppe that one of them was a bigamist. He explained about the infant marriage and told them that the duke, the duchess, and Casilda, the real queen, were even then in Barataria. Inez, the nurse, had also arrived and was in the torture chamber, about to make her decision and name the rightful king.

When Casilda saw the two gondoliers, really one king, she told them that she would be a dutiful wife to whomever she married. She could never love either of them, however, for she loved another. The duke, disturbed by the lack of discipline and formality around the castle, tried to train the kings to be more courtly. They tried, but they were after all just simple gondoliers and could do nothing in a regal way.

At last the Grand Inquisitor brought forth Inez, the nurse who would identify the rightful king. When asked who he was, Marco or Giuseppe, she confessed that he was neither. When the lads were small, traitors had come to steal the prince away and she had substituted her own son. The real king was Luiz, the attendant loved by Casilda. So everyone was happy. Casilda was both a queen and the wife of the man she loved. The gondoliers were restored to their profession, one they much preferred to the responsibilities of royalty. Singing lustily, they departed, leaving the republican monarchy in the capable hands of King Luiz and Queen Casilda.

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Before the Saxon invasion of England

Locale: England

First presented: 1562

Principal characters:

GORBODUC, aged King of England

VIDENA, his queen

FERREX, and

PORREX, their sons

AROSTUS,

PHILANDER, and

EUBULUS, Gorboduc's counselors

DORDAN, counselor to Ferrex

HERMON, parasite and confidant of Ferrex

Critique:

Written and put on the stage during Elizabeth's reign, this play had direct political implications for the time. It pretended to show how England in the past had been thrown into turmoil when the land was left without a proper heir. Certainly the authors and many of the people who saw and read the play realized that its hints to the heirless queen were broad indeed. The play was first presented at the Christmas revels of the Inner Temple, in London, and the lawyers and magistrates and courtiers who witnessed it must undoubtedly have been wondering what course the throne would take if Elizabeth died without providing for a successor. In the history of English drama this play is important as the first play written in blank verse in English and because it was among the first English tragedies to employ a domestic political theme. In structure it followed the classical drama of Seneca.

The Story:

Gorboduc, King of Britain and last of the line beginning with the legendary Brute, decided that he would not wait until his death before handing over the rule of his kingdom. In addition, he decided that he would set aside the rule of primogeniture and divide Britain between his two sons, Ferrex and Porrex. To Ferrex, the older, he planned to give all lands south of the Humber River; to Porrex, the younger, he intended to give those lands north of the Humber.

Calling in his chief advisers, Gorboduc told them what was in his mind. Arostus was in complete agreement with the king's wishes, but Philander and Eubulus warned of the dangers of the plan. Although they admitted that the king would be able to aid his sons in the early years of their reigns, they felt that the sons might not be willing to take advice from their father after he had placed great power in their hands. The advisers also warned that when the authority of the kingdom was divided the allegiance of the people might be divided, and they pointed out that Ferrex might very well resent having to share the kingdom with a younger brother, since custom made it the rule that the firstborn son inherited the entire kingdom. Last of all, they warned Gorboduc that history had proved a kingdom divided was easier prey to foreign conquest.

Gorboduc listened to his counselors. When they had finished speaking, however, he told them his mind was made up, that he felt the advantages to be gained by dividing the kingdom during his lifetime outweighed the disadvantages. Accordingly, he set his plan in operation, not knowing that his queen, Videna, was extremely jealous of her older son's prerogative.

tives and hated the younger son for receiving a part of the kingdom which she felt rightfully belonged in its entirety to Ferrex.

Gorboduc sent trusted advisers of his own with each of the princes when they took over their separate domains, but before long both sons began to disregard their father's counselors. Instead, they listened to young men who preyed upon their vanities. Ferrex began to seek the advice of a parasite named Hermon, a man who flattered the young ruler's ego. Hermon told Ferrex that as the older son he should not have been given such a meager part of Britain and that, according to custom and his own ability, Ferrex should have been made ruler of the entire domain.

More than flattering Ferrex, Hermon told him that the younger king beyond the Humber was jealous of the older brother and was plotting to invade the kingdom of Ferrex. Dordan, the elderly counselor sent to Ferrex by Gorboduc, prevailed enough on the young man so that Ferrex made only secret preparations against a possible attack by his brother.

Meanwhile, north of the Humber, the same situation had developed. Porrex, the younger son, scorned the wise advice of his father's counselor and turned to a flattering parasite, who told Porrex about the secret plans being made for war by Ferrex. Porrex, who distrusted his brother, decided that a preventive war was the best solution to the problem, and he set out to invade the kingdom south of the Humber.

Dordan sent a letter to Gorboduc advising him of the state of affairs between the two brothers. The aged father-king called his trusted men about him to ask their advice. While the council met to seek a solution, word came that Porrex had invaded the older brother's kingdom and had murdered Ferrex with his own hand.

Queen Videna, when she heard what had happened to her beloved older son, swore she would be avenged on Porrex.

She vowed that he was no longer a son of hers but a criminal to be punished for his evil deeds.

Porrex, sent for by his father, appeared at Gorboduc's court and readily admitted invading his brother's kingdom and murdering his brother-king. Porrex said that he was genuinely sorry that the deed had been committed, but that he still felt the murder justified. He swore that Ferrex had tried to have him poisoned and that he had killed Ferrex in order to save his own life. Gorboduc, not knowing what to do until he had investigated the situation further, sent Porrex from his sight until he should send word that he wanted the young man's presence.

Scarcely had the young man left his father when he was killed by his mother, who thereby avenged the murder of Ferrex. The Britons, outraged at such conduct on the part of their rulers, then rose up in arms and murdered both Gorboduc and Queen Videna.

The nobles of Britain, left without a leader, tried to put down the uprising of the common people. They feared that if they did not quell the revolt at once the country would be weakened and left prey to some invading power. The nobles saw themselves, their families, their lands, and the whole country threatened by the tragedy that had destroyed the royal house. But even the nobles could not agree on a course of action.

When a number of them met in a solemn conclave to organize against the uprisen rabble, they learned that the Duke of Albany, filled with ambition to become ruler, had raised an army and set out on a campaign to make himself master of Britain. King Gorboduc's counselors advised the other nobles to join together to put down the duke, since he wished to usurp the throne. Faced by a common danger, they at last chose a new king for Britain, the old line having become extinct with the deaths of Gorboduc and his two sons.

THE GREAT GALEOTO

Type of work: Drama

Author: José Echegaray y Eizaguirre (1832-1916)

Type of plot: Social satire

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Madrid, Spain

First presented: 1881

Principal characters:

DON JULIAN, a rich Spanish businessman

TEODORA, his young and beautiful wife

ERNESTO, a young dramatist befriended by Don Julian

SEVERO, Don Julian's brother

MERCEDES, Severo's wife

Critique:

A long prologue to The Great Galeoto, spoken by Ernesto and Don Julian, clearly expresses the purpose of the play. Echegaray, a rebel against the limitations of the dramatic form, wished to place the whole of society on the stage and to use as motivations not the personal impulses of members of the cast of characters, but the nebulous motivations that arise out of the interactions of groups of people within the social framework. Thus it is that in this drama Echegaray shows the results of slander on the part of many people against the characters placed on the stage. The motivation for the action is not given by the characters we see; the whole of Madrid acts upon them behind the scenes. The problem of dramatic limitations upon reality, which is the basis of The Great Galeoto, makes it immediately comparable to another modern play dealing with similar problems, Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author.

The Story:

Ernesto, a young playwright, was taken into the home of Don Julian, a rich businessman who had been a close friend of Ernesto's father. Ernesto was working on a great play, but he had difficulty in putting down on paper what was in his mind. As he told Don Julian, his play was to include everyone and to reflect the whole world, not simply a part of it, but the laws of the drama made it impossible for him to put down what he wished to say within the space and symbols of a play. Don Julian, a practical man, told Ernesto to go get some sleep and be ready to go partridge shooting the next day. After Don Julian left, Ernesto's eye fell on a work by Dante. From it he took the title for his play, The Great Galeoto, after a character in the love story of Paolo and Francesca.

The following evening Don Julian and his wife Teodora sat watching the sunset. Don Julian told Teodora that he was afraid Ernesto was unhappy because they had done so much for him, that Ernesto felt he owed them much which could never be repaid. Ernesto joined them and in the ensuing conversation readily admitted his belief that he was living on charity and that people were talking about him. Don Julian said the situation could be remedied and suggested that Ernesto become his secretary, thus repaying, in the eyes of the world, what Julian gave him. Ernesto was pleased by the proposal and accepted.

Don Julian left the room. As the sun went down and Teodora and Ernesto continued to talk, Severo, Don Julian's brother, entered with Mercedes, his wife. Severo and Mercedes voiced their suspicions of the other two to one another and said that the whole city of Madrid was speaking of the affair going on in Don Julian's house between his young wife and the young man he had befriended. After the men left the room Mercedes even told Teodora about the slander that was being voiced in the city. Severo went to pass on the same information to Don Julian.

When Don Julian rejoined his wife, he expressed his anger that Severo should dare to insult his honor and Teodora's by bringing such slander into his home. Don Julian insisted that Ernesto remain in his house as he had before.

Ernesto, told of the slander by Severo's son, left Don Julian's fine home to live in a garret. At first Don Julian was glad, thinking that there might have been some truth in the town's gossip. Later he arrived at a different conclusion and went to invite Ernesto to return. While he and his brother waited in Ernesto's garret, Severo's son appeared with word that Ernesto was to fight a duel with the Viscount Nebreda, who had openly aired his malicious gossip in Ernesto's presence at a café. Don Julian immediately left to find Nebreda to force him to a duel in defense of his own honor.

The boy, left behind, was searching the apartment when Ernesto returned. In the angry conversation that followed, Ernesto told the boy that he and all society, with their slanders, were no better than Galeoto, who had been the go-between for Lancelot and Guinevere in their infamous affair, as told in Dante's story of Paolo and Francesca.

After the boy had gone Teodora came to Ernesto's quarters to see him. She had just learned that Ernesto was leaving Spain the following day and had come to tell him goodbye. Learning of the duel that Ernesto was to fight with Nebreda, she was disturbed that he should possibly humiliate her husband by dueling in his place, when Ernesto was the one, according to gossip, who had laid Don Julian's honor open to question.

While they argued, Severo's son returned to tell them that Don Julian had found Nebreda, fought with him, and had been wounded severely. He added that Don Julian had first returned to Ernesto's quarters to see him, but that a servant had told Don Julian he could not disturb Ernesto, who was with a lady. Severo and a servant appeared, carrying the wounded Don Julian. Teodora hid in the bedroom, but her presence was discovered when Don Julian asked to be placed on the bed.

After a dreadful scene Ernesto rushed out to find the Viscount Nebreda. He discovered him, fought a duel, and killed Nebreda. In the meantime Severo removed the wounded man to his home. After the duel Ernesto went to Don Julian's house to tell what he had done and to say goodbye to Don Julian and Teodora. Mercedes and her son refused to let him see the sick man. Ernesto told them how Teodora happened to be in his garret and added that she had been trying to prevent the duel between her husband and Nebreda.

After his departure Mercedes brutally questioned Teodora in an effort to make the young woman confess she was in love with Ernesto. She failed, but Teodora promised that Ernesto could never enter the house again. When Ernesto returned, he was ordered to leave, but he agreed to do so only after Teodora had repeated the request. As he was leaving, Severo laid hands on Teodora. Ernesto returned and compelled Severo on his knees to beg Teodora's pardon. He assured Severo that she was innocent of any infidelity.

Don Julian, hearing the commotion, left his sickroom. Infuriated, he slapped Ernesto's face and threatened to kill him in a duel. Severo and Mercedes helped Don Julian, his strength exhausted, back to his room, where he died a few minutes later. Severo, refusing to let Teodora enter her husband's room, claimed the house was his, and after his brother's death he tried to put Teodora out of it because of the scandal and shame that gossip had associated with her.

Teodora fainted. Ernesto picked her up and told Severo that he would take her away. He denounced Severo and society, who had forced him and Teodora into scandalous behavior. Society, he insisted, was no better than a pimp, a great Galeoto.

Unlike most historical novels, The Great Meadow keeps formal history in the background. The novel is essentially a study of a woman's place and problems in the wilderness. Diony Hall is the central character, and her problems are those which beset many women in the days of the early settlements. The need for food, for leather and cloth, for the aid of a husband's carpentry and farming experience—all are problems she has to face. The novel does not add to our knowledge of the settlement of the Kentucky country, but it does present a picture of life in the wilderness quite different from that of most writers on the subject. The style is an unusual one for historical fiction. Miss Roberts attempted to give insight into Diony Hall's mind by means of images and symbols, as in poetry, and through a modified form of the stream-of-consciousness technique.

The Story:

Thomas Hall, well-educated son of a tidewater Virginia family, had settled in upper Albemarle County after having lost his fortune to a dishonest relative. In the upper country he had married a young Methodist woman who had come down into Virginia from Pennsylvania. After their marriage Mrs. Hall bore four children, two boys and two girls.

Of all the children, the oldest girl was by far her father's favorite. She had been named Dione, out of Greek mythology but everyone called her Diony and spelled her name with a "y." Diony, with her father's help and the use of his small library, educated herself as best she could.

During the middle 1770's visitors occasionally stopped at the Hall house, really little more than a large cabin, as they passed from the Fincastle country or perhaps from even farther away in the cane meadows of Kentucky. Word came to the Halls in that manner of Boone, Henderson, and Harrod, and of the settlements those men had begun in the Kentucky country. The accounts of the back country held smaller charms for Diony than thoughts of visiting her rich relatives on the coasts of Virginia and Maryland; as a girl she believed a life of balls, great houses, carriages, and fancy clothes far more enticing than the rigors of the wilderness.

Among the Halls' neighbors was a family named Jarvis. Of the several boys of the Jarvis clan there was one who was over six feet tall, taller even than Diony's older brother. He was the first to succumb to travelers' tales of the Kentucky country. While he was gone he sent back word by a trapper that he hoped Diony would wait for his return before she accepted a husband. She had one suitor, a man from the tidewater, but Berk Jarvis so captured her imagination that she had her father send a letter ending the suit with the man of wealth and position who had been seeking her hand.

When Berk returned Diony quickly agreed to marry him and to go with him immediately into the wilderness, to the new settlement called Harrodsburg in the Kentucky country. Cloth was woven, garments were sewed, cattle were gathered together, kitchen utensils were selected, and seeds for a garden packed away. At last all was in readiness for the marriage and the wilderness trek to follow immediately. Thomas Hall had had the banns cried in the Anglican Church, according to the British law of the Virginia colony, but the couple and Diony's mother wanted the Methodist minister to perform the ceremony. He did, but many of the people, including Diony and Berk, had some misgivings as to the legality of the marriage, even though the argument of the newly signed Declaration of Independence was brought forth.

After the marriage Diony, Berk, his mother, and a number of other Virginians set out on the wilderness road across the Appalachian highlands to Kentucky. They followed the trail laid out by Daniel Boone. Without accident, but with great difficulty, the party reached Harrod's fort in the wilderness. Berk bought a claim on a farm at some distance from the fort. As the months passed, the lives of the newly married couple slowly took shape. Only one shadow appeared. One day, while Diony and her mother-in-law were out of the fort, they were surprised by Indians. Before Mrs. Jarvis was killed and scalped, she managed to save Diony's life. Berk swore that he would be avenged and kill the Indian who had taken his mother's scalp.

Diony recovered from injuries received when attacked by the Indians. One day, while Berk was purposely gone from the fort, she gave birth to a boy whom they named Tom. The baby was not many weeks old when Berk set out with a party of men to aid George Rogers Clark in his expeditions against the British in the Northwest Territory. Within a few weeks one of the party came back with an injury to his hand and the report of an Indian ambuscade. Berk had been taken by the Indians. Capture was at that time, even though the British gave a higher bounty for prisoners than for scalps, a certain death warrant for most prisoners.

In the weeks and months which passed after her husband's capture Diony stayed in the cabin in the settlement and provided for herself and the baby. Help was forthcoming from Evan Muir, the man who had returned with news of Berk's capture. In return for her nursing and cooking, Evan kept Diony and the child in meat and leather during the summer, fall, and winter. The following summer he farmed the Jarvis homestead claim on a share basis.

Gradually the people in the settlement began to feel sure that Berk was dead, and at last a report came in that he had been killed. Still Diony refused to believe that her husband would not return. Although Evan did not press his suit for marriage, the women of the village warned Diony that it was not fair for her to continue taking his labor on her behalf without giving him the rights of a husband. Diony finally yielded to their arguments and agreed to marry Evan. She soon discovered that she really loved the man and her passion for him was greater than it had been for Berk.

Diony and Evan moved to the Jarvis claim and lived in the house Berk had built there. For two years they lived happily and worked steadily to improve the place. In that time Diony gave birth to a child by Evan, another boy who was named Michael.

One night a call came from the edge of the clearing and Berk Jarvis walked up to the door. Neither Diony, Evan, nor Berk knew how to resolve the predicament of a wife with two legal husbands and a child by each of them. Berk and Evan began a fierce argument, but they were interrupted by visitors from the settlement. The people from the settlement said that the frontier law was that the wife had to choose which of the husbands she would keep; then the other one had to leave for good.

After the visitors left, Evan waited silently; he felt that all he had done for Diony, his labor of three years, would speak for itself. But Berk began a recital of his adventures among the Indians, telling how he had traveled as a prisoner-visitor as far as Sault Sainte Marie and had finally been able to escape and return. He described his tortures in the early weeks of his captivity: the floggings, the gantlet running, and the fear of being burned at the stake.

Late in the night Berk finished speaking. When he had, Diony said that she had made up her mind. She chose to have Berk remain, even though Evan had been a steadier husband. She told them both to leave the cabin that night, for she wanted to be alone for a time before she faced her new start on life with her first husband.

Critique:

No other novel in our literature owes so little to the tradition of the novel as a work of conscious art. A homespun product, it is as native to its time and place as the granite ledges and sugar orchards of New England. Daniel Pierce Thompson, lawyer, editor, and judge, had spent his boyhood on a farm near Montpelier, Vermont, and his knowledge of frontier life was as extensive as Cooper's. A writer by accident rather than by choice, he presented in his half dozen novels a romantic yet truthful record of the early history of his state. Of his books, The Green Mountain Boys is the best and the most popular. Printed first on a small newspaper press, it ran through more than fifty editions by 1860. Because the story deals with Ethan Allen and the struggle of his

Green Mountain Boys for liberty, the book has become the classic novel of Vermont. Thompson never strayed too far from facts or local scenery. In this novel Captain Warrington is Seth Warner under a fictional disguise made necessary by the plot. Selden and Captain Hendee are also recognizable as real persons. Mrs. Story, Munroe, Skene, Reed, McIntosh, Benedict Arnold, and Ethan Allen appear under their own names, familiar figures in the early annals of the state.

The Story:

In those troubled times which preceded the Revolutionary War the Vermont settlements were in armed dispute between the authorities of New York and the settlers who held their titles under the New Hampshire Grants. Many of the Green Mountain Boys, as the borderers called themselves, had been outlawed for their defiance of the New York Assembly. Among them was a young landowner named Captain Charles Warrington.

Early in April, 1775, Warrington and four of the Green Mountain Boys arrived at Lake Dunmore on their way to aid some wronged settlers of the region. Colonel Reed, a British officer holding a patent purchased in Albany, had built a log fort on the lower falls of Otter Creek and evicted the settlers living nearby. He had then returned to Canada, leaving the fort garrisoned by a detachment of former Highlanders under Sergeant Donald McIntosh. One attack on the fort had been repulsed; Warrington and his friends were planning a second attempt.

While the men were preparing to camp for the night, they learned that a band of New Yorkers led by Munroe, a York sheriff, was in pursuit. Neshobee, a friendly Indian, brought the warning, sent by Mrs. Ann Story, a widow who was resisting eviction from her half-cleared farm. Forewarned, Warrington and his men arranged an ambush for the Yorkers and took the attackers by surprise. Munroe and several others they doused in the lake. Munroe's guide was Jacob Sherwood, a settler who pretended sympathy with his neighbors in the Grants but who was secretly in the employ of New York land-jobbers. Captured by Pete Jones, one of the Green Mountain Boys, Sherwood was treated to a beech-sealing—a beating with beech rods—before he was allowed to take to his heels.

The Green Mountain Boys then separated. Warrington and his friend Selden went to Mrs. Story's cabin, which they found empty. Warrington, unable to sleep, was wandering near the cabin when he heard muffled singing. Because the voice resembled that of a woman whom he thought far from the wilderness, he investigated further, to find that the singing apparently came from underground. Mystified, he returned to the cabin and went to sleep. The next morning Mrs. Story and her children appeared from the forest. Questioned, she admitted that a recent guest had departed, and she showed Warrington an underground chamber fashioned from a cave, a refuge in which her family and the guest had spent the night. To Warrington's questions she replied cryptically that the hedge was too high for him to leap at that time.

Later in the morning Munroe and his men appeared at the cabin and almost succeeded in trapping Warrington and Selden, who were hidden inside. Mrs. Story confronted them with her rifle, but the tongue lashing she gave the sheriff was even more effective in putting that discomfited officer to rout. Before Warrington's departure Mrs. Story made him promise that he would not harm the family whom Neshobee served.

His force increased by other settlers from the Grants, Warrington attacked Reed's fort, but McIntosh, warned by Sherwood, was ready to resist the onslaught from behind log barricades blocking the approach to the fort. While reconnoitering, Warrington and Selden discovered that the only two occupants were Jessy Reed, the colonel's daughter, and Zilpah, her half-Indian servant. Climbing over the stockade, they were able to threaten the defenders from the rear. McIntosh asked permission to surrender formally, and Warrington allowed the sergeant and his men to depart under parole for holdings owned by Colonel Reed on the New York side of Lake Champlain. Jessy Reed preferred to go to the home of some friends, the daughters of Colonel Skene, at Skenesboro, and Selden was delegated to convey her there safely. On the way, impressed by her charms, he told her something about himself. He knew neither his name nor his birthplace. Several families had fostered him until at last a benevolent British nobleman had provided for his education abroad. Tiring of Europe, he had returned to the colonies and had drifted into the Grants, where he joined Warrington in his resistance to the harsh decrees of New York officials.

Warrington, after reestablishing the settlers along Otter Creek and sending a party in pursuit of a York surveyor reported in the neighborhood, traveled southward to the region opposite Crown Point. His own lands lay there in the shadow of Snake Mountain, and he was surprised to find that a part of the wilderness tract had been replaced by well-tilled fields. While he stood looking across Lake Champlain, he heard a woman scream. In a clearing nearby a girl was being annoyed by a soldier from the opposite fort. The man fled when Warrington appeared and Warrington found himself face to face with Alma Hendee, who addressed him as Mr. Howard. She told him also that her father held these lands under a York title and that she and her parent lived in daily dread of an attack by Warrington and his band of border ruffians.

Warrington did not reveal his true name. Several years before, while traveling as Mr. Howard, he had gone on a mission to New York and there had met Captain Hendee and his daughter. But the family had disappeared mysteriously and he had uncovered no trace of them. A short time later, when he called at the Hendee cabin, he learned more of their story. The captain had been compelled to leave New York suddenly because of pressing debts. Years before Jacob Sherwood's father had mismanaged an estate belonging to the captain. He had also persuaded Gilbert Hendee, the captain's brother, to make a will naming Sherwood the legatee if Captain Hendee's small son, Edward, should die before reaching his majority. Edward Hendee had disappeared soon afterward; it was believed that he had been killed or stolen by Indians. Jacob Sherwood, after his father had acquired Gilbert Hendee's estate, became solicitous for the welfare of Alma and her father. After he had established them in the Grants he became, with the captain's permission, Alma's suitor. Neshobee was the Hendees' servant. Mrs. Story's cryptic remark and her request were clear to Warrington at last.

While Warrington was calling on the Hendees, another visitor arrived, a tall, commanding-looking man who gave his name as Smith. He brought word that Americans and British had fought at Lexington and that American blood had been shed. Before Warrington and Smith could take their departure, some soldiers from Crown Point entered the cabin. They were led by Bill Darrow, who had molested Alma in the forest. Darrow, Sherwood's confederate, had recognized Warrington and intended to make him a prisoner. Because the presence of Smith hindered his plan, Darrow tried to make the big man drunk. Late that night Smith and Warrington went to the barn to sleep. Smith then revealed that he had been pouring his drinks into his boots; he was sober. Warrington called him Ethan Allen. He was the leader of the Green Mountain Boys, a greater prize than Warrington if the soldiers had known it.

Alma, by that time aware of Warrington's identity, sent Neshobee to the barn with the guns the men had been forced to leave behind. While the soldiers were still carousing, the two men slipped away into the forest.

The Green Mountain Boys held a rendezvous at the middle falls of Otter Creek. Selden and Pete Jones arrived with Squire Prouty, a York justice of the peace. Another prisoner brought in was the York surveyor. The prisoners were sentenced to lash each other. Prouty was allowed to return to his home, but the surveyor was sent back across the New York line.

Ethan Allen summoned the Green Mountain Boys to another meeting near Middlebury. There he reminded them of the wrongs the settlers had suffered and disclosed his secret project, the capture of Fort Ticonderoga. When the men gathered for a muster at Castleton, a dispute arose between Ethan Allen and Benedict Arnold, who had arrived with a force of men under his command. Warrington settled the difficulties between the two men and Ethan Allen was named leader of the expedition.

Taken by surprise, Fort Ticonderoga fell, but Warrington was not present at the assault; he had been delayed while obtaining boats for the militia. When Ethan Allen offered him the command for an attack on Crown Point, Warrington said that Selden ought to be the leader, as Miss Reed was still at Skenesboro.

The Hendees, aroused by cannonading across the lake, saw several bateaux filled with armed men bearing down on the fortress at Crown Point. Through her father's spyglass Alma saw the gates of the fort thrown open after a brief parley and the British flag slowly lowered. A short time later Neshobee brought word that Warrington was in command of the garrison. Alma, who had heard from Mrs. Story an account of Warrington's bravery and Sherwood's duplicity, was in sympathy with the Green Mountain Boys, but when Warrington sent her a note asking her to elope with him, she refused for her father's sake. Pete Jones brought her also a letter from Jessy Reed, in which Miss Reed said that she was once more Selden's prisoner.

When Warrington renewed his visits to the Hendee cabin, the captain gladly received him. Jacob Sherwood, whose treachery had been revealed, was ordered from the house when he next appeared. Meanwhile Jacob's father had died, conscience-stricken, after willing back the Hendee property to the captain. While the will was still in the possession of the Sherwood attorney, Jacob Sherwood burned some incriminating papers of his father's. Darrow reported to him that a young officer at Crown Point bore a striking resemblance to the lost Edward Hendee.

Burgoyne marched his troops from Canada, and Jacob Sherwood recruited a band of Tories and Indians to harass settlers in the Grants. The Hendees, accompanied by Jessy Reed, fled, only to be betrayed by their treacherous guide. Captured, they were taken to the Tory camp, where Sherwood tried to force Alma into marriage. Neshobee, eluding the guards, carried word of the Hendees' plight to Warrington, who was several miles away with the rear guard of St. Clair's army. Selden was dispatched to effect their rescue.

After Neshobee's escape Sherwood hurried his captives away from the camp. From a cliff the prisoners watched the battle of Hubbardton. During the engagement Selden and his men appeared and routed Sherwood's guards. With Sherwood and his band in close pursuit, the fugitives, accompanied by Selden and Pete Jones, made their way to Mrs. Story's clearing. The women were sent to the underground chamber, while the men prepared to defend the cabin. When the attackers set fire to the logs, those inside the cabin retreated through an underground passage to the cave. Unable to force the entrance to the chamber, Sherwood ordered his men to dig out the defenders. At Captain Hendee's suggestion a mine was rigged from some casks of powder stored in the cave, and as a last desperate measure of resistance the attackers were blown up. Sherwood escaped. Darrow, horribly mutilated by the blast, revealed that Selden was Edward Hendee, whom Darrow, on orders from the older Sherwood, had kidnaped and abandoned years before. As the guilty man lay dying, Warrington and a troop of horse arrived on the scene. The soldiers escorted the fugitives to a place of safety in one of the older settlements.

After the battle of Bennington the company reassembled at Captain Hendee's for a double wedding, the marriage of Alma and Warrington and that of Edward Hendee and Jessy Reed, whose father had sent word of his consent. Pete Jones, carried away by the spirit of the occasion, proposed to Alma's maid, Ruth, and was coyly accepted. Ethan Allen decided that still one more marriage would be in order. Bluffly he persuaded Zilpah to accept the faithful Neshobee. Then, having done all that man could do, he asked the parson to do his duty.

Warrington and Edward Hendee returned to Vermont at the war's end, to lead long lives of service to their state. Pete Jones and his wife prospered on their farm, and Neshobee and Zilpah remained with Captain Hendee for many years. Jacob Sherwood finally found refuge in a Tory colony in Canada, where he died in poverty and disgrace.

Critique:

In the development of Argentine literature, many early nineteenth-century stories and plays made fun of the foreign-born gringo. Later dramatists, however, realized the foreigner's contribution to the nation's progress and made the immigrant a figure sympathetically presented. La Gringa—The Foreign Girl—is such a play, written by the short-lived Florencio Sánchez, one of Latin America's greatest playwrights. Born in Uruguay, he spent most of his life on the Argentine side of the River Plate. Leading a bohemian existence, he wrote rapidly, sometimes completing a play in a single night. His writing time for his eight long and twelve short dramas was only about thirty-five days in all. But he gave a new technique to the stage and made it a theater of modern theses, as in La Gringa. He saw the hope of Argentina in a blending of the creole, or native, spirit and the blood of ambitious, industrious immigrants like the Don Nicola in this play.

The Story:

Don Nicola was an immigrant landowner who worked hard on his farm and expected his laborers to do the same. Privately, his workmen and less ambitious neighbors criticized him because he made his wife and children get up at two o'clock in the morning to begin their daily chores.

One of his neighbors was Don Cantalicio, an easygoing creole farmer deeply in Don Nicola's debt. Próspero, his son, worked for Don Nicola and cast many languishing glances in the direction of Victoria, his employer's pretty daughter. Early one morning, coming to breakfast with the other laborers, Próspero seized his chance to kiss Victoria when he found her at her work. She offered little resistance to his embrace. Later one of the boys reported that he had seen the Italian's white ox in old Cantalicio's pasture. Próspero was forced to defend his father against a charge of thievery.

Payment of a loan of forty-five hundred pesos being about to fall due, Cantalicio begged his neighbor for a year's extension of credit. Don Nicola said that he intended to foreclose on Cantalicio's property, his reason being that his son Horacio, then studying in Buenos Aires, wanted the land for a farm. Cantalicio, although unable to pay the debt, refused to give up his property. When Próspero commented that his father should have planted wheat instead of trying to pasture cattle, Cantalicio turned on his son and accused him of becoming a gringo—a despised foreigner.

Not long afterward María, Don Nicola's wife, discovered Próspero hugging her daughter. Told what had happened, the Italian discharged the boy. It did no good for Próspero to ask for Victoria's hand. Don Nicola was not making money for any creole son-in-law to squander!

A few days later the customers in a nearby tavern were drinking and teasing the waitress when a call came for the doctor to attend a sick but penniless peon. He refused to budge, however, until some of the loiterers offered to pay his fee. Into the tavern to gossip with the manager's wife came María and Victoria, who had been shopping in town while Don Nicola discussed with his lawyer the confiscation of Cantalicio's property. Próspero also arrived, about to leave Santa Fé. He would not listen when Victoria pleaded with him to stay. He had another quarrel with his father, who again accused him of taking the side of foreigners against those of good Argentine blood.

Cantalicio, having lost the lawsuit he had brought in an attempt to keep his property, was also preparing to leave the district. He complained bitterly that the immigrants were taking over all the land. When Don Nicola appeared at the tavern to pay him the cash difference between the amount of the debt and the value of the farm, Canatalicio refused to accept a note for a part of the settlement, even though the priest promised to see that the note was made good. The ruined creole trusted no one, and he wept as he declared that everyone was against him.

Two years later many changes had been made on the farm taken over by Don Nicola. To make room for a new building, he planned to have the workmen chop down the ancient ombú tree, symbol of the old-time Argentine gaucho. Horacio, now settled on the farm, was explaining to his father the use of gravity in connection with a new reservoir when the listless Victoria appeared. She did not seem interested in anything, not even in plans for her own room in the new house.

Old Cantalicio turned up unexpectedly. Working for others, he was driving oxen to a nearby town, and he stopped to see what his old home looked like. Every change saddened him, but he reacted most strongly to the cutting down of the ombú. Don Nicola had no right to touch the tree, he asserted; it belonged to the land.

Victoria kept trying to tell him something, but all she could say was that she had been for several months in Rosario. There she had seen Próspero, who missed his father. She also let slip the fact that she was receiving letters from the boy. Horacio had further word of Próspero; he reported that Mr. Daples, an agent for farm machinery in Rosario, regarded Cantalicio's son as his most valued employee. The brother and sister offered to take the old man around the farm. Still resentful, he refused and hurriedly mounted his horse.

At that moment the auto of the man who was building the new house chugged over the hill. That symbol of modern progress frightened the creole's horse, throwing Cantalicio in front of the car. Refusing the aid of everyone except Victoria, the hurt man begged her to help him to the ombú; he wanted to die when it fell. He cursed Don Nicola, calling him a gringo.

Several weeks later everything was going well on the renovated farm. Buyers were offering bonuses to get Don Nicola's clean wheat as soon as the thresher arrived to harvest it. Don Nicola told Horacio that the contractor wanted to marry Victoria and had asked for an answer before he left that night. The father was anxious to consult her as to her choice, but she was spending most of her time looking after Cantalicio, who had lost his right arm through his accident. Some of the household thought that he would be better off in a hospital.

Overhearing their discussion, Cantalicio announced that he would leave the farm at once, on foot if they would not lend him a wagon. But Victoria refused to hear of his leaving. Breaking down, she insisted that she needed him, for she was carrying Próspero's child.

Próspero, having been sent by Mr. Daples to run the threshing machine, arrived at the farm. Great was María's dismay when she again caught him embracing her daughter. When she called for her husband to come and drive Próspero off the place once and for all, Don Nicola remarked on the young man's industry and calculated that if the boy married into the family they could get their threshing done for nothing. Even Cantalicio became reconciled to the gringos—at least to one of them—and let drop the announcement of his expected grandchild. All were excited. But Don Nicola was never one to waste time, even for such a reason. All right, he declared; Próspero could have Victoria. Meanwhile there was the threshing to be done. Grandchild or no grandchild, the work came first!

GUY MANNERING

Type of work: Novel

Author: Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Scotland

First published: 1815

Principal characters:

COLONEL GUY MANNERING, a retired army officer

JULIA MANNERING, his daughter

CAPTAIN BROWN, a soldier

LUCY BERTRAM, an orphan girl

CHARLES HAZLEWOOD, Lucy's suitor

SIR ROBERT HAZLEWOOD, his father

GILBERT GLOSSIN, holder of the Bertram property

DIRK HATTERAICK, a smuggler

MEG MERRILIES, a gipsy

DOMINIE SAMPSON, tutor to the Bertram children

Critique:

Certainly one of the greatest abilities of Sir Walter Scott was his flair for making people seem real, especially those drawn from the lower social ranks. No doubt his human touch was based on his own genuine love for people of all walks of life. In Guy Mannering, this familiarity with the ways and foibles of human nature is evident throughout. His peasants, tradesmen, and outcasts are not too ignorant or coarse to have fine sensibilities. Indeed, it was the loyalty of the old gipsy, Meg Merrilies, which was primarily responsible for the happy outcome of this novel.

Through these people Scott gave his readers an appreciation of the real values of life.

The Story:

Guy Mannering, a young English gentleman traveling in Scotland, stopped at the home of Godfrey Bertram, Laird of Ellangowan, on the night the first Bertram child, a boy, was born. Mannering, a student of astrology, cast the horoscope of the newborn babe and was distressed to find that the child's fifth, tenth, and twenty-first years would be hazardous. The young Englishman puzzled over the fact that the boy's twenty-first year would correspond with the thirty-ninth year of the girl Mannering loved, which was the year the stars said would bring her death or imprisonment. An old gipsy, Meg Merrilies, also predicted danger for the new baby. Mannering, not wishing to worry the parents, wrote down his findings and presented them to Mr. Bertram, first cautioning him not to open the packet until the child had passed by one day his fifth birthday. Then he departed.

Young Harry Bertram grew steadily and well. He was tutored and supervised by Dominie Sampson, a teacher and preacher retained by his father; and at times the child was also watched over by the gipsy Meg, who had great love for the boy. The child was four years old when the laird became a justice of the peace and promised to rid the countryside of gipsies and poachers. After he had ordered all gipsies to leave the district, old Meg put a curse on him, saying that his own house was in danger of being as empty as were now the homes of the gipsies. On Harry's fifth birthday the prediction came true, for the boy disappeared while on a ride with a revenue officer hunting smugglers. The man was killed and his body found, but there was no trace of the child. All search proving futile, he was at last given up for dead. In her grief, his mother, prematurely delivered of a daughter, died soon afterward.

Seventeen years passed. Old Mr. Bertram, cheated by his lawyer, Gilbert Glossin, was to have his estate sold to pay his debts. Glossin planned to buy the property without much outlay of money, for the law said that when an heir was missing a purchaser need not put up the full price, in case the heir should return and claim his inheritance. Before the sale Guy Mannering returned and tried to buy the property, to save it for the Bertram family, but a delay in the mails prevented his effort and Glossin got possession of the estate. Old Mr. Bertram died before the transaction was completed, leaving his daughter Lucy homeless and penniless.

During these transactions Mannering's past history came to light. Years before he had gone as a soldier to India and there married. Through a misunderstanding he had accused his wife of faithlessness with one Captain Brown, who was in reality in love with Mannering's daughter, Julia. The two men fought a duel and Brown was wounded. Later he was captured by bandits, and Mannering assumed that he was dead. When Mannering's wife died eight months later, the unhappy man, having learned she had not been unfaithful, resigned his commission and returned with his daughter to England.

On learning that he could not buy the Bertram estate and allow Lucy to remain there with the faithful Dominie Sampson, Mannering leased a nearby house for them. He also brought to the house his daughter Julia, after he learned from friends with whom she was staying that she had been secretly meeting an unknown young man. What Mannering did not know was that the man was Captain Brown, who had escaped from his bandit captors and followed Julia to England and later to Scotland. Both Julia and Lucy were unhappy in their love affairs. Lucy loved Charles Hazlewood, but since Lucy had no money Charles' father would not permit their marriage.

Captain Brown, loitering near the house, met old Meg Merrilies, who took a great interest in him. Once she saved his life, and for his thanks made him promise to come to her whenever she sent for him. A short time later Brown encountered Julia, Lucy, and Charles Hazlewood. Charles, thinking Brown a bandit, pulled a firearm from his clothing. In his attempt to disarm Charles, Brown accidentally discharged the weapon and wounded Charles. Brown fled.

Charles would have made little of the incident, but Glossin, desiring to gain favor with the gentry by whom he had been snubbed since he had bought the Bertram property, went to Sir Robert Hazlewood and offered to apprehend the man who had shot his son. Glossin, finding some papers marked with the name of Brown, used them in his search. He was momentarily deterred, however, when he was called to interview a prisoner named Dirk Hatteraick. Dirk, a Dutch smuggler, was the killer of the revenue officer found dead when the Bertram heir disappeared. Dirk told Glossin that the boy was alive and in Scotland. Because Glossin had planned that kidnapping, many years before, it was to his advantage to have the young man disappear again. He was even more anxious to get rid of the Bertram heir forever when he learned from Dirk that the man was Captain Brown. Brown—or Harry Bertram—would claim his estate, and Glossin would lose the rich property he had acquired for almost nothing. Glossin finally captured Brown and had him imprisoned, after arranging with Dirk to storm the prison and carry Brown off to sea, to be killed or lost.

Old Meg, learning of the plot in some mysterious way, foiled it when she had Harry Bertram rescued. She also secured Mannering's aid in behalf of the young man, whom she had loved from the day of his birth. Bertram was taken by his rescuers to Mannering's home. There his story was pieced together from what he remembered and from the memory of old Dominie Sampson. Bertram could hardly believe that he was the heir to Ellangowan and Lucy's brother. His sister was overjoyed at the reunion. But it would take more than the proof of circumstances to win back his inheritance from Glossin. Mannering, Sampson, and Sir Robert Hazlewood, who heard the story, tried to trace old papers to secure the needed proof.

In the meantime old Meg sent Bertram a message reminding him of Brown's promise to come should she need him. She led him into a cave where Dirk was hiding out and there told him her story. She had kidnapped him for Dirk on the day the revenue officer was murdered. She had promised Dirk and Glossin, also one of the gang, not to reveal her secret until the boy was twenty-one years old. Now she felt released from her promise, as that period had passed. She told Bertram to capture Dirk for the hangman, but before the smuggler could be taken he shot the old gipsy in the heart.

Dirk, taken to prison, would not verify the gipsy's story, and his sullenness was taken as proof of Bertram's right to his inheritance. Glossin's part in the plot was also revealed, and he too was put into prison to await trial. When the two plotters fought in the cell, Dirk killed Glossin. Then Dirk wrote a full confession and cheated the hangman by killing himself. His confession, added to other evidence, proved Bertram's claim, and he was restored to his rightful position. Successful at last in his suit for Julia Mannering, he settled part of his estate on his sister Lucy and so paved the way for her marriage with Charles Hazlewood. The predictions had come true; Mannering's work was done.

Critique:

To readers of Alemán's own day The Life and Adventures of Guzmán de Alfarache was a book much more popular than Cervantes' Don Quixote, its contemporary. Thirty editions of the novel appeared within six years of its publication and its vogue quickly spread to France and England, where in 1622 James Mabbe translated it into English under the appropriate title of The Rogue. Alemán's novel, published in two parts in 1599 and 1604, is typically Spanish: realistic, comic, often coarse. As in other picaresque narratives, Guzmán de Alfarache travels extensively and moves from the highest ranks of society to the lowest, all the while living by his wits and commenting freely on the follies and vices of mankind. Yet Guzmán is not wholly bad; his career is forced upon him by the realization that in his own world he must either trick or be tricked. Being young and high-spirited, he chooses the first course. What sets Guzmán de Alfarache apart from other examples of the picaresque novel, however, is the writer's use of philosophical and moralizing digression. Alemán loses no opportunity to comment on human character or behavior, and in his discursive passages he reveals his own outstanding qualities: frankness, pessimism, broad humor, wit, humility of faith, and practical common sense. It is unfortunate that many modern readers have found his discourses dull or distracting. Viewed as their author intended them, they provide a reading of life itself, an obbligatorio accompaniment to a story which is, in narrative outline and in character drawing, one of the best and most diverting of the picaresque romances.

The Story:

The ancestors of Guzmán de Alfarache lived in Genoa, upstart noblemen who had grown rich in trade. Like others of his family, Guzmán's father was a dealer on the exchange, resorting even to usury in order to add to his wealth, although he piously heard mass every morning and owned a rosary with beads as large as hazelnuts. His love of money led him into his greatest adventure, for when a partner in Seville became bankrupt and carried away some of the money belonging to Guzmán's father, the Genoese took ship for Spain in an attempt to recover some of his lost property. On the way the ship he sailed in was captured by Moorish pirates and the merchant was sold into slavery in Algiers. Seeing no other way out of his difficulty, he embraced the faith of Allah and so was able to marry a rich Moorish widow. Secretly, he took possession of her money and jewels and fled with them to Seville. There, after some time, he found his former partner, recovered most of his debt, made his peace with the Church, and settled down to live the life of a gentleman, trading in money for his profit and gambling for his pleasure.

Being prosperous at the time, he bought two estates, one in town, the other at San Juan de Alfarache. One day he saw the mistress of an old knight and fell in love with her. The lady was not unwilling to share her favors between her two lovers, so that Guzmán could say in later life that at the time of his birth he had possessed two fathers. When the old knight died, the woman carried away all his property and a short time later married Guzmán's true father. The merchant did not long survive, but died a bankrupt, impoverished by his gambling and love of rich living. Left penniless, Guzmán decided to seek his fortune elsewhere. Calling himself Guzmán de Alfarache, after his father's country estate, he started out at fourteen to see the world.

Unused to walking, he soon tired and slept supperless that night on the steps of a church not far from Seville. The next morning his way led him to a wretched inn, where the hostess cooked him a breakfast omelet of eggs filled with half-hatched chicks. He ate the mess ravenously, but before he had traveled a league from the inn he became violently ill. A passing muleteer laughed heartily when Guzmán told his story and in his glee he invited the boy to ride with him. As they rode along the muleteer told how the hostess of the inn had tried the same trick on two lively young fellows who had rubbed her face in the omelet and daubed her with soot.

Meanwhile Guzmán and the muleteer had found two friars by the roadside. Since they were on their way to Caçalla, they were willing to hire two of the carrier's mules. That night the travelers stopped at a village inn where the landlord fed them a freshly-killed young mule instead of veal. The next morning, after discovering the deception, Guzmán and the muleteer threw the whole inn into an uproar. During the confusion two alcaldes appeared and took the rascally landlord into custody. Guzmán and the muleteer left the town in great haste.

Some distance beyond the village they were overtaken by several constables looking for a page who had stolen from his master. Mistaking Guzmán for the page, they seized him, and when the muleteer tried to interfere they bound him as well. After the prisoners had been severely beaten, the constables, convinced of Guzmán's innocence, allowed the travelers to continue on their way. To help Guzmán and the carrier to forget their aching bones, one of the priests told the romantic story of Ozmin and Daraxa, a tale of the Moorish wars.

By the time the story ended they were in sight of Caçalla, where they parted company. For Guzmán's transportation and lodging the muleteer demanded more than the boy could pay. The two friars decided at last upon a fair price, but the reckoning left Guzmán without enough money to buy his dinner that day.

Hungry but ashamed to beg, Guzmán took the road to Madrid. For a time he followed two travelers in the hope that they would offer him some of their dinner when they stopped to eat, but they ignored him. A poor Franciscan friar came by, however, and shared with the boy his loaf of bread and piece of bacon. That night an innkeeper gave Guzmán a bed in a stable and the next morning hired him to feed the horses of the guests. Guzmán soon learned to cheat in measuring oats and straw. Deciding at last that the life was too lazy for him, he left the inn and started once more for Madrid.

His coppers soon spent, he was forced to beg, but with such poor luck that it was necessary for him to sell the clothes off his back in order to live. By the time he reached Madrid he looked like a scarecrow. Unable to find work because of his poor appearance, he fell in with some beggars who taught him knavery of all kinds.

For a time he became a porter, hiring himself to carry provisions which purchasers had bought at market. In this way he met a cook who persuaded him to turn scullion. Like the other servants, Guzmán learned to steal from his master. One day he took a silver goblet. His mistress, discovering the loss, gave him money to buy another like it. Guzmán returned the goblet and kept the money, which he soon lost at cards. He continued his petty thefts until his master caught him selling provisions and cuffed him out of the house. Then he went back to carrying baskets in the market. Among his customers was a trusting grocer who one day put into his basket more than twenty-five hundred gold reals. Escaping through side streets, Guzmán fled into the country, where he lay hidden until the hue and cry had died down. With his riches he planned to visit his father's kinsmen in Genoa.

When he thought the coast clear, Guzmán headed for Toledo. On the way he fell in with a young man from whom he bought an outfit of clothing. Freshly attired, he lived like a young gentleman of fortune. He had little luck in his gallantries, however, and his love intrigues always ended with his being fleeced or made ridiculous by ladies he courted. He left Toledo with few regrets when he heard that a constable was looking for a young man recently arrived from Madrid.

At Almagro, Guzmán found a company of soldiers on their way to Italy. Hoping to leave his past troubles behind him, he enlisted. Before long he became the captain's crony, and the two spent their nights in gaming and wenching. Finding himself without funds, Guzmán resorted to his old habits of roguery; at the same time he was reduced to serving the captain who had formerly treated him as an equal. The captain was perfectly willing to profit by Guzmán's wits. In Barcelona they gulled a miserly old jeweler. Guzmán took to him a gold reliquary of the captain's and offered it for sale. After much haggling they agreed upon a price of one hundred and twenty crowns and the jeweler promised to bring the money to the dock. When Guzmán had the coins in his hand, he cut the strings which held the reliquary around his neck and handed the jewel to the old man. Then, after passing the money to a confederate, he shouted that the jeweler was a thief. Because the strings of the reliquary had been cut, and no money was found on Guzmán's person, his story was believed. Guzmán and the captain kept both the money and the jewel.

Having no further use for Guzmán's services, the captain decided to abandon the rogue after the soldiers arrived in Genoa. Turned loose with a single coin, Guzmán applied to his rich relatives for aid. But they refused to receive him and gave him only curses and blows. Don Beltran, his uncle, did take the boy into his house, but only for the purpose of setting the servants on him and having them toss him in a blanket until he was shaken and bruised. The next morning, swearing revenge on his deceitful relative, Guzmán started for Rome.

There he turned professional beggar and lived by his wits, having learned how to make bones appear disjointed and to raise false sores that resembled leprosy or ulcers. Only once was he beaten for his mendacity. One day a kind-hearted cardinal noticed an evil-looking ulcer on Guzmán's leg. Out of pity he had the beggar taken to his own house and given medical attention. The doctor summoned to attend him soon discovered Guzmán's trick, but he kept silent in order to mulct some of the prelate's gold. The sore cured, Guzmán became a page in the cardinal's household. There he lived daintily enough, but he was unable to refrain from stealing preserves and sweetmeats kept in a chest in the cardinal's chamber. Caught when the lid of the chest fell on his arm, trapping him, he received a beating. Even then the cardinal did not discharge him, but at last the churchman could stand his thieving and gambling no longer and Guzmán was dismissed.

His next employment was in the household of the French ambassador, to whom he was page, jester, and pimp, a rascal whose boisterous pranks helped to clear the ambassador's table of parasites who abused the Frenchman's hospitality. The ambassador, planning an intrigue with the wife of a Roman gentleman, made Guzmán his go-between. Learning that the page had seduced her maid, the matron determined to teach him and his master a lesson. One night, while he waited for her answer to the ambassador, she allowed Guzmán to stand for hours in a drenching rain. Blundering about in the darkness of a backyard, he fell into a pigsty. The next day, dressed in his best, he went to complain to his sweetheart about his treatment. While he was strutting before her, a boar escaped from its pen, ran between his legs, and carried him through the muddy streets of Rome.

Guzmán became the laughingstock of the town. One day, as some urchins were taunting him, another young man came to his assistance. He and his rescuer, a waggish young Spaniard named Sayavedra, became close friends. Anxious to escape ridicule, Guzmán decided to go to Siena to visit a friend named Pompeyo. While he tarried in Rome to make his farewells, he sent his trunks on ahead. Great was his dismay when he arrived in Siena and learned that his trunks, filled with clothing, money, and jewels, had been stolen. Sayavedra had preceded him to Siena, passed himself off as Signor Guzmán, and with his confederates made off with the real Guzmán's valuables. After a search Sayavedra was arrested, but the stolen property could not be recovered; it had passed into the hands of a rich thief-master named Alexandro Bentivoglio. Making the best of a bad situation, Guzmán refused to bring charges against the wretched Sayavedra.

Since his guest was low in funds, Pompeyo proved only an indifferent host, and at last Guzmán decided to go to Florence. Not far from Siena he overtook Sayavedra again. When the thief begged for pardon, Guzmán was filled with pity for the rascal and readily forgave him. Together they planned to have Guzmán pass as the nephew of the Spanish ambassador, Sayavedra as his page. Being without shame, they played on the credulity of all whom they met in Florence. Guzmán was about to marry a rich young widow when a beggar whom he had formerly known revealed the impostor's true identity, and he and his page were forced to flee the city.

They went next to Bologna, where Guzmán began a suit to recover his property from Bentivoglio. For his pains he was thrown into jail, from which he was released, penniless again, only after he had withdrawn his charges. Aided by Sayavedra, Guzmán cheated two men at cards, and with the money he won they traveled to Milan. In that city they entered into a conspiracy to defraud a wealthy merchant. Although he himself was arrested as a swindler, Guzmán convinced the city officials of the merchant's dishonesty, and a large sum of money gained by their scheme lined the rogues' pockets once more.

About that time Guzmán devised a plan to revenge himself on his Genoese relatives. Arriving in that city, he let it be known that he was Don Juan de Guzmán, a gentleman of Seville, recently come from Rome. Not recognizing the young beggar whom they had cuffed and insulted several years before, his relatives outdid themselves to honor their wealthy kinsman. On the pretext that a Castilian gentlewoman of his acquaintance was to be married, he borrowed jewels from Don Beltran to dress the bride, giving in security two trunks which the old man believed filled with silver plate. Pretending to be temporarily out of funds, he also secured a large loan from a cousin in return for a spurious gold chain. Then, having taken passage with a trusted sea captain, he and Sayavedra sailed for Spain. During the voyage Guzmán was greatly grieved when his friend became delirious with fever and jumped overboard.

Not wishing to tarry in Barcelona, Guzmán went to Saragossa. There he courted an heiress until the jealousy of her other admirers and his unwise dalliance with her kitchenmaid caused him to leave that city and go to Madrid. Eventually he married, only to learn too late that his wife's father was without a fortune. Before long Guzmán himself was declared a bankrupt and imprisoned. His wife died of shame. Disgusted with the world, he decided to study for the Church.

Shortly before he was to take orders he met a handsome woman who became his second wife. They returned to Madrid, where the wife attracted the attentions of so many wealthy men that for a time their affairs prospered, but in the end they were publicly disgraced and banished. From Madrid they went to Seville. Guzmán's mother they found still alive but stricken in years. There he lived by his wits in a household of quarrelsome women until his wife did him a great favor and ran away with an Italian sea captain. A short time later he and his mother parted in friendly fashion. Later, with the help of a gullible friar, Guzmán became steward to a gentlewoman whose husband was in the Indies. Old habits were too strong for him, and he began to rob his mistress. His thefts being discovered, he was sentenced to the galleys for life.

Because of his smooth tongue and pleasant ways, he was able to make himself a favorite with the officers, thereby arousing the jealousy and hate of his fellow prisoners. When several of them robbed him, the theft was discovered and the culprits were flogged. A short time later the captain's kinsman was robbed, and Guzmán, accused by another prisoner named Soto, was beaten until he was almost dead. Guzmán was soon to have his revenge. Discovering Soto's plot to seize the ship and escape to the African coast, he revealed the plan to the captain. Soto and the chief conspirators were executed. The grateful captain struck off Guzmán's chains and gave him full liberty aboard the galley while awaiting the pardon which had been petitioned of the king. Guzmán, repenting the rogue's life he had led, resolved to mend his ways in the future.

Although more like a collection of long short stories than an integrated novel, this book displays Faulkner's genius in pre-definite locale, seem characteristic of almost any section of rural America. Some of the incidents are strung out over too many pages, but the author's skillful style carries them along successfully. He withholds the climax, the final irony of each episode, until the tale is fully exploited. In Flem Snopes, Faulkner has created one of his major characters—a man who is stubborn, arrogant, and ruthless in his drive for property and power.

The Story:

In his later years Will Varner, owner of the Old Frenchman place and almost everything else in Frenchman's Bend, began to turn many of his affairs over to his thirty-year-old son Jody. One day, while Jody sat in the Varner store, he met Ab Snopes, a newcomer to town, and Ab arranged to rent one of the farms owned by the Varners. Jody then found out from Ratliff, a salesman, that Ab had been suspected of burning barns on other farms where he had been a tenant. Jody and his father concluded that Ab's unsavory reputation would do them no harm. Jody became afraid, however, that Ab might burn some of the Varner property; as a sort of bribe, he hired Ab's son, Flem, to clerk in the store.

From Ratliff came the explanation of why Ab was soured on the world. Ab's principal grievance grew out of a horse-trading deal he once made with Pat Stamper, an almost legendary trader. Ab drove a mule and an old horse to Jefferson and, before showing them to Stamper, he skillfully doctored up the old nag. Stamper swapped Ab a team of mules that looked fine, but when Ab tried to drive them out of Jefferson the mules collapsed. To get back his own mule Ab spent the money his wife had given him to buy a milk separator. Stamper also forced him to purchase a dark, fat horse that looked healthy but rather peculiar. On the way home Ab ran into a thunderstorm and the horse changed from dark to light and from fat to lean. It was Ab's old horse, which Stamper had painted and then fattened up with a bicycle pump.

Will Varner's daughter, Eula, was a plump, sensuous girl who matured early. The new schoolteacher, Labove, fell in love with her the first day she came to the schoolhouse. An ambitious young man, Labove rode back and forth between Frenchman's Bend and the University, where he studied law and played on the football team. One day he attempted to seduce Eula after school had been dismissed; he failed and later was horrified to discover that Eula did not even mention the attempt to Jody. Labove left Frenchman's Bend forever.

As she grew older Eula had many suitors, the principal one being Hoacke McCarron, who literally fought off the competition. When the Varners found out that Eula was pregnant, McCarron and two other suitors left for Texas. Flem Snopes then stepped in, married Eula, and went off on a long honeymoon.

The Snopes clan which had gathered in the wake of Ab and Flem began to have troubles within the family. The idiot boy, Isaac, was neglected and mistreated; when he fell in love with a cow, his behavior became a town scandal. Mink Snopes, another relative, was charged with murdering Jack Houston, who had impounded Mink's wandering cattle. Flem stayed away from town throughout this trouble. When Mink was brought to trial, Flem, who might have helped him, ignored the whole case. Mink was sent to jail for life.

Flem came back from his honeymoon accompanied by Buck Hipps, a Texan, and a string of wild, spotted horses. The Texan arranged to auction off these horses to farmers who had gathered from miles around. To start things off, the Texan gave one horse to Eck Snopes, provided that Eck would make the first bid on the next one. At this point Henry Armstid and his wife drove up. Henry, in spite of his wife's protests, bought a horse for five dollars. By dark all but three of the horses had been sold, and Henry was anxious to claim his purchase. He and his wife were almost killed in trying to rope their pony. Hipps wanted to return the Armstids' money. He gave the five dollars to Henry's wife, but Henry took the bill from her and gave it to Flem Snopes. Hipps told Mrs. Armstid that Flem would return it to her the next day.

When the other purchasers tried to rope their horses, the spotted devils ran through an open gate and escaped into the countryside. Henry Armstid broke his leg and almost died. Eck Snopes chased the horse that had been given him and ran it into a boarding-house. The horse escaped from the house and ran down the road. At a bridge it piled into a wagon driven by Vernon Tull and occupied by Tull's wife and family. The mules pulling the wagon became excited and Tull was jerked out of the wagon onto his face.

The Tulls sued Eck Snopes for the damages done to Vernon and to their wagon; the Armstids sued Flem for damages to Henry and for the recovery of their five dollars. The justice of the peace was forced to rule in favor of the defendants. Flem could not be established as the owner of the horses, and Eck was not the legal owner of a horse that had been given to him.

One day Henry Armstid told Ratliff that Flem was digging every night in the garden of the Old Frenchman place, which Flem had acquired from Will Varner. Ever since the Civil War there had been rumors that the builder of the house had buried money and jewels in the garden. Henry and Ratliff took a man named Bookwright into their confidence and, with the aid of another man who could use a divining rod, they slipped into the garden after Flem had quit digging. After locating the position of buried metal, they began digging, and each unearthed a bag of silver coins. They decided to pool their resources and buy the land in a hurry. Ratliff agreed to pay Flem an exorbitant price. At night they kept on shoveling, but they unearthed no more treasure. Ratliff finally realized that no bag could remain intact in the ground for thirty years. When he and Bookwright examined the silver coins, they found the money had been minted after the Civil War.

But Armstid, now totally out of his mind, refused to believe there was no treasure. He kept on digging, day and night. People from all over the county came to watch his frantic shoveling. Passing by on his way to Jefferson, Flem Snopes paused only a moment to watch Henry; then with a flip of the reins he drove his horses on.

HANDY ANDY

Type of work: Novel

Author: Samuel Lover (1797-1868)

Type of plot: Comic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Ireland

First published: 1842

Principal characters:

ANDY ROONEY, a young Irish boy

SQUIRE EDWARD EGAN, his employer

MURTOUGH MURPHY, an attorney

SQUIRE GUSTAVUS O'GRADY, a rival landlord

EDWARD O'CONNOR, a gentleman and poet

Critique:

Written as a series of anecdotes published in twelve monthly installments, Handy Andy is not a cohesive novel insofar as plot is concerned. It is, on the other hand, excellent in character portrayal and atmosphere. The quality likely to hold the modern reader is its droll wit. Rich in Irish folkways, peppered with clever Irish tales, enhanced by Irish songs, Handy Andy is more than a series of tales revolving around a political issue, a stupid lout of a boy, and a lovable hero. Accused of flattering his countrymen, Lover replied that as an Irishman he was compelled to present his land as he saw it.

The Story:

Andy Rooney was, from the day he was born, a mischievous troublemaker. When he was old enough to work, his mother took him to Squire Egan of Merryvale Hall, who hired him as a stableboy. His literal mind and naïve ways frequently caused his superiors much agitation.

One day Squire Egan sent Andy to the post-office to get a letter. Thinking the postage unduly high, Andy stole two other letters in order to get his money's worth. The squire's letter was from Murtough Murphy, an attorney, and it concerned a forthcoming election for a county seat held by Sir Timothy Trimmer, who was expected to die before long. Murphy warned Egan that although he could be certain of most of the votes in the election, Squire O'Grady of Neck-or-Nothing Hall was likely to support the Hon. Sackville Scatterbrain, another candidate. It happened that one of the purloined letters was addressed to Gustavus O'Grady. Peering through the envelope, Egan made out some unflattering words about himself. In anger he threw the letter into the fire. To cover up his error he burned the other letter also and then told Andy that he destroyed them to protect such a foolish gossoon from detection.

Andy could never get anything straight. When Squire Egan sent him on an errand to get a document from Murtough Murphy and Mrs. Egan sent him to the apothecary shop, Andy left Murphy's paper on the counter of the store and took up, instead, O'Grady's packet of medicine. The apothecary then unknowingly gave O'Grady the document from Murphy. On receiving O'Grady's medicine, Squire Egan was insulted and challenged Murphy to a duel. O'Grady, insulted at the contents of Murphy's legal document, challenged M'Garry, the apothecary. The matter was soon straightened out; Handy Andy fared the worst.

Edward O'Connor was a gallant cavalier. Well-educated and gifted as a poet, he was a favorite among the men of the community. He was in love with Fanny Dawson but had not declared himself as yet. A misunderstanding between Fanny's father and Edward had resulted in the young man's banishment from the Dawson house. After the quarrel Major Dawson maintained an intense dislike for the poet. Although she brooded over the absence of her lover, Fanny was forced to obey her father's wishes.

While walking one night, Andy, after stumbling over a man stretched out in the middle of the road, hailed a passing jaunting car. The driver, learning that the drunken man was his brother, stayed behind to care for him and asked Andy to drive his carriage. The passenger, Mr. Furlong, said he was on his way to visit the squire. Assuming that he meant Squire Egan, Andy took Furlong to Merryvale Hall. But Furlong had wanted to see O'Grady on election business. Egan, continuing to deceive the visitor, sent for Murphy, and the two men contrived to pump as much information from Furlong as they could.

When the truth was revealed, Furlong set out for Neck-or-Nothing Hall. There he met with more mischief. O'Grady was in a terrible mood, for he had discovered that the letter announcing Furlong's arrival had gone astray. The climax came when O'Grady's daughter Augusta happened into Furlong's room while he was dressing. A moment later O'Grady's knock at the door sent her hiding under the bed to avoid discovery. O'Grady caught her, however, and insisted that Furlong marry her.

The Hon. Sackville Scatterbrain arrived in time for the nomination speeches, a lively affair with a great deal of shouting and much merriment. On election day Egan supporters succeeded in irritating O'Grady, who had no sense of humor and plenty of temper. Thinking the crowd too boisterous, O'Grady aroused the people by sending for the militia. When he ordered the militia to fire into the angry mob, Edward O'Connor rode into the crowd to disperse it and prevent the militia from firing. Impressed by his bravery, the militia captain refused to fire. O'Grady then challenged O'Connor to a duel. O'Connor wounded O'Grady. When the Hon. Sackville Scatterbrain won the election, Squire Egan began a suit to dispute its result.

Larry Hogan, one of O'Grady's employees, had learned about the purloining of O'Grady's letter, which Squire Egan had burned, and he hoped to put his knowledge to use by intimidating the squire. One night Andy happened to overhear Larry, who was very drunk, talking about his scheme. Confused, Andy went to Father Phil, his confessor, for advice. It so happened that the priest was attending to the nuptials of Matty Dwyer and James Casey. At the wedding feast Casey failed to appear. Fearing that his daughter would be disgraced, Jack Dwyer asked if any of the guests present would marry Matty. Andy boldly offered himself and the marriage was performed. After the couple had been left alone in their new cottage James Casey arrived, accompanied by a hedge-priest who performed a second ceremony. Andy, protesting, was dragged outside and tied to a tree.

O'Grady died from the ill effects of the wound O'Connor had given him. Because the dead man had been deep in debt and unpopular in the community, his body was in danger of being confiscated. To prevent such an action, the family made two coffins; one, the true coffin, was to be buried secretly at night. O'Connor, stumbling upon the scene of the clandestine burial, was struck with remorse at his own deed, but young Gustavus O'Grady forgave his father's slayer, who in return pledged himself to lifelong friendship with Gustavus.

When a beggar warned Mrs. Rooney that someone was plotting to carry off her niece Oonah, Andy disguised himself as the young girl. Kidnaped, he was taken to Shan More's cave, where Andy's wild entreaties so aroused the pity of Shan More's sister Bridget that she took the distressed captive to bed with her. Discovering her error in the morning, Bridget lamented her lost honor, which Andy righted by marrying her. Too late Andy discovered that he really loved Oonah and that he had married a woman of bad reputation.

It was learned that Lord Scatterbrain, disguised as a servant named Rooney, had married Andy's mother, only to desert her before Andy's birth. After the death of the old nobleman—the Hon. Sackville Scatterbrain, his nephew, did not dispute the succession—Andy became his heir, with a seat in the House of Lords. Off to London he went to learn fine manners and to enjoy his new estate. Shan More and Bridget followed to demand a settlement for the deserted wife. To escape the vulgar and persistent pair, Andy gladly gave Bridget some money.

Major Dawson met with an accident which resulted in his death. With the major gone, all obstacles between Fanny Dawson and Edward O'Connor were removed, and O'Connor was finally able to enter the Dawson house and to marry his Fanny.

Shan More made an attempt upon Andy's life. When the attempt failed Andy went to Shan's den, where he found a wounded man, an escaped convict, who proved to be Bridget's true husband. Rid of his wife, Andy was free to marry Oonah.

HANGMAN'S HOUSE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Donn Byrne (Brian Oswald Donn-Byrne, 1889-1928)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Ireland

First published: 1925

Principal characters:

JAMES O'BRIEN, Lord Glenmalure, Jimmy the Hangman
CONNAUGHT, his daughter
DERMOT McDERMOT, a neighbor
THE CITIZEN, Dinny Hogan the Irreconcilable's son
JOHN D'ARCY, Dermot's cousin, Connaught's husband

Critique:

In Hangman's House, Donn Byrne intended to write an Irish novel for Irishmen, people for whom their own country was a passion. An intense love for Irish landscape, horse-racing, coursing, Gaelic balladry, hunting, and the writer's freedom-loving countrymen is evident throughout the book. When the novel appeared, critics may have preferred his Messer Marco Polo or The Wind Blowneth, but revised judgment is likely to put Hangman's House above the latter. The book was written in Dublin in 1922 and 1923, while the country was still being harried by the armed resistance of Republican irreconcilables. The state of Ireland at that time is presented in Byrne's characterization of the Citizen, a splendid man who had direct control over those who wanted to fight for freedom. The novel has been dramatized for the stage and for motion pictures.

The Story:

Dermot McDermot lived in the most pleasant homestead in the County of Dublin. He was a serious, slight man of twenty-five, taking after his Quaker mother more than his Irish soldier father except in his intense love of Ireland and everything Irish.

Dermot's nearest neighbors were James O'Brien, Lord Glenmalure, and his daughter Connaught. They lived in a rather forbidding-looking house that the country people insisted on calling Jimmy the Hangman's House. James O'Brien had been a violent rebel in his youth, but he had found it to his advantage to make his peace with the English. Becoming Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, he was responsible for the hanging of many Fenians.

When Glenmalure was stricken on the bench, he was forced to retire. His condition becoming worse, he called in doctors from Dublin and then England. One told him that he would live a month, certainly no more than five weeks. Then he secretly sent off a letter to John D'Arcy, Dermot's cousin, son of an old friend called Tricky Mick. Dermot thought D'Arcy a twister; Connaught's father said he had merely made a youngster's mistake. Glenmalure knew John D'Arcy was devious but ambitious, and that he might make his way in politics with Connaught's money and Hangman Jimmy's backing. In the weeks remaining to him, Glenmalure made contacts for D'Arcy and then married him to Connaught. Glenmalure knew Dermot wanted to marry Connaught but would not leave his homestead; he thought Connaught, strong-willed as she was, could guide D'Arcy to a place in the world where she might even get a title.

Glenmalure had been a rebel of the old days, but there were still plenty of young men ready for a war for freedom if the word were given. Those who directed the movement decided there must be no war. They sent back to Ireland the Citizen, a commander of cavalry in the French army, but also the son of old Dinny Hogan the Irreconcilable, who had fled from Ireland and gone to live in France after the last uprising. The Citizen was to spend a year in Ireland, to make sure the young men would keep in line.

He had another reason for going to Ireland. John D'Arcy had married and then deserted his sister Maeve. Her shame caused her death and her son's, and their deaths brought on Dinny Hogan's. Dinny's son was out for revenge.

Glenmalure died the night of Connaught's wedding. She and D'Arcy returned from their honeymoon immediately.

Dermot saw them at the Tara Hunt, one of the best in the country. The Citizen also turned up at the hunt and approached D'Arcy to ask if he had been in Paris in '95. D'Arcy, after swearing that he had never been in Paris, went to the police to expose the Citizen. Connaught could not understand why D'Arcy had lied about being in Paris; she was furious when she heard that he had informed on a hunted man.

Dermot knew D'Arcy feared the Citizen but could not understand why. He also heard that things were not going well at Glenmalure, that Connaught kept a woman relative with her constantly, while D'Arcy spent his time gambling with people who would never have dared enter the house during Glenmalure's lifetime. D'Arcy's backers in politics had reneged after Glenmalure died, and D'Arcy was at loose ends.

On St. Stephen's Day the first steeplechase of the year was held at the Han-nastown races. Connaught's Bard of Armagh was entered. Dermot heard that long odds were being placed on him, though the horse should have been considered the best in the field. One of the bookmakers told him that D'Arcy had placed a large bet against the Bard, but that there were many small bets on him that would spell disaster to the poor people if the Bard did not run. On the day of the race Connaught's jockey did not show up. Dermot rode the Bard and won. He and Connaught found D'Arcy sobbing afterward because he had lost heavily. Then Dermot knew his cousin was a weakling. That night D'Arcy killed the Bard.

Connaught left home and even the gamblers refused to play with a man who had killed a horse. Connaught, meanwhile, was miserable in England. Dermot looked for D'Arcy to straighten him out, to offer him money to go away if that seemed best. D'Arcy told him that he had married Maeve. Thinking D'Arcy had been married to Maeve when he married Connaught, Dermot thrashed him and would probably have killed him if an innkeeper had not interfered. Dermot gave D'Arcy money and told him to leave the country.

Connaught came home a short time later to a house of bitterness and gloom. After she and Dermot finally admitted they loved each other, Dermot sought out the Citizen to see if they might not work out some way to keep the shame of D'Arcy's conduct from staining Connaught and yet dissolve that marriage so that he and Connaught could be married. The Citizen told Dermot that Maeve had actually died before D'Arcy married Connaught, though D'Arcy could not have known it at that time. Dermot's hands were tied.

D'Arcy, hearing that Maeve was dead, came back to Glenmalure, and Connaught sought refuge with Dermot and his mother. D'Arcy, finding her there, accused Connaught and Dermot of being lovers. When they admitted their feelings, he threatened to hale them into court, but Dermot's mother prevented him. Connaught went again to England.

Knowing that Connaught would do nothing to him, D'Arcy began to sell off all the possessions in the house. Dermot made arrangements in Dublin to be informed whenever those things came on the market and he bought up all of them. One night Dermot decided to pick some of Connaught's own roses and send them to her. As he went toward the house Glenmalure looked empty and forbidding. At the gate he met the Citizen, bent on killing D'Arcy. Dermot, not wishing the Citizen to be soiled with the murder of a twister like D'Arcy, tried to persuade him to go away. But the Citizen was determined. Dermot was afraid to let him go in alone.

Inside they found D'Arcy dressed for travel. The house had been stripped and there was a smell of oil in it. Instead of killing D'Arcy outright, the Citizen allowed himself to be persuaded to a duel with pistols. D'Arcy shot before the signal had been given and wounded the Citizen. Then he smashed a lamp on the floor and dashed upstairs. The lamp started a sheet of fire that swept through the house as Dermot and the Citizen fought their way outside. D'Arcy caught his foot while jumping from a window and was dead when he hit the ground.

Dermot's mother went to Connaught for a while. Dermot had the walls of Glenmalure torn down and a neat cottage built in its place. The Citizen, recovered from his wound, went back to his regiment. Then Connaught came home.

 JAMES HARTHOUSE, a political aspirant

Critique:

This novel was Dickens' first story of outright social protest. Earlier works had contained sections of social criticism, but this was the first motivated entirely by the writer's feelings about contemporary British culture. The novel, appropriately dedicated to Thomas Carlyle, another critic of nineteenth-century British society, was based upon personal observations of life in Manchester, one of England's great manufacturing towns and the original for Dickens' Coketown. The story is loaded with the bitter sincerity of Dickens' dislike for the industrial conditions he found in his homeland. Unfortunately for the value of the novel as a social document, Dickens overdrew his portraits of the industrialists responsible for conditions he abhorred; his industrialists became sheer grotesques and monsters.

The Story:

Thomas Gradgrind, proprietor of an experimental private school in Coketown, insisted that the children under him learn facts and only facts. He felt that the world had no place for fancy or imagination. His own five children were models of a factual education. Never having been permitted to learn anything of the humanities, they were ignorant of literature and any conception of human beings as individuals. Even fairy tales and nursery rhymes had been excluded from their education.

One day, as he walked from the school to his home, Gradgrind was immensely displeased and hurt to find his two oldest children, Louisa and Tom, trying to peek through the canvas walls of a circus tent. Nor did it ease his mind to discover that the two youngsters were not at all sorry for acting against the principles under which they had been reared and educated. Later Gradgrind and his industrialist friend, Mr. Josiah Bounderby, discussed possible means by which the children might have been misled from the study of facts. They concluded that another pupil, Sissy Jupe, whose father was a clown in the circus, had influenced the young Gradgrinds.

Having decided to remove Sissy Jupe from the school, they set out immediately to tell the girl's father. When they arrived at the inn where the Jupes were staying, they found that the clown-father had deserted his daughter. Gradgrind, moved by sentiment, decided to keep the girl in his home and let her be educated at his school, all against the advice of Bounderby, who thought Sissy Jupe would be only a bad influence on the Gradgrind children.

Years passed, and Louisa and young Tom grew up. Gradgrind knew that Bounderby had long wished to marry Louisa. She, educated away from sentiment, agreed to marry Bounderby, who was thirty years her elder. Tom, an employee in Bounderby's bank, was very glad to have his sister marry Bounderby; he wanted a friend to help him if he got into trouble there. In fact, he advised his sister to marry Bounderby for that reason, and she, loving her brother, agreed to help him by marrying the wealthy banker.

Bounderby himself was very happy to have Louisa as his wife. After his marriage he placed his elderly housekeeper in rooms at the bank. Mrs. Sparsit, disliking

Louisa, was determined to keep an eye on her for her employer's sake. After the marriage all seemed peaceful at the bank, at the Gradgrind home, and at the Bounderby residence.

In the meantime Gradgrind had been elected to Parliament from his district. He sent out from London an aspiring young politician, James Harthouse, who was to gather facts about the industrial city of Coketown, facts which were to be used in a survey of economic and social life in Britain. In order to facilitate the young man's labors, Gradgrind had given him a letter of introduction to Bounderby, who immediately told Harthouse the story of his career from street ragamuffin to industrialist and banker. Harthouse thought Bounderby a fool, but he was greatly interested in pretty Louisa.

Through his friendship with Bounderby, Harthouse met Tom Gradgrind, who lived with the Bounderbys. Harthouse took advantage of Tom's love for drink to learn more about Louisa. Hearing that she had been subjected to a dehumanizing education, and feeling that she would be easy prey for seduction because of her loveless marriage to the pompous Bounderby, Harthouse decided to test Louisa's virtue.

Before long Harthouse gained favor in her eyes. Neither realized, however, that Mrs. Sparsit, jealous and resenting her removal from the comfortable Bounderby house, spied on them constantly.

Everyone was amazed to learn one day that the Bounderby bank had been robbed. Chief suspect was Stephen Blackpool, an employee whom Bounderby had mistreated. Blackpool, who had been seen loitering in front of the bank, had disappeared on the night of the robbery. Suspicion also fell on a Mrs. Pegler, an old woman known to have been in Blackpool's company.

A search for Blackpool and Mrs. Pegler proved fruitless. Bounderby seemed content to wait; he said that the culprits would turn up sooner or later.

The affair between Louisa and Hart-house reached a climax when Louisa agreed to elope with the young man. Her better judgment, however, caused her to return to her father instead of running away with her lover. Gradgrind, horrified to see what his education had done to Louisa's character, tried to make amends for her. The situation was complicated by Mrs. Sparsit. She had learned of the proposed elopement and had told Bounderby. He angrily insisted that Louisa return to his home. Gradgrind, realizing that his daughter had never loved Bounderby, insisted that she be allowed to make her own choice. Harthouse, giving up all hope of winning Louisa, disappeared.

Mrs. Sparsit returned to act as Bounderby's housekeeper during Louisa's absence and tried to reinstate herself in Bounderby's confidence by tracing down Mrs. Pegler. To her chagrin, Mrs. Pegler turned out to be Bounderby's mother. Bounderby was furious, for his mother disproved his boasts about being a self-made man. Meanwhile Louisa and Sissy Jupe accidentally found Blackpool, who had fallen into a mine shaft while returning to Coketown to prove his innocence of the robbery. After his rescue he told that Tom Gradgrind was the real culprit. When the young man disappeared, his sister and father, with the help of Sissy Jupe, found him and placed him, disguised, in a circus until arrangements could be made for spiriting him out of the country.

Before he could escape, however, Bounderby's agents found Tom and arrested him. With the aid of the circus roustabouts he was rescued and put on a steamer which carried him away from the police and Bounderby's vengeance.

Mrs. Sparsit, who had caused Bounderby all kinds of embarrassment by producing Mrs. Pegler, was discharged from his patronage, much to her chagrin. Bounderby himself died unhappily in a fit a few years later. The Gradgrinds, all of them victims of an education of facts, continued to live unhappily, unable to see the human side of life.

Harp of a Thousand Strings is a novel linking the personalities and events of the French Revolution to the development of the American West. Behind this continue to move like a slow groundswell from country to country among people who have been affected by history's erosions and accretions. History itself is the thousand-stringed harp of the title, an instrument capable of endless vibrations and echoes. In order to present his theme of the reverberations of history, the writer made his novel contrapuntal in design. The American frontier, the Barbary wars, and the French Revolution are introduced briefly for thematic effect, later to be alternated and recombined. The pattern is one of triads. The three settings, America, Tripoli, and France; the three Americans, each corresponding to one of the drives in Tallien's career; the three choices Tallien must make and their consequences—all are essential to the craftsmanship and design of this unusual and rewarding historical novel.

The Story:

Old Melancthon Crawford had been one of the founders of a prairie town in the Osage country. In his last years his eccentricities became so marked that relatives had him sent back to his birthplace, a Pennsylvania village he had always hated, where they could keep an eye on him and the disposal of his property. After his departure on the eastbound stage Commodore Robinette and Apeyahola, a Creek Indian whom the settlers called Jory, climbed to the prairie swell where Crawford's trading post had stood. Talking about the past, they thought back to a decisive night the three had in common, a night when Tripoli was being bombarded by American naval guns during the war with Barbary pirates.

Under cover of the bombardment the three Americans, prisoners escaped from the pasha's dungeons, had taken refuge in a warehouse belonging to Thurlow and Sons, Boston merchants. Young Crawford was all for carrying away some loot he found in a storeroom, but Apeyahola and Robinette, the wounded sailor, were against the idea. During the argument Monsieur Tallien entered the warehouse. One-time Citizen President of the French National Convention, now an obscure consular official under Napoleon, he was there to keep an appointment with a Paris associate of Thurlow and Sons. To pass the time while waiting, he told the tale of his rise and eventual ruin because of his love for the notorious Thérèse de Fontenay. Crawford, Robinette, and the Indian made a strange audience. Tallien told his story, however, because he saw each young American marked by one phase of his own career: vengeance, ambition, love.

Jean-Lambert Tallien, protégé of the old Marquis de Bercy, was intended for a career in law. During a visit to the de Bercy estate he watched Anne-Joseph Théroigne being carried forcibly away because she had attracted the interest of René, the young marquis, soon to marry the lovely Countess Thérèse de Fontenay. While Tallien stood watching the disappearing cart that carried Anne-Joseph, René rode up with the countess and haughtily ordered the student to open a gate. At Tallien's refusal the young nobleman raised his whip. Tallien struck the marquis' horse. The animal threw his rider and dragged him, unconscious and bleeding, by one stirrup.

Tallien hid in the woods while angry villagers hunted him with guns and pitchforks. Father Jarnatt, the parish priest, saved the fugitive and sent him off to Paris to seek his fortune in journalism. These things happened in the year the Bastille fell.

In Paris, Tallien again met Anne-Joseph Théroigne, by that time a rough-tongued, rabble-rousing virago, the friend of Robespierre and members of the Jacobin Club. It was she who helped Tallien to establish L'Ami des Citoyens, the revolutionary newspaper with which he placarded Paris. Because of her he led the assault on the Tuileries during the August riots. Later he became a deputy to the National Convention and a commissioner to the provinces. Anne-Joseph helped his rise in public favor because she expected to find him useful. Still loving René de Bercy, she had secretly aided his escape to England. Through Tallien she hoped eventually to locate Thérèse de Fontenay, whom she hated.

A man and a woman muffled in native costume entered the warehouse. The man was Monsieur de Chimay, who had come ashore from a French ship to arrange some trade business with Tallien. The woman was not introduced. Since they could not leave the warehouse before the bombardment ended, Tallien continued his story.

One day he heard his name called from a cartload of prisoners. In the wagon was Thérèse de Fontenay, whom he had never forgotten. Hoping to protect her from Anne-Joseph's fury, he denounced the virago for her help to de Bercy and thrust her into an angry mob that stripped and beat her. The woman, never recovering from that brutal treatment, lived mad for many years.

Thérèse was imprisoned in the Carmes. Through spies Tallien tried to take measures for her safety. At last, to save her life, he overthrew Robespierre and ended the Reign of Terror. Telling his story, he made it all sound simple; the others had to guess at the bribes, the promised reprisals, all the scheming of those three anxious days while he held prisoners the influential citizens of Paris and executed the coup d'état of Thermidor. Although he knew that Thérèse was involved in a plot for an émigré invasion, he married her later that year.

But choices made for her sake led to other choices that he neither expected nor wanted. Jealous of Captain Belval, an officer attentive to Thérèse while she was in prison, he arranged to have the captain betrayed to the rebels of the Vendée. When the émigrés finally landed at Quiberon, all were captured. At the same time the peasant who had betrayed Belval was taken prisoner. In his effort to save the peasant's life Tallien quarreled with General Hoche over the disposition of the other prisoners, and in the end he was forced to declare them enemies of the state and order their execution. Among those who perished was René de Bercy, who chose death with honor rather than accept Tallien's offer of escape to England.

When Tallien returned to Paris and told Thérèse, haltingly, what had happened, she said only that she knew at last what a life was worth. Months later Monsieur de Chimay arrived from London with some of de Bercy's keepsakes. De Chimay was in trade, an associate of the powerful Thurlow firm and a friend of Ouvrard, the influential banker who had become Thérèse's lover. Thérèse saw in the two men a power she could use to undermine that of her husband.

The shelling had ended; Tallien became silent. When he and de Chimay withdrew to transact their business, the woman gave the three Americans a case containing two pistols and a knife, each decorated with the crest of a hand holding a flower. For a moment she drew aside her veil and they saw the face of Thérèse de Fontenay. The Americans went out toward the harbor, each marked by a symbol of Tallien's defeat, but carrying with them also a memory of Thérèse's beauty.

Years later Robinette and Apeyahola, ragged and gaunt, were traveling overland from the Mississippi. Wanted by the authorities, the commodore because of an affair of gallantry in Spanish territory and for taking part in the Gutiérrez insurrection, Apeyahola for a murder in Georgia, they found carved on a tree the design of a hand holding a flower. That crest marked their trail to Crawford's trading post in the Indian country. There they stayed, philanderer, murderer, and thief. When the time came for them to name the village growing up around the old trading post, each remembered the woman they had seen briefly by candlelight in a dingy warehouse. So, out of the turmoil and blood of the French Revolution, Thérèse de Fontenay gave her name to a new town on the American prairie.

HAVELOK THE DANE

Type of work: Poem

Author: Unknown

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: Tenth century

Locale: England and Denmark

First transcribed: c. 1350

Principal characters:

HAVELOK, a prince

GODARD, his guardian

GOLDEBORU, a princess

GODRICH, her guardian

GRIM, a fisherman

Critique:

Medieval romances in general follow a pattern, and Havelok is no exception. The hero is noble, brave, and pure; the heroine is noble, beautiful, and pure. There is a convenient supernatural element which helps along the plot. Virtue is rewarded and villainy is punished. Havelok, in spite of its adherence to the formula, is one of the more interesting of the romances to read, for it is reasonably concise and coherent. Its spirit of adventure hardly ever flags, and the plot is complicated enough to produce some feeling of suspense.

The Story:

Athelwold was a good king. No one dared offer him a bribe, and throughout all England people were at peace. He was a particular guardian to widows, children, and innocent maidens. A messenger might go peacefully from town to town with a hundred pounds of gold in a sack. Athelwold's only heir was a young daughter, still a baby.

When Athelwold knew that his death was upon him, he prayed for guidance and then summoned his earls and barons to his side. There was loud lamenting at the approaching end of their honored king. But Athelwold's chief concern was for his daughter's care. It was decided that Godrich, Earl of Cornwall, would be the most trustworthy to bring up the princess.

Godrich swore a great oath to safeguard the infant Goldeboru and to hold her lands in trust until she could reign.

But Godrich watched the growing girl with envious eyes. She was fair to look upon, and Godrich could not bear to think of the day when she would be his sovereign. Acting then the part of a traitor, he took her secretly from Winchester to Dover and placed her in a remote castle. To guard the entrance he set his most trusted thanes with orders to let no one in to see the princess.

In Denmark, King Birkabeyn lay near death. He had reigned long and wisely, but he was leaving his son Havelok and his two little daughters without protection. He thought of his faithful friend, Godard, a rich man who was the most respected noble in the kingdom. Godard swore a great oath to guard the children well and to see that Havelok came into his inheritance when he became a man. After being shriven, Birkabeyn died content.

Godard was also a false-hearted traitor. On the seashore he cruelly slit the throats of the two tiny girls and then seized Havelok. The boy, terrified at what he had been forced to witness, begged for mercy. Instead of killing Havelok straightway, Godard called for Grim, a fisherman, and commanded him to bind the prince and cast him into the sea with an anchor around his neck. Anxious to please his lord, Grim seized the boy and bound him tightly. Then he took him home to wait for night.

As Havelok dozed on the rude bed in the fisherman's hut, a great light shone from his mouth. Grim's wife was frightened and called her husband. Grim, awed, freed Havelok from his bonds. Bundling his wife, his five children, and Havelok aboard his fishing boat, he set sail for England. The group went up the Humber to land in a likely cove. Since then the place has been called Grimsby.

For twelve years Havelok grew rapidly. He was an active boy and a prodigious eater. Luckily, Grim was a good fisherman, and he could trade his catches at the market in Lincoln. Corn and meat could be bought there, and ropes for the nets. Havelok, who helped Grim in all his labors was especially good at peddling fish.

A great famine came upon the north of England. The crops withered and the fish fled English shores. Day after day Grim's family became poorer. Havelok, touched by the suffering of his foster family, resolved to seek his fortune in Lincoln. Although he could ill spare it, Grim cut a cloak from new sailcloth for Havelok and wished him well. The prince set out for town with his new cloak, but he had neither shoes nor hose.

In the town Havelok starved for three days. No one would hire him and he could find no food. At length he heard a cry for porters. Looking quickly around, he saw the earl's cook with a catch of fish to carry. In his eagerness Havelok knocked down eight or nine other porters to get to the cook first. Strong as a bull, the youth carried the fish to the castle. The next day the cook cried again for a porter, and this time Havelok carried a huge load of meat.

In the castleyard the cook greatly admired the strong fellow. He gave Havelok bread and meat, as much as he could hold, and engaged him as a steady helper. Eating regularly and working hard, Havelok became widely known for his strength. On a certain feast day the retainers held a stone-putting contest. A group of men brought in a stone so huge one man could barely lift it. Havelok easily heaved it many yards.

Godrich, hearing of Havelok's fame, decided to use the youth in his scheme to gain control of the kingdom. Thinking him only a churl, Godrich had Goldeboru brought from Dover and ordered Havelok to marry her. Both young people objected, but Godrich had his way.

Havelok took his sorrowing bride back to Grim's cottage. That night the groom slept soundly but the bride stayed wakeful from shame at being mated to a churl. All at once a light issued from Havelok's mouth and a voice told Goldeboru of her husband's birth and destiny. Awaking Havelok, she advised him to go at once to Denmark to claim his throne.

In the morning Havelok persuaded the three Grim brothers to go with him on the trip to Denmark. Arriving in that land, the impoverished group met Ubbe, a noble who bought a ring from Havelok. Ubbe, greatly taken with Havelok and his beautiful bride, offered them a cottage for the night. The couple accepted gratefully, and soon were asleep after their long voyage.

In the night a band of robbers tried to break in after overpowering the guard set by Ubbe. When Havelok awoke, he set about him valiantly. He seized the door bar and slew robbers right and left. This feat won him more admiration. Ubbe assigned the young couple to a rich bower for the rest of the night. When Ubbe stole in for a look at his guests, he was astonished to see a light streaming from Havelok's mouth and a cross marked on his shoulder. By these signs he knew that Havelok was Birkabeyn's son and heir to the Danish throne.

Calling all the barons of Denmark together, Ubbe dubbed Havelok a knight and proclaimed him king. The assembled nobles passed judgment on Godard, the traitor, who was brought before Havelok, flayed, and hanged on a gallows with a great nail through his feet.

Now master of Denmark, Havelok sailed with a strong force to England to seize that kingdom from Godrich. The battle was joined near Lincoln. Although Godrich fought valiantly and wounded Ubbe, he was finally captured by the wrathful Danes. The false Earl of Cornwall, bound hand and foot, was brought before Havelok for judgment. Godrich was put upon an ass and taken into Lincoln, where his crime was proclaimed.

Then he was taken to a nearby green and burned to death.

Havelok married one of Grim's daughters to the cook who had befriended him and made the man Earl of Cornwall. Grim's other daughter was married to the Earl of Chester. As for Havelok and Goldeboru, they lived together long and ruled wisely. Their union was blessed with fifteen children.

A HAZARD OF NEW FORTUNES

Type of work: Novel

Author: William Dean Howells (1837-1920)

Type of plot: Novel of manners

Time of plot: The 1880's

Locale: New York City

First published: 1890

Principal characters:

BASIL MARCH, editor of a literary magazine

MR. FULKERSON, sponsor for the magazine

CONRAD DRYFOOS, publisher of the magazine

MR. DRYFOOS, Conrad's father, a newly rich millionaire

HENRY LINDAU, a socialist

Critique:

Although the structure of this novel is unwieldy and complex, many lovers of Howells' fiction consider it their favorite, perhaps because of the author's deft characterization of a number of varied personalities, more than one usually finds in a Howells novel. Howells, like Basil March in the novel, moved to New York City after a residence of many years in New England, and this novel is the result of that move and the new experiences it brought to Howells, both as a person and as a novelist. In A Hazard of New Fortunes, perhaps more than anywhere else in Howells' fiction, the author's own dissatisfaction with America and his interest in social improvement are to be found. In the preface to a later edition of the book, Howells expressed the belief that he had written it when he was at the apex of his powers as a novelist.

The Story:

In his youth Basil March had wished for a literary career. Family responsibilities turned him, however, to the insurance business, a field in which he proved to himself and his employers that he was but mediocre. After eighteen years with his firm, his employers decided to replace him and put him into a somewhat meaningless position. Rather than be so embarrassed, March resigned. Fortunately for him and his family's future, Mr. Fulkerson, a promoter of syndicated newspaper material, who had met the Marches years before, proposed that March take over the editorship of a new literary magazine that he was promoting. March at first demurred at Fulkerson's proposal, but the promoter, certain that March had the necessary taste and tact to be successful, finally persuaded him to take the position.

Mrs. March and their children had always lived in Boston, and so when the prospect of moving to New York City appeared, even though it meant a career for the husband and father, they needed considerable persuasion. At last Mrs.

March was convinced that the removal to the larger city was imperative. She and her husband went to New York to find a flat in which they could make themselves comfortable. After many days of searching, Mrs. March returned to Boston, leaving her husband to make a decision about the editorship. He did so a short time later.

March's problems in connection with a staff did not prove as difficult as he had imagined. Fulkerson, the promoter, had engaged an artist, Angus Beaton, to serve as art director, procured a cover sketch for the first issue, and made all the financial arrangements with the magazine's backer, Mr. Dryfoos, who had recently made a fortune for himself through the control of natural gas holdings. Mr. Dryfoos, who was trying to win his son away from a career as a minister, had undertaken to finance the magazine in order to give his son Conrad a chance to enter business as the ostensible publisher of the periodical. Foreign articles and reviews were to be handled by an old German socialist, Henry Lindau, who had been March's tutor and whom the younger man had met accidentally in New York.

Despite March's fear and lack of confidence, the new magazine, Every Other Week, was a success from the very first issue; both the illustrations and the material caught the public fancy. On the periphery of the activities concerning the magazine, however, there were many complications. The Dryfoos family, who had been simple farm folk, wanted to be taken into society; at least the two daughters wanted to enter society. In addition, Christine, the older daughter, fell in love with the art editor, who was not in love with her. Fulkerson, the promoter, had also fallen in love. He was busy paying court to a southern girl who boarded at the same house he did, and the girl's father, a Virginia colonel, was after Fulkerson to have the magazine print at least a portion of his great work extolling the merits of slavery.

Because the magazine had been a success, Fulkerson suggested that for publicity purposes they should give a dinner party for members of the staff and the press. Mr. Dryfoos, who was asked to pay the bill for the proposed affair, vetoed the idea, but he agreed to have a small dinner party at his home for several of the men connected with the magazine. Among the guests was Henry Lindau, who had struck the millionaire's fancy because he had lost a hand fighting in the Civil War. Dryfoos did not realize that Mr. Lindau, who was doing the foreign language work for the magazine, was a socialist. At the dinner party the personalities and the principles of the men clashed openly. The next day the millionaire told Basil March bluntly that the old man was to be fired. March wished to stick by the old German socialist, but Mr. Lindau forced the issue by refusing to do any more work for the capitalistic owner of the magazine.

Another crisis occurred a short time later when Mr. Dryfoos and his son, who hated being a businessman rather than a minister, had an open clash of wills. The situation became so acute that the father, calling one day when his son was alone in the office, struck the young man in the face. Outside the office, the father also had trouble with his daughter, Christine, for he had forbidden his house to the art editor of the magazine, with whom she was in love.

At that time there was a streetcar strike in New York City. Young Conrad Dryfoos was very much in sympathy with the strikers, many of whom he knew as a result of his church work among the poor and sick of the city. At the instigation of a young woman whom he loved, he went out upon the streets to try to bring peace among the rioting strikers and the police. He saw Mr. Lindau, the aged, one-armed socialist, being beaten by a policeman; when he ran to interfere, he was struck by a stray bullet and was killed.

Mr. Dryfoos was heartbroken at the loss of his son, particularly because he felt that he had mistreated the young man. When he learned that his son had died trying to save Mr. Lindau from the policeman's club, he decided to accept the old man as a friend and to take care of him for the rest of his life. The decision came too late, however, for the old man died as a result of the beating he had received. In a last effort to show his change of heart, Mr. Dryfoos had Mr. Lindau's funeral conducted in his own home.

Still wishing to try to make his family happy, Mr. Dryfoos then swallowed his pride and went to see Angus Beaton, the artist. Confessing that he was sorry to have caused the young people unhappiness, he invited Beaton to resume his calls on Christine. The young man eventually pocketed his pride and called, but in spite of her love for him Christine rejected his suit forcibly and scratched his face.

A few days later, Mr. Dryfoos resolved to take his wife and daughters to Europe. Before he left, he went to the offices of the magazine, where everyone had been wondering what the fate of the publication would be and whether Conrad Dryfoos' death had destroyed his father's interest in the periodical. Mr. Dryfoos magnanimously consented to sell the periodical to Fulkerson and March at a low figure and with very low interest on the money they needed in order to purchase it. Both March and Fulkerson were extremely happy about the turn of events. March saw his future secure at last, and he also saw that he would have a free hand in shaping the editorial policy. Fulkerson was happy because he too foresaw a prosperous future. As the result of his expectations, he was able to marry and settle down.

Some months afterward they learned that the Dryfoos family had been taken up promptly by at least a portion of Parisian society. Christine Dryfoos had even become engaged to a penniless but proud French nobleman.

HEADLONG HALL

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Love Peacock (1785-1866)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Wales

First published: 1816

Principal characters:

SQUIRE HEADLONG, the host

MR. FOSTER, the optimist

MR. ESCOT, the pessimist

MR. JENKISON, champion of the status quo

Critique:

Headlong Hall is a novel of talk, a satire on the pseudo-philosophers of the nineteenth century. There is virtually no plot and no character development. In fact, the characters seem to be merely abstract personages uttering pat phrases assigned to them by the author. But beneath the surface there is always keen awareness of the ridiculous in human behavior, dramatically presented by a writer who was intellectually wise enough to be tolerant of society's weaknesses.

The Story:

Squire Harry Headlong differed from the usual Welsh squire in that he, by some means or other, had become interested in books, in addition to the common interests of hunting, racing, and drinking. He had journeyed to Oxford and then to London in order to find the philosophers and men of refined tastes introduced to him in the world of literature. Having rounded up a group of intellectuals, he invited them to Headlong Hall for the Christmas holidays.

Three of the men formed the nucleus of his house party. The first was Mr. Foster, an optimist. To him everything was working toward a state of perfection, and each advancement in technology, in government, or in sociology was all for the good. He believed that man would ultimately achieve perfection as a result of his progress. Mr. Escot, on the other hand, saw nothing but deterioration in the world. The advances which Mr. Foster saw as improvement, Escot saw as evidences of corruption and evil which would soon reduce the whole human race to wretchedness and slavery. The third man of the trio was Mr. Jenkison, who took a position exactly in the middle. He believed that the amount of improvement and deterioration balanced each other perfectly and that good and evil would remain forever in status quo.

These philosophers, with a large company of other dilettantes, descended upon Headlong Hall. Among the lesser guests was a landscape gardener who made it his sole duty to persuade the squire to have his estate changed from a wild tangle of trees and shrubs into a shaved and polished bed of green grass. Mr. Foster thought the grounds could be improved; Mr. Escot thought any change would be for the worse, and Mr. Jenkison thought the scenery perfect as it was.

There were ladies present, both young and old, but they did not join in the philosophical discussions. Many of the talks occurred after the ladies had left the dinner table and as the wine was being liberally poured, for Squire Headlong was aware that the mellowness produced by good burgundy was an incentive to conversation. The discussions took various turns, all of them dominated by the diametrically opposed views of Foster and Escot and soothed by the healing words of Jenkison. Escot harped constantly upon the happiness and moral virtue possessed by the savages of the past, virtue which lessened with each encroachment of civilization. As the savage began to build villages and cities and to develop luxuries, he began also to suffer disease, poverty, oppression, and loss of morality. With this thesis Foster could not agree. He pointed to the achievements of civilization in fields other than those of a materialistic nature. Shakespeare and Milton, for example, could not have achieved their genius in the primitive life Escot applauded. Escot, refusing to concede an inch, pointed to Milton's suffering, stating also that even if one man did profit from the so-called advancements, fifty men regressed because of them. Mr. Jenkison agreed that the subject left something to be said on either side.

Between these learned discussions the gentlemen spent their time in attempts to fascinate the ladies. Escot had once been the suitor of one of the guests, but he had offended her father during an intellectual discussion and had fallen out of favor. He attempted now to regain his former place in her affection by humoring the father. During these periods of respite, the guests also entertained one another with singing and recitations, the selections being those they themselves had composed.

The squire, planning a magnificent ball, invited the whole neighborhood to be his guests. At the ball the wine flowed freely, so that even Foster and Escot forgot some of their differences. Escot, although he disapproved of any but aboriginal dances, danced often with the lady of his choice. Foster, of course, thought the modern dance the utmost in refinement and an expression of the improved morality of man. Jenkison could see points both for and against the custom. During the evening Squire Headlong was reminded by a maiden relative that should he not marry soon there would be no one to carry on the name that had been honored for many centuries. As his name implied, the squire was not one to toy with an idea once it had entered his mind. Fixing on the lady of his choice in a matter of minutes, he proposed and was accepted. Then he arranged three other matches in an equally short time. Foster and Escot were aided in choosing brides and in getting permission from the father of Escot's beloved. Foster's bride, related to the squire, presented no obstacle. Seizing on another man, the squire told him of the plan and promptly chose a bride for that hapless individual.

Within a matter of days the weddings took place. Then the guests dispersed, after promising to gather again in August. Foster and Escot tried to the last to convince each other and the rest that only one philosophy was the true one, but Mr. Jenkison was not to fall into either of their traps. He would join them again in August, still convinced that there was merit in both their arguments. Neither was right or wrong, but each balanced the other, leaving the world in its usual status quo.

THE HEART IS A LONELY HUNTER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Carson McCullers (1917- )

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: The 1930's

Locale: A Georgia mill town

Principal characters:

MR. SINGER, a mute

MICK KELLY, an adolescent girl

BIFF BRANNON, a café proprietor

JAKE BLOUNT, a frustrated, idealistic workingman

DR. COPELAND, a Negro physician

Critique:

To read The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter as a novel of social criticism is to misinterpret the subtle yet precise art of Carson McCullers. Her true theme in this remarkable first novel is that sense of moral isolation, expressed in terms of loneliness and longing, which is both the social evil of the modern world and the inescapable condition of man. Four different but related stories illuminate Mrs. McCullers' theme through the experiences of Mick Kelly, Biff Brannon, Jake Blount, and Dr. Copeland. These people are drawn to Mr. Singer, the mute, because his physical infirmity seems to set him apart in the same way that their own sense of separation from the social community makes their lives incomplete. Mrs. McCullers is one of the most distinguished among our younger novelists, a writer whose fiction has both substance and significance.

The Story:

In a small town in the South there were two mutes, one a grossly fat Greek, the other a tall, immaculate man named Mr. Singer. They had no friends, and they lived together for ten years. After a lingering sickness the Greek became a changed man. When he began to be obscene in public, the cousin for whom he worked sent him to the state insane asylum. After that Mr. Singer was desolate.

He took all his meals at the New York Café owned by Biff Brannon. Biff was a stolid man with a weakness for cripples and sick people. When Jake Blount, a squat man with long, powerful arms, came to town, he went on a week-long drunk at Biff's expense. Biff had to find out what bothered Jake. Finding Mr. Singer eating at the café, Jake decided that he was the only person who could understand the message he was trying to give. One night Mr. Singer took Jake home with him. It was not until after he had slept that Jake realized Mr. Singer was a mute. He still felt, however, that the mute could understand him.

Mr. Singer had taken a room at the Kellys' boarding-house, where the daughter Mick, just entering her teens, was a gangly girl, always dressed in shorts, a shirt, and tennis shoes. She loved music and would go anywhere to hear it. Some nights she went to a big house in town where she could hear symphonic music through the open windows while she crouched in the shrubbery. At home no one realized what she wanted, until Mr. Singer moved there and let her talk to him when she was lonely.

Mick decided, after entering Vocational School, that she had to have some friends. Planning a dance, she invited only high school students. The house was decorated with tinsel. Mick borrowed an evening dress and high-heeled shoes from one of her sisters.

On the night of the party a throng of children arrived and separated into noisy groups. When Mick handed out the prom cards, the boys went to one side of the room, the girls to the other. Silence descended. No one knew how to start things. A boy finally asked Mick to prom with him. Outside the house all the neighborhood children had gathered. While Mick and Harry walked around the block, the neighborhood children joined the party. By the time Mick got back, the decorations were torn, the refreshments gone, and the invited and the uninvited guests mixed up so badly that the party was bedlam. Everyone congregated on the street to run races and jump ditches, the partygoers forgetful of their nearly-grown-up state. Mick finally called off the party after she had been knocked breathless on a jump she could have made easily in her tennis shoes.

Portia worked for the Kellys. Her father was Dr. Copeland, the only colored doctor in town. He was an idealistic man who had always worked hard to raise the standards of the Negro people. One dark night Mr. Singer had stepped up and helped him light a cigarette in the rain. It was the first time a white man had ever offered him help or smiled at him. When he told Portia about a deaf-mute boy patient of his, she assured him that Mr. Singer would help him.

Jake, who had found a job with a flying-jenny show, tried to rouse the workers. He spent each Sunday with Mr. Singer, explaining that he had first wanted to be an evangelist until he had been made aware of the inequality in the world. He had unintentionally insulted Dr. Copeland twice, but he was one of the first to talk about doing something for Willie, Dr. Copeland's son.

Willie had been sentenced to hard labor for knifing a man. At the prison camp he and two others tried to run away. They were put in a cold shack for three days with their bare feet hoisted up by a looped rope. Willie lost both feet from gangrene. Dr. Copeland, trying to see the judge about the case, was severely beaten up by a white crowd around the court house and put in jail. Mr. Singer and Portia obtained his release on bail, and Jake went with Mr. Singer to Dr. Copeland's house. There he argued the ethics of the case with the doctor all night, Jake too hysterical to be logical, the doctor too sick.

There was a peacefulness in Mr. Singer's face that attracted Mick. She followed him whenever she could. He bought a radio which he kept in his room for her to listen to. Those were hours of deep enjoyment for her. She felt that she had music in her that she would have to learn to write down.

She fascinated Biff. After his wife died, he watched Mick begin to grow up, but he seldom spoke to her. He was equally quiet with Mr. Singer when he visited at the Kelly boarding-house. Mr. Singer considered Mick pitiful, Jake crazy, Dr. Copeland noble, and Biff thoughtful; but they were always welcome to his room.

On his vacation Mr. Singer went to see his Greek friend. He took beautiful presents along with him, but the Greek was petulant over anything but food. Only there did Mr. Singer take his hands out of his pockets; then he wore himself out trying to tell the Greek with his hands everything he had seen and thought since the Greek went away. Although the Greek showed no interest, Mr. Singer tried even harder to entertain him. When he left, the Greek was still impassive.

Mr. Singer's board was the only steady money the Kellys could depend on. When one sister got sick, the loss of her salary threw the whole family in a quandary. Mick heard that a job was opening at the five-and-ten-cent store. The family in conclave decided she was too young to work. The fact that for the first time they were talking about her welfare prompted her to apply for the job. She got it, but each night she was too tired for anything but sleep.

It was again time for Mr. Singer to go to see his Greek friend. Laden down with presents, he made the long trip. When he reached the asylum office, the clerk told him the Greek was dead. Stricken, he found his way back to the town, left his luggage at the station, went to his room, and put a bullet through his chest.

Mr. Singer's death left his four friends confused. Dr. Copeland, still sick, brooded over it.

Jake Blount joined in a free-for-all at the flying-jenny grounds and, after hearing that the police were looking for him, left town.

Mick did not sleep well for weeks after the funeral. All that she had left was Mr. Singer's radio. She felt cheated because there was no time, no money, no feeling anymore for music, but she could never decide who had cheated her.

And Biff, who had watched Mr. Singer with Jake and Mick, was still puzzling over the relationships he had studied. He wondered whether, in the struggle of humanity, love might be the answer.

The fears and hopes, friendships and petty rivalries, loves and hates of Europeans immured in a colony on the African coast afforded Graham Greene, who ac-begun in Greene's earlier work. Major Scobie, like Arthur Rowe in The Ministry of Fear, is a relatively friendless man—a type that seems to have fascination for the author. Like Rowe, in the earlier novel, Major Scobie is placed in a position where he can choose between life or death: the high point in both novels is that at which the choice is made. Beyond the immediate story, however, there are larger implications. The Heart of the Matter, written by one of the leading Catholic novelists of the day, is actually a religious story, a fable of the conflict between good and evil. It is a drama of the human soul in mid-passage toward Heaven or Hell.

The Story:

For fifteen years Major Scobie, chief of police in a British West African district had built up a reputation for honesty. Then he learned that in spite of his labors he was to be passed over for the district commissionership in favor of a younger man. Those fifteen long years now seemed to him to have been too long and filled with too much work. Worse than his own disappointment was the disappointment of his wife. Mrs. Scobie needed the encouragement that a rise in official position would have given her, to compensate for the loss of her only child some years before and her unpopularity among the official family of the district.

A love for literature, especially poetry, had set Mrs. Scobie apart from the other officials and their wives. Once the difference was discerned, the other Britishers distrusted and disliked her. They even pitied the man whom she had married. Nor were the Scobies much happier than people imagined them to be. Mrs. Scobie hated the life she led, and her husband disliked having to make her face it realistically. Both drank. When she found he was not to be made district commissioner, she insisted that he send her to the Cape Colony for a holiday, even though German submarines were torpedoing many vessels at the time.

Scobie had not the money to pay expenses of the trip. For a previous excursion of hers from the colony he had already given up part of his life insurance. After trying unsuccessfully to borrow the money from the banks, he went to Yusef, a Syrian merchant, who agreed to lend him the money at four percent interest. Scobie knew that any dealings he had with Yusef would place him under a cloud, for the official British family knew only too well that many of the Syrian's doings were illegal, including the shipment of industrial diamonds to the Nazis. Pressed by his wife's apparent need to escape the boredom of the rainy season in the coast colony, Scobie finally took the chance that he could keep clear of Yusef's entanglements, even though he knew that the Syrian hated him for the reputation of integrity he had built up during the past fifteen years.

To add to Scobie's difficulties, he learned that Wilson, a man supposedly sent out on a clerkship with a trading company, was actually an undercover agent working for the government on the problem of diamond smuggling. First of all, Scobie had no official information about Wilson's true activities; secondly, Wilson had fallen in love with Scobie's wife; and, thirdly, Mrs. Scobie had bloodied Wilson's nose for him and permitted her husband to see her admirer crying. Any one of the counts would have made Scobie uneasy; all three in combination made him painfully aware that Wilson could only hate him, as Wilson actually did.

Shortly after his wife's departure, a series of events began to break down Major Scobie's trust in his own honesty and the reputation he had built up for himself. When a Portuguese liner was searched on its arrival in port, Scobie found a suspicious letter in the captain's cabin. Instead of turning in the letter, he burned it—after the captain had assured him that the letter was only a personal message to his daughter in Germany. A few weeks later Yusef began to be very friendly toward Scobie. Gossip reported that Scobie had met and talked with the Syrian on several occasions, in addition to having borrowed money from the suspected smuggler.

One day word came that the French had rescued the crew and passengers of a torpedoed British vessel. Scobie was with the party who met the rescued people at the border between the French and British colonies. Among the victims was a young bride of only a few months whose husband had been killed in the war. While she recuperated from her exposure in a lifeboat and then waited for a ship to return her to England, she and Scobie fell in love. For a time they were extremely careful of their conduct, until one day Mrs. Rolt, the rescued woman, belittled Scobie because of his caution. Scobie, to prove his daring as well as his love, sent her a letter which was intercepted by Yusef's agents. In payment for return of the letter Scobie was forced to help Yusef smuggle some gems from the colony. Wilson, Scobie's enemy, suspected the smuggling done by Scobie, but he could prove nothing.

Mrs. Rolt pleaded with Scobie to show his love by divorcing his wife and marrying her. Scobie, a Roman Catholic, tried to convince her that his faith and his conscience could not permit his doing so. To complicate matters further, Mrs. Scobie cabled that she was already aboard ship on her way back home from Capetown. Scobie did not know which way to turn. On her return Mrs. Scobie nagged him to take communion with her. Scobie, unable to receive absolution because he refused to promise to give up adultery, took the sacrament of communion anyway, rather than admit to his wife what had happened. He realized that according to his faith he was damning his soul.

The worry over his sins, his uneasiness about his job, the problem of Yusef, a murder that Yusef had had committed for him, and the nagging of both his wife and Mrs. Rolt—all these made Scobie's mind a turmoil. He did not know which way to turn, for the Church, haven for many, was forbidden to him because of his sins and his temperament.

In searching for a way out of his predicament Scobie remembered what he had been told by a doctor shortly after an official investigation of a suicide. The doctor had told Scobie that the best way to commit suicide was to feign angina and then take an overdose of evipan, a drug prescribed for angina cases. Carefully, Scobie made plans to take his life in that way because he wanted his wife to have his insurance money for her support after she returned to England. After studying the symptoms of angina, Scobie went to a doctor, who diagnosed Scobie's trouble from the symptoms he related. Scobie knew that his pretended heart condition would soon be common knowledge in the colony.

Ironically, Scobie was told that he had been reconsidered for the commissioner-ship of the colony but that he could not be given the post because of his illness. To Scobie, the news made little difference, for he had already made up his mind to commit suicide.

To make his death appear convincing, he filled his diary with entries tracing the progress of his heart condition. One evening he took his overdose of evipan, his only solution to difficulties which had become more than he could bear. He died, and only one or two people even suspected the truth. One of these was Mrs. Scobie, who complained to the priest after he had refused to give Scobie absolution. The priest, knowing of Scobie's virtues as well as his sins, cried out to her that no one could call Scobie wicked or damned, for no one knew God's mercy.

STELLA RODNEY, an attractive widow

RODERICK RODNEY, her son

ROBERT KELWAY, her lover

HARRISON, a British Intelligence agent

LOUIE LEWIS, wife of a British soldier

Critique:

The wartime setting of this book is no more than incidental, for the story treats of contrasting faiths and loyalties which are altogether timeless. Though the general atmosphere is electric with danger, the author muffles the sound of bombs and anti-aircraft guns until they give only a tonal background for the drama of Stella Rodney, Robert Kelway, and the enigmatic Harrison. The problem of Stella Rodney is that of a woman asked to question her own judgment of the man she loves. Miss Bowen is at her best in dealing with complex personal relationships, and here she inspects some barriers to emotional and intellectual harmony that are embodied in a conflict between patriotism and love. Like Henry James, she is interested in the collision of finely-grained personalities; and the very nature of her subject matter demands a style that is sensitive and involved.

The Story:

The first Sunday afternoon of September, 1942, found Harrison sitting at a band concert in Regent Park. But he was not listening to the music. He was, in fact, merely killing time until he could see Stella Rodney at eight o'clock. Thinking of Stella and the awkward subject he must discuss with her, he kept thrusting the fist of his right hand into the palm of his left. This unconscious motion, as well as his obvious indifference to the music, aroused the curiosity of an adjacent listener. This neighbor, Louie Lewis, was a clumsy, cheaply clad young woman with an artless and somewhat bovine expression. Lonely without her soldier husband and entirely a creature of impulse, she offended Harrison by breaking into his reverie with naïve comments which were brusquely rebuffed. Unabashed, she trailed after him when he left the concert, giving up only when he abruptly left her to keep his engagement.

Stella, in her top-floor flat in Weymouth Street, wondered rather idly why Harrison was late. Her attitude of waiting was more defiant than expectant, for she had no love for her visitor. She hardly knew how he had managed to insinuate himself into her life; first, he had turned up unaccountably at the funeral of Cousin Francis Morris, and since then his attentions had shown a steady increase. There had been a subtle shade of menace in his demand that she see him that night, and a curious sense of apprehension had prompted her to consent. As she awaited his knock, her glance flickered impatiently about the charming flat, and she recalled fleetingly the facts that gave shape to her existence: her young son, Roderick, now in the British army; her ex-husband, long divorced and dead; her own war work with Y.X.D.; and her lover, Robert Kelway, also in government service.

When Harrison arrived, he received a cool and perfunctory greeting. His first remarks were hesitant and enigmatic, but he soon launched into words that left Stella wide-eyed with shock and disbelief. Her lover, he told her, was a Nazi agent passing English secrets on to Germany. Harrison himself was connected with British Intelligence and he had been assigned to cover Kelway's movements. There was just one way to save the traitor. Stella must give him up, switch her interest to Harrison. Then Kelway's fate might be averted, or indefinitely postponed.

The blunt proposition unnerved Stella. She refused to believe in Kelway's guilt, for Harrison did not impress her as a man to trust. She played for time, winning a month's delay in which to make up her mind. Harrison sharply advised her not to warn Robert; the slightest change in his pattern of action would result in his immediate arrest. As the interview ended, the telephone rang. At the other end was Roderick, announcing his arrival for leave in London. Upon Harrison's departure, Stella pulled herself together and made quick preparation to receive her son.

Roderick's coming helped a little; temporarily it deprived Stella of the time to worry. Roderick was young and vulnerable, and his father's early abdication had made Stella feel doubly responsible for her son. Roderick wanted to talk about his new interest in life, the run-down estate in Ireland recently bequeathed him by Cousin Francis Morris. The boy was determined to keep his new property, but, until the war was over, the task of looking after it would be largely Stella's responsibility.

Roderick's leave expired. The next night Robert Kelway came to Stella's flat. She gave no hint of her inward agitation, though she casually inquired if he knew Harrison. Gazing at her attractive, considerate lover, Stella silently marveled that he should be a suspect—he, a lamed veteran of Dunkirk! Considering, however, that she knew nothing about his family, she renewed her request that they visit his mother and sister in the country. A subsequent Saturday afternoon at Holme Dene revealed nothing strange about Robert's background. On the night of her return from Robert's home, she found Harrison waiting at her apartment; he confirmed his watchfulness by telling her where she had been, and why.

Roderick's interests intervened by summoning Stella briefly to Ireland. Robert protested at losing her for even a few days and they parted affectionately. In Ireland, Stella's distrust of Harrison received a jolt; he had been truthful, she learned, in telling her that he had been a friend of Cousin Francis Morris. She resolved that she would acquaint Robert with Harrison's accusation. When she returned to London, Robert met her at the station. Minutes later, in a taxi, she revealed what she had heard; and Robert, deeply hurt, made a complete denial. Later that night he begged her to marry him, but Stella, surprised and disturbed, succeeded in parrying the proposal.

A few nights later Harrison had dinner with Stella in a popular restaurant. She stiffened with apprehension as he told her that she had disobeyed him by putting Robert on his guard. Before Stella could learn what Harrison intended to do, she was interrupted by the untimely intrusion of Louie Lewis, who crudely invited herself to their table after spotting Harrison in the crowd. Nevertheless, Stella managed to intimate that she would meet Harrison's terms if he would save Robert from arrest. Angry at Louie, Harrison made no response; roughly dismissing the two women, he stalked off, leaving them to find their way home through blacked-out London. Louie, fascinated by the superior charm and refinement of Stella, accompanied her to the doorway of her apartment.

Robert was at Holme Dene, so that not until the next night did Stella have a chance to warn him of his danger. In the early morning darkness of Stella's bedroom, they renewed their love and confidence with a sense that it was to be their last meeting. When Robert finally revealed that he was an ardent Nazi, prizing power above freedom, Stella found no way to reconcile their views. Faint footsteps, as of outside watchers, were heard as Robert dressed and prepared to leave. He climbed up the rope ladder to the skylight in the roof, then came back down again to kiss Stella once more. He told her to take care of herself as he hurriedly disappeared through the skylight. The next morning Robert's body was found lying in the street where he had leaped or fallen from the steeply slanting roof.

More than a year passed before Stella saw Harrison. There were Allied landings in Africa; there was the invasion of Italy; there was the ever-growing prospect of a Second Front. Finally Harrison came back. Stella had had questions to ask him, questions about Robert, but now it seemed pointless to ask them. An air of constraint hung over their conversation, a feeling that Robert's death had removed any real link between their lives. Harrison made no romantic overtures; he even seemed faintly relieved when Stella told him that she was soon to be married.

The Heimskringla, a collection of traditional sagas of the Norwegian kings, was first transcribed by Snorri Sturluson, an Icelandic bard and chieftain. Interested in the stories handed down by word of mouth in the houses of chieftains in the northern countries, he wrote them down in Old Norse, the language understood by all Scandinavian peoples at that time. Snorri Sturluson began writing in 1220. Beginning with the Yngling Saga, which traces the descent of the Northmen from the legendary god Odin, The Heimskringla contains sixteen other sagas covering the historic period between 839 and 1177. Each saga tells of the life and achievements of one man; in The Heimskringla each man represented is the chief king of Norway at a time when several men usually fought for the title. These are only a few of the hundreds of sagas known to Scandinavian literature. While the time of sagas in general runs from the sixth to the fourteenth centuries, The Heimskringla covers the Viking Age, dating roughly from the eighth century, when Norwegians came into historical significance because of their raiding expeditions, through the years of Norwegian occupation of foreign lands, the Christianizing of their own country, and finally the consolidation of Norway.

The Stories:

In Asaland in Asia near the Black Sea lived Odin, the conqueror of many nations, and a great traveler, whose people believed he would have success in every battle. When a neighboring people beheaded his friend Mime as a spy and sent the head to Odin, he smeared the head with herbs to keep it from rotting and sang incantations over it. Thereafter the head could speak to Odin and discover secrets for him. While the Romans were subduing the world, Odin learned that he was to rule the northern half. Traveling through Russia and northern Germany, he finally settled in the Scandinavian peninsula. There he appeared handsome to his friends and fiendish to his enemies. He used magic against his foes so that they were helpless in battle against him, for he could change his own shape and wish himself from place to place. He made laws for his people: that the dead should be burned, that blood-sacrifice be made for good harvests, and that taxes be paid yearly. When he was near death, Odin said that he would go to Valhalla and wait there for all good warriors. Then he died quietly in his bed, and afterward the rulers of the north-land claimed descent from him.

The sacrifices his people made to Odin were sometimes great. When King On Jorundsson of Sweden was sixty years old, he made an oracular sacrifice of a son to Odin. His answer from Odin was that he would live sixty years longer if he sacrificed a son every ten years. He sacrificed as he was told until he had given up nine out of his ten sons. By that time he was so old and weak that his people refused to let the tenth son be sacrificed, and so On died of extreme old age. After that people dying from weakness of age were said to have On's sickness.

After twenty generations of Yngling rulers in the Scandinavian countries came Halfdan the Black, born about 820, King of Norway. In those days a king was an intermediary between the people and the supreme powers, whose favor he courted by sacrifices. Halfdan was considered a good king because the harvests were plentiful during his lifetime. He died young in a sleighing accident while crossing thin ice. His people begged so hard for his body to insure continued good seasons that finally the body was quartered, and each quarter and the head were sent to separate provinces to spread his good influence.

Harald the Fairhaired was Halfdan's son. He sent some of his henchmen to bring to him a girl to be his concubine, but she refused to bow to a king of any territory so small and sent word that she would consider him when he ruled all of Norway. His attendants thought her attitude warranted punishment; Harald considered it a challenge. Ten years later, after he had conquered all of Norway, he sent for the girl and married her. He had many children by her and other women. When he was fifty years old, he divided his kingdom among his sons and gave them half the revenues.

At that time Aethelstan, King of England, sent Harald a sword. When Harald accepted it, however, Aethelstan's messengers claimed that he was then subject to their king. The following summer Harald sent his nine-year-old son Hakon to Aethelstan to foster, as a foster father was always subject to a real father. Each king tried to outdo the other, but each ruled in his own kingdom until his dying day. When he was seventy-nine years old, Harald died in his bed.

Hakon went from England to Norway when he heard of his father's death. He was then fifteen years old. At the same time the chief Norse king had sailed west to ravage England; he was Hakon's brother, Eric Blood-Ax, so called because he had slain at least four of his brothers. Eric was killed in England and Hakon subdued Norway. Hakon, who had been converted to Christianity while in England, began to practice Christian habits of fasting and prayer in Norway. Although he did not insist on forcing Christianity on his followers, many of them, out of friendship for him, allowed themselves to be baptized. Hakon wanted to forego sacrifices to the gods, but a counselor persuaded him to humor the people who still believed devoutly in blood sacrifice. Known to his country as Hakon the Good, he was killed in battle with Eric's sons, to whom he left the kingdom.

The years during which Eric's sons ruled Norway were so bad that fish as well as corn were lacking and the people went hungry. Among other petty kings, the sons killed Tryggve Olafsson, whose wife escaped to bring Olaf Tryggvesson to birth.

As a child Olaf Tryggvesson spent six years in slavery before his uncle learned where marauding Vikings had sent him after capturing the boy and his mother as they were on their way to a place of safety in Russia. By the time he was twelve, Olaf himself was a Viking chieftain. After harrying various parts of England he made peace with Aethelred, the English king, and thereafter always kept the peace with England. By that time his aim was to be a crusader, for he had come under the influence of Christianity during his raids on England. Having been converted and baptized by the English priests, he wanted to Christianize his own land as well. He set sail for Norway in 995. Between that date and 1000, when he was decoyed into a one-sided battle with the kings of Denmark and Sweden and lost his life at Svolder, he converted all of Norway as well as many of the outlying islands, either by the force of his own personality, or, when that did not suffice, by force of arms. Norway was a Christian land by the time Olaf died, but there was no Norwegian king strong enough to rule its entirety while the Danes and Swedes laid claim to various parts of the country.

While he was very young, Olaf Haraldsson joined Viking expeditions to England, Jutland, Holland, France, and Spain. In England, where the Norwegians were fighting the Danes who were then in power in England, he was present at the stoning to death of the archbishop who had confirmed Olaf Tryggvesson. It was said that in Spain Olaf Haraldsson dreamed of a fearful man who told him to give up further travel to the Holy Land and to go back to Norway. In 1015 he sailed for Norway to reestablish Christianity and to regain the throne once held by his ancestor, Harald the Fair-haired. Though he did not have the striking personality of Olaf Tryggvesson, Olaf Haraldsson had persistence enough to spread Christianity by his bands of missionaries, to win control over Norway, and to set up a central government. The latter was his hardest task, as it meant taking away some of the traditional powers of the chieftains. He created a form of justice that worked equally for the chieftains and the common people, and because of their resentment the chieftains rose against him at last. With a superior force they fought him at Stiklestad, in 1030, when he was cut down. His hope for national union and independence seemed doomed until suddenly rumors were spread that miracles had occurred where his body had fallen. People began to give Olaf Haraldsson a new name, Olaf the Saint, and the whole Norwegian people suddenly craved the independence he had fought for.

Olaf the Saint's stepson, Magnus, obtained the title of King of Norway without much trouble. Afterward he made a treaty with King Hardacanute of Denmark to keep the peace as long as they both should live, the one surviving to become the ruler of the other's country. When Hardacanute died, Magnus thereupon became King of Denmark. Since Hardacanute had also become King of England after the death of his father, Magnus laid claim to England when Edward the Good became the English king; but he was prevented from invading England by trouble stirred up in Denmark by a false friend whom he had made earl there. Letters were exchanged between Magnus and Edward over Magnus' claim to England. Edward's reply was so sensible and courageous that Magnus was content to rule in his own land and to let Edward reign in England.

Greater troubles beset Magnus when his uncle, Harald Sigurdsson, returned north after many years in Russia, Constantinople, and the Holy Land. Harald had left Norway after the battle of Stiklestad, when his brother Olaf the Saint was killed. He plundered all through the south lands and at Constantinople joined the royal guard called the Vaeringer. Meanwhile he had collected much booty, which he sent to the Russian king for safekeeping until he should have finished his wanderings. When he tired of life in Constantinople, he traveled north to Russia. There he married Ellisiv, the king's daughter, and then traveled with her and his booty toward Norway. Eventually he made a deal with Magnus. He received half of Norway in return for half his booty. When Magnus, called the Good, died of illness, Harald, in contrast called the Stern, ruled alone. He was a harsh ruler and he met his death in England while trying to unthrone Harald Godwinsson, Edward's successor.

Through these times miracles continued to be credited to Olaf the Saint. Sometimes he appeared to people in dreams, as he did to Magnus the Good just before his death. Sometimes a pilgrimage to his shrine cured people who had been crippled from birth or who had been maimed in fighting. It was even said that Olaf could pull the root of a tongue so that a man whose tongue had been cut out could speak again. His shrine was in Nidaros.

After Harald the Stern, his sons Magnus and Olaf ruled Norway, but Magnus soon died of a sickness. Olaf, called the Quiet, reigned for twenty-six years. There was peace in Norway during that time, and the country gained in riches and cultivation.

Thereafter Olaf's son Magnus and his nephew, Hakon Magnusson, ruled Norway, but Hakon soon died of an illness. Magnus' reign was of ten years' time, most of which he spent in expeditions to reduce the island possessions to full submission to the central government in Norway. Under Magnus, for the first time, the government became a strong power. Because Magnus returned from one of his expeditions to Scotland wearing the Scottish national costume, his people called him Magnus Barefoot. On a foraging expedition, in 1103, Magnus was killed in Ireland before he was thirty years old.

From that time until 1130 peace descended on Norway and the Church increased its powers. In the early days the Norwegian churches had been under the archbishopric of Bremen, but during that time they gained an archbishopric of their own at Lund in Skåne. Magnus' sons, Eystein, Sigurd, and Olaf, ruled the country, but Olaf was only a small boy. Those years were also the period of the crusades. Sigurd took men and ships to the Holy Land while Eystein ruled at home. Sigurd was gone three years and gained much glory in England, Spain, Constantinople, and Palestine. He was afterward called the Crusader. When he came back to Norway, he and Eystein were jealous of each other's powers. Olaf died young and Eystein died before Sigurd. Sigurd had strange fancies before he himself died, but he had done much to improve the legal system of the country by increasing the powers of the Things. The congregation of people at the Things became the highest authority in the land, and even the kings argued their cases before those representative bodies.

Neither Olaf nor Eystein had sons. Magnus, Sigurd's son, became king, but his sole rule was threatened by Harald Gille, who came from Ireland and claimed to be Sigurd's half-brother. Harald passed an ordeal by hot iron to prove his paternity. After Sigurd's death Harald was proclaimed king over part of Norway. It was said that Magnus was foolish, but Harald was cruel. A series of civil wars ensued, ending when Harald captured Magnus and had him blinded and otherwise mutilated. Thereafter Magnus was called the Blind. He retired to a monastery. Harald was killed by the order and treachery of Sigurd Slembedegn, a pretender to the throne.

In the days when Harald's sons reigned there were more civil wars. Crippled Inge was the most popular of Harald's three sons. Sigurd and Eystein led separate factions, and so there was always unrest in the country.

In 1152, Cardinal Nicholas came to Norway from Rome to establish an archbishopric at Nidaros, where King Olaf the Saint reposed. Cardinal Nicholas was well loved by the people and improved many of their customs. When the pope died suddenly, Nicholas became Pope Adrian IV. He was always friendly with the Norsemen.

After Sigurd and Eystein had been killed in different battles, Inge ruled alone. He was twenty-six when he was killed in battle with Hakon Sigurdsson, who had claimed Eystein's part of Norway. Hakon was little to be trusted. Erling Skakke, previously a power behind Inge's throne, then took it upon himself to create a strong party which could put upon the throne whomever it chose. None of his party favored Hakon, called the Broad-Shouldered, who was defeated in battle within a year, when he was only fifteen, in 1162.

Erling Skakke's party finally decided to put Erling Skakke's son Magnus on the throne. The child was five years old at the time. He was a legitimate candidate, however, for his mother was a daughter of Sigurd the Crusader. Erling Skakke was jealous of power, yet he gave much of the traditional authority of the throne to the bishops in exchange for their blessing on Magnus as king; and he made an agreement with King Valdemar of Denmark under which he gave Valdemar a part of Norway as a fief under the Danish crown in exchange for peace. It had been a long time since a foreign king had claim to part of Norway. Erling Skakke spent much of his time wiping out the descendants of Harald Gille, and in time he became a tyrant in order to hold the throne safe for his child, Magnus Erlingsson.

Critique:

In the prologue to Henry VIII the audience is advised that this is not a happy play; it should be received in sadness. The description is incomplete and the advice somewhat misleading. True, the play is sad in its reality of ambition, political maneuvering, misunderstanding, and unhappiness, but, as the story progresses, honesty and altruism predominate. And it is difficult to imagine a Shakespearean audience receiving with sadness Cranmer's eloquent prophecy regarding the newborn princess, known to history as Queen Elizabeth. Henry VIII vividly pictures British court life in its spectacular pomp and in its behind-the-throne humanity. Many authorities credit John Fletcher with the part-authorship of this play.

The Story:

Cardinal Wolsey, a powerful figure at court during the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII, was becoming too aggressive in his self-aggrandizement. Wolsey was of humble stock, which fact accentuated his personal qualities. Since he had lacked the advantages of family and ancestral office, his political prominence was entirely the result of his own wisdom, manner, and persistence. Unscrupulous in seeking his own ends, he had removed any possible obstacle in his climb to power.

One such hindrance to his ambitious designs was the Duke of Buckingham, accused of high treason. When Buckingham was brought before the court for trial, Queen Katharine, speaking in his defense, protested against the cardinal's unjust taxes and informed the king of growing animosity among his people because he retained Wolsey as his adviser. Wolsey produced witnesses, among them Buckingham's discharged surveyor, who testified to Buckingham's disloyalty. The surveyor swore that, at the time of the king's journey to France, the duke had sought priestly confirmation for his belief that he could, by gaining favor with the common people, rise to govern England. In his lengthy and persistent testimony the surveyor played upon earlier minor offenses Buckingham had committed, and he climaxed his accusation with an account of the duke's assertion that he would murder the king in order to gain the throne.

In spite of Katharine's forthright protestations against Wolsey in his presence, and her repeated contention of false testimony against Buckingham, the accused man was found guilty and sentenced to be executed. The duke, forbearing toward his enemies, recalled the experience of his father, Henry of Buckingham, who had been betrayed by a servant. Henry VII had restored the honor of the family by elevating the present duke to favor. One difference prevailed between the two trials, the duke stated; his father had been unjustly dealt with, but he himself had had a noble trial.

Wolsey, fearing reprisal from Buckingham's son, sent him to Ireland as a deputy; then, incensed and uneasy because of Katharine's open accusations, he pricked the king's conscience by questions regarding his marriage to Katharine, who had been the widow of Henry's brother. Wolsey furthered his cause against Katharine by arousing Henry's interest in Anne Boleyn, whom the king met at a gay ball given by the cardinal.

The plan followed by Wolsey in securing a divorce for Henry was not a difficult one. In addition to his evident trust of Wolsey, the king felt keenly the fact that the male children born to him and Katharine in their twenty years of marriage had been stillborn or had died shortly after birth. Consequently, there was no male heir in direct succession.

The cardinal's final step to be rid of his chief adversary at court was to appeal to the pope for a royal divorce. When Cardinal Campeius arrived from Rome as counsel to the king, Katharine appeared in her own defense. But Wolsey had once more resorted to perjured witnesses. Requesting counsel, Katharine was told by Wolsey that the honest and intelligent men gathered at the hearing were of her choosing. Cardinal Campeius supported Wolsey's stand.

In speeches of magnificent dignity and honesty, Katharine denounced the political treachery that had caused her so much unhappiness. Later, however, Katharine, expelled from the court and sequestered in Kimbolton, was able to feel compassion for Wolsey when informed that he had died in ill-repute; and her undying devotion to Henry was indicated in her death note to him. Altruistic to the last, she made as her final request to the king the maintenance of the domestics who had served her so faithfully. Her strength to tolerate the injustices she had endured lay in her trust in a Power which, she said, could not be corrupted by a king.

But ambition overrode itself in Wolsey's designs for power. His great pride had caused him to accumulate greater wealth than the king's, to use an inscription, Ego et Rex meus, which subordinated the king to the cardinal, and to have a British coin stamped with a cardinal's hat. These, among many other offenses, were of little importance compared with Wolsey's double-dealing against the king in the divorce proceedings. Because Wolsey feared that Henry would marry Anne Boleyn instead of seeking a royal alliance in France, Wolsey asked the pope to delay the divorce. When his letter was delivered by mistake to the king, Wolsey, confronted with the result of his own carelessness, showed the true tenacious character of the ambitious climber. Although he realized that his error was his undoing, he attempted to ingratiate himself once more with the king.

He was too late to save himself. He could instigate the unseating and banishment of subordinates and he could maneuver to have the queen sequestered, but Henry wished no meddling with his marital affairs. Repentant that he had not served God with the effort and fervor with which he had served the king, Wolsey left the court, a broken-spirited man. He was later arrested in York, to be returned for arraignment before Henry. He was saved the humiliation of trial, however, for he died on the way to London.

Henry, shortly after the divorce, secretly married Anne Boleyn. After Wolsey's death she was crowned queen with great pomp. Cranmer, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, became Henry's chief adviser.

Jealousy and rivalry did not disappear from the court with the downfall of Wolsey. Charging heresy, Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, set out to undermine Cranmer's position with the king. Accused as an arch heretic, Cranmer was brought to trial. Henry, trusting his favorite, gave him the royal signet ring which he was to show to the council if his entreaties and reasoning failed with his accusers. Cranmer, overcome by the king's kindness, wept in gratitude.

As he stood behind a curtain near the council room, the king heard Gardiner's charges against Cranmer. When Gardiner ordered Cranmer to the Tower, stating that the council was acting on the pleasure of the king, the accused man produced the ring and insisted upon his right to appeal the case to the king. Realizing that they had been tricked by a ruse which Wolsey had used for many years, the nobles were penitent. Appearing before the council, Henry took his seat at the table to condemn the assemblage for their tactics in dealing with Cranmer. After giving his blessings to those present and imploring them to be motivated in the future by unity and love, he asked Cranmer to be godfather to the daughter recently born to Anne Boleyn.

At the christening Cranmer prophesied that the child, Elizabeth, would be wise and virtuous, that her life would be a pattern to all princes who knew her, and that she would be loved and feared because of her goodness and her strength. He said that she would rule long and every day of her reign would be blessed with good deeds.

HENRY THE FOURTH, PART ONE

Type of work: Drama

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Historical chronicle

Time of plot: 1400-1405

Locale: England

First presented: 1596

Principal characters:

KING HENRY THE FOURTH

HENRY, Prince of Wales

JOHN OF LANCASTER, another son of the king

EARL OF WESTMORELAND, and

SIR WALTER BLUNT, members of the king's party

HOTSPUR, son of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland

THOMAS PERCY, Earl of Worcester, Hotspur's uncle

EDMUND MORTIMER, Earl of March, Hotspur's brother-in-law and claimant to the throne

SIR JOHN FALSTAFF, a bibulous knight

MISTRESS QUICKLY, hostess of the Boar's Head Tavern in Eastcheap

Critique:

In Part I of The History of King Henry IV historical details and dramatic sequences involving affairs of state are secondary to the comic aspects of the plot. Falstaff, Shakespeare's best humorous character, is the figure whose entrances have been anticipated by audiences of every period. Here, within a historical framework, humor exists for its own sake, and in no sense are the humorous details a subplot to the activities of the Crown. Woven into and between the scenes of court and military affairs, the antics of Falstaff and his mates created a suitable atmosphere for showing Prince Henry's character. He entered into their tricks and zaniness with an abandon equal to the irresponsibility of the commonest of the group. Falstaff's lies, thieving, drinking, and debauchery made him the butt of repeated ludicrous situations. He used any reverse to the advantage of obtaining another bottle of sack, of gratifying his ego by attracting the attention of his cohorts, or of endearing himself, with his sly rascality, to the prince. Because of Falstaff, comedy and history join in this play.

The Story:

King Henry, conscience-stricken because of his part in the murder of King Richard II, his predecessor, planned a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He declared to his lords that war had been banished from England and that peace would reign throughout the kingdom.

But there were those of differing opinions. Powerful barons in the North remained disaffected after the accession of the new king. Antagonized by his failure to keep promises made when he claimed the throne, they recruited forces to maintain their feudal rights. In fact, as Henry announced plans for his expedition to the Holy Land, he was informed of the brutal murder of a thousand persons in a fray between Edmund Mortimer, proclaimed by Richard as heir to the crown, and Glendower, a Welsh rebel. Mortimer was taken prisoner. A messenger also brought word of Hotspur's success against the Scots at Holmedon Hill. The king expressed his commendation of the young knight and his regrets that his own son, Prince Henry, was so irresponsible and carefree.

But King Henry, piqued by Hotspur's refusal to release to him more than one prisoner, ordered a council meeting to bring the overzealous Hotspur to terms. At the meeting Henry refused to ransom Mortimer, the pretender to the throne, held by Glendower. In turn, Hotspur refused to release the prisoners taken at Holmedon Hill, and Henry threatened more strenuous action against Hotspur and his kinsmen.

In a rousing speech Hotspur appealed to the power and nobility of Northumberland and Worcester and urged that they undo the wrongs of which they were guilty in the dethronement and murder of Richard and in aiding Henry instead of Mortimer to the crown. Worcester promised to help Hotspur in his cause against Henry. Worcester's plan would involve the aid of Douglas of Scotland, to be sought after by Hotspur, of Glendower and Mortimer, to be won over through Worcester's efforts, and of the Archbishop of York, to be approached by Northumberland.

Hotspur's boldness and impatience were shown in his dealing with Glendower as they, Mortimer, and Worcester discussed the future division of the kingdom. Hotspur, annoyed by the tedium of Glendower's personal account of his own ill-fated birth and by the uneven distribution of land, was impudent and rude. Hotspur was first a soldier, then a gentleman.

In the king's opinion, Prince Henry was quite lacking in either of these attributes. In one of their foolish pranks Sir John Falstaff and his riotous band had robbed some travelers at Gadshill, only to be set upon and put to flight by the prince and one companion. Summoning the prince from the Boar's Head Tavern, the king urged his son to break with the undesirable company he kept, chiefly the ne'er-do-well Falstaff. Contrasting young Henry with Hotspur, the king pointed out the military achievements of Northumberland's heir. Congenial, high-spirited Prince Henry, remorseful because of his father's lack of confidence in him, swore his allegiance to his father and declared he would show the king that in time of crisis Hotspur's glorious deeds would prove Hotspur no better soldier than Prince Henry. To substantiate his pledge, the prince took command of a detachment that would join ranks with other units of the royal army—Blunt's, Prince John's, Westmoreland's, and the king's—in twelve days.

Prince Henry's conduct seemed to change very little. He continued his buffoonery with Falstaff, who had recruited a handful of bedraggled, nondescript foot soldiers. Falstaff's contention was that, despite their physical condition, they were food for powder and that little more could be said for any soldier.

Hotspur's forces suffered gross reverses through Northumberland's failure, because of illness, to organize an army. Also, Hotspur's ranks were reduced because Glendower believed the stars not propitious for him to march at that time. Undaunted by the news of his reduced forces, Hotspur pressed on to meet Henry's army of thirty thousand.

At Shrewsbury, the scene of the battle, Sir Walter Blunt carried to Hotspur the king's offer that the rebels' grievances would be righted and that anyone involved in the revolt would be pardoned if he chose a peaceful settlement. In answer to the king's message Hotspur reviewed the history of Henry's double-dealing and scheming in the past. Declaring that Henry's lineage should not continue on the throne, Hotspur finally promised Blunt that Worcester would wait upon the king to give him an answer to his offer.

Henry repeated his offer of amnesty to Worcester and Vernon, Hotspur's ambassadors. Because Worcester doubted the king's sincerity, on account of previous betrayals, he lied to Hotspur on his return to the rebel camp and reported that the king in abusive terms had announced his determination to march at once against Hotspur. Worcester also reported Prince Henry's invitation to Hotspur that they fight a duel. Hotspur gladly accepted the challenge.

As the two armies moved into battle, Blunt, mistaken for the king, was slain by Douglas, who, learning his error, was sorely grieved that he had not killed Henry. Douglas, declaring that he would yet murder the king, accosted him after a long search over the field. He would have been successful in his threat had it not been for the intervention of Prince Henry, who engaged Douglas and allowed the king to withdraw from the fray.

In the fighting Hotspur descended upon Prince Henry, exhausted from an earlier wound and his recent skirmish with Douglas. When the two young knights fought, Hotspur was wounded. Douglas again appeared, fighting with Falstaff, and departed after Falstaff had fallen to the ground as if he were dead. Hotspur died of his wounds and Prince Henry, before going off to join Prince John, his brother, eulogized Hotspur and Falstaff. The two benedictions were quite different. But Falstaff had only pretended lifelessness to save his life. After the prince's departure he stabbed Hotspur. He declared that he would swear before any council that he had killed the young rebel.

Worcester and Vernon were taken prisoners. Because they had not relayed to Hotspur the peace terms offered by the king, they were sentenced to death. Douglas, in flight after Hotspur's death, was taken prisoner. Given the king's permission to dispose of Douglas, Prince Henry ordered that the valiant Scottish knight be freed.

The king sent Prince John to march against the forces of Northumberland and the Archbishop of York. He and Prince Henry took the field against Glendower and Mortimer, in Wales. Falstaff had the honor of carrying off the slain Hotspur.

Critique:

As in The History of King Henry IV, Part I, comedy is an outstanding feature of this sequel. The same devices—puns, hyperbole, coarseness—are used to good effect, and in the earlier scenes of the play the character of Falstaff again sustains the spirit of high comedy. He ambles his way through this second part of Henry IV as he did in the first, his lying, drinking, and chicanery still useful to his own ends. In this sequel he becomes further involved with Mistress Quickly, and his promise to marry her is no more binding than are any of his other vows. At the end Falstaff goes on breezily promising great things for his friends, until his death. The pomp and display common to Shakespeare's historical chronicles permeate the serious parts of the drama, and the deathbed scene between Henry IV and Prince Henry is generally considered among the best in dramatic literature.

The Story:

After the battle of Shrewsbury many false reports were circulated among the peasants. At last they reached Northumberland, who believed for a time that the rebel forces had been victorious. But his retainers, fleeing from that stricken field, brought a true account of the death of Hotspur, Northumberland's valiant son, at the hands of Prince Henry, and of King Henry's avowal to put down rebellion by crushing those forces still opposing him. Northumberland, sorely grieved by news of his son's death, prepared to avenge that loss. Hope lay in the fact that the Archbishop of York had mustered an army, because soldiers so organized, being responsible to the Church rather than to a military leader, would prove better fighters than those who had fled from Shrewsbury field. News that the king's forces of twenty-five thousand men had been divided into three units was encouraging to his enemies.

In spite of Northumberland's grief for his slain son and his impassioned threat against the king and Prince Henry, he was easily persuaded by his wife and Hotspur's widow to flee to Scotland, there to await the success of his confederates before he would consent to join them with his army.

Meanwhile Falstaff delayed in carrying out his orders to proceed north and recruit troops for the king. Deeply involved with Mistress Quickly, he used his royal commission to avoid being imprisoned for debt. With Prince Henry, who had paid little heed to the conduct of the war, he continued his riotous feasting and jesting until both were summoned to join the army marching against the rebels.

King Henry, aging and weary, had been ill for two weeks. Sleepless nights had taken their toll on him, and in his restlessness he reviewed his ascent to the throne and denied, to his lords, the accusation of unscrupulousness brought against him by the rebels. He was somewhat heartened by the news of Glendower's death.

In Gloucestershire, recruiting troops at the house of Justice Shallow, Falstaff grossly accepted bribes and let able-bodied men buy themselves out of service. The soldiers he took to the war were a raggle-taggle lot.

Prince John of Lancaster, taking the field against the rebels, sent word by Westmoreland to the archbishop that the king's forces were willing to make peace, and he asked that the rebel leaders make known their grievances so that they might be corrected.

When John and the archbishop met for a conference, John questioned and criticized the archbishop's dual role as churchman and warrior. Because the rebels announced their intention to fight until their wrongs were righted, John promised redress for all. Then he suggested that the archbishop's troops be disbanded after a formal review; he wished to see the stalwart soldiers that his army would have fought if a truce had not been declared.

His request was granted, but the men, excited by the prospect of their release, scattered so rapidly that inspection was impossible. Westmoreland, sent to disband John's army, returned to report that the soldiers would take orders only from the prince. With his troops assembled and the enemy's disbanded, John ordered some of the opposing leaders arrested for high treason and others, including the archbishop, for capital treason. John explained that his action was in keeping with his promise to improve conditions and that to remove rebellious factions was the first step in his campaign. The enemy leaders were sentenced to death. Falstaff took Coleville, the fourth of the rebel leaders, who was sentenced to execution with the others.

News of John's success was brought to King Henry as he lay dying, but the victory could not gladden the sad old king. His chief concern lay in advice and admonition to his younger sons, Gloucester and Clarence, regarding their future conduct, and he asked for unity among his sons. Spent by his long discourse, the king lapsed into unconsciousness.

Prince Henry, summoned to his dying father's bedside, found the king in a stupor, with the crown beside him. The prince, remorseful and compassionate, expressed regret that the king had lived such a tempestuous existence because of the crown and promised, in his turn, to wear the crown graciously. As he spoke, he placed the crown on his head and left the room. Awakening and learning that the prince had donned the crown, King Henry immediately assumed that his son wished him dead in order to inherit the kingdom. Consoled by the prince's strong denial of such wishful thinking, the king confessed his own unprincipled behavior in gaining the crown. Asking God's forgiveness, he repeated his plan to journey to the Holy Land to divert his subjects from revolt, and he advised the prince, when he should become king, to involve his powerful lords in wars with foreign powers, thereby relieving the country of internal strife.

The king's death caused great sorrow among those who loved him and to those who feared the prince, now Henry V. A short time before, the Lord Chief Justice, acting on the command of Henry IV, had alienated the prince by banishing Falstaff and his band, but the newly crowned king accepted the Chief Justice's explanation for his treatment of Falstaff and restored his judicial powers.

Falstaff was rebuked for his conduct by Henry who stated that he was no longer the person Falstaff had known him to be. Until the old knight learned to correct his ways, the king banished him, on pain of death, to a distance ten miles away from Henry's person. He promised, however, that if amends were made Falstaff would return by degrees to the king's good graces. Undaunted by that reproof, Falstaff explained to his cronies that he yet would make them great, that the king's reprimand was only a front, and that the king would send for him and in the secrecy of the court chambers they would indulge in their old foolishness and plan the advancement of Falstaff's followers.

Prince John, expressing his admiration for Henry's public display of his changed attitude, prophesied that England would be at war with France before a year had passed.

Critique:

Replete with political intrigue, courtly pomp, grandeur of battle, and the mystery of witchcraft, King Henry the Sixth, Part I, is typically Shakespearean historical drama. Also typical, but more flagrant than in most of the other history chronicles are the playwright's gross distortions and inaccuracies in historical detail. A distinguishing factor in the play is the fuller use of melodramatic devices to further character development in instances in which military prowess or statecraft are hardly adequate. Typical, atypical, or distinctive, Henry the Sixth is a rousing play, either in print or upon stage. It is a revision of an earlier drama, known by Shakespeare.

The Story:

The great nobles and churchmen of England gathered in Westminster Abbey for the state funeral of King Henry V, hero of Agincourt and conqueror of France. The eulogies of Gloster, Bedford, Exeter, and the Bishop of Winchester, profound and extensive, were broken off by messengers bringing reports of English defeat and failure in France, where the Dauphin, taking advantage of King Henry's illness, had raised the standards of revolt. The gravest defeat reported was the imprisonment of Lord Talbot, general of the English armies. Bedford swore to avenge his loss. Gloster said that he would also hasten military preparations and proclaim young Prince Henry, nine months old, King of England. The Bishop of Winchester, disgruntled because the royal dukes had asked neither his advice nor aid, planned to seize the king's person and ingratiate himself into royal favor.

In France, the Dauphin and his generals, discussing the conduct of the war, attempted to overwhelm the depleted English forces. Although outnumbered and without leaders, the English fought valiantly and tenaciously. Hope of victory came to the French, however, when the Bastard of Orleans brought to the Dauphin's camp a soldier-maid, Joan La Pucelle, described as a holy young girl with God-given visionary powers. The Dauphin's attempt to trick her was unsuccessful, for she recognized him although Reignier, Duke of Anjou, stood in the Dauphin's place. Next she vanquished the prince in a duel to which he challenged her in an attempt to test her military skill.

The followers of the Duke of Gloster and the Bishop of Winchester rioted in the London streets, as dissension between Church and State grew because of Winchester's efforts to keep Gloster from seeing young Henry. The Mayor of London proclaimed against the unseemly conduct of the rioters.

When the English and the French fought again, Lord Salisbury and Sir Thomas Gargrave, the English leaders, were killed by a gunner in ambush. Meanwhile Lord Talbot, greatly feared by the French, had been ransomed in time to take command of English forces in the siege of Orleans. Enraged by the death of Salisbury, Talbot fought heroically, on one occasion with La Pucelle herself. At last the English swarmed into the town and put the French to rout. Talbot ordered Salisbury's body to be carried into the public market place of Orleans as a token of his revenge for that lord's murder.

The Countess of Auvergne invited Lord Talbot to visit her in her castle. Fearing chicanery, Bedford and Burgundy tried to keep him from going into an enemy stronghold, but Talbot, as strong-willed as he was brave, ignored their pleas. He did whisper to his captain, however, certain instructions concerning his visit.

On his arrival at Auvergne Castle the countess announced that she was making him her prisoner in order to save France from further scourges. Talbot proved his wit by completely baffling the countess with double talk and by signaling his soldiers, who stormed the castle, ate the food and drank the wine, and then won the favor of the countess with their charming manners.

In addition to continued internal strife resulting from Gloster's and Winchester's personal ambitions, new dissension arose between Richard Plantagenet and the Earl of Somerset. Plantagenet and his followers chose a white rose as their symbol, Somerset and his supporters a red rose, and in the quarrel of these two men the disastrous Wars of the Roses began. In the meantime Edmund Mortimer, the rightful heir to the throne, who had been imprisoned when King Henry IV usurped the crown some thirty years before, was released from confinement. He urged his nephew, Richard Plantagenet, to restore the family to the rightful position the Plantagenets deserved.

Youthful King Henry VI, after making Plantagenet Duke of York, much to the displeasure of Somerset, was taken to France by Gloster and other lords to be crowned King of France. In Paris, Talbot's chivalry and prowess were rewarded when he was made Earl of Shrewsbury.

In preparation for the battle at Rouen, La Pucelle won Burgundy over to the cause of France by playing upon his vanity and appealing to what she termed his sense of justice. The immaturity of the king was revealed in his request that Talbot go to Burgundy and chastise him for his desertion.

The Duke of York and the Earl of Somerset finally brought their quarrel to the king, who implored them to be friendly for England's sake. He pointed out that disunity among the English lords would only weaken their stand in France. To show how petty he considered their differences he casually put on a red rose, the symbol of Somerset's faction, and explained that it was merely a flower and that he loved one of his rival kinsmen as much as the other. He appointed York a regent of France and ordered both him and Somerset to supply Talbot with men and supplies for battle. Then the king and his party returned to London.

The king's last assignment to his lords in France was Talbot's death knell; Somerset, refusing to send horses with which York planned to supply Talbot, accused York of self-aggrandizement. York, in turn, blamed Somerset for negligence. As their feud continued, Talbot and his son were struggling valiantly against the better-equipped, more fully manned French army at Bordeaux. After many skirmishes Talbot and his son were slain and the English suffered tremendous losses. Flushed with the triumph of their great victory, the French leaders planned to march on to Paris.

In England, meanwhile, there was talk of a truce, and the king agreed, after a moment of embarrassment because of his youth, to Gloster's proposal that Henry accept in marriage the daughter of the Earl of Armagnac, a man of affluence and influence in France. This alliance, designed to effect a friendly peace between the two countries, was to be announced in France by Cardinal Beaufort, former Bishop of Winchester, who, in sending money to the pope to pay for his cardinalship, stated that his ecclesiastical position gave him status equal to that of the loftiest peer. He threatened mutiny if Gloster ever tried to dominate him again. The king sent a jewel to seal the contract of betrothal.

The fighting in France dwindled greatly, with the English forces converging for one last weak stand. La Pucelle cast a spell and conjured up fiends to bolster her morale and to assist her in battle, but her appeal was to no avail, and York took her prisoner. Berated as a harlot and condemned as a witch by the English, La Pucelle pleaded for her life. At first she contended that her virgin blood would cry for vengeance at the gates of heaven. When this appeal failed to move York and the Earl of Warwick, she implored them to save her unborn child, fathered, she said variously, by the Dauphin, the Duke of Alençon, and the Duke of Anjou. She was condemned to be burned at the stake.

In another skirmish the Earl of Suffolk had taken as his prisoner Margaret, daughter of the Duke of Anjou. Enthralled by her loveliness, he was unable to claim her for himself because he was already married. He finally struck upon the notion of wooing Margaret for the king. After receiving her father's permission to present Margaret's name to Henry as a candidate for marriage, Suffolk went to London to petition the king. While Henry weighed the matter against the consequences of breaking his contract with the Earl of Armagnac, Exeter and Gloster attempted to dissuade him from following Suffolk's suggestions. Their pleas were in vain. Margaret's great courage and spirit, as described by Suffolk, held promise of a great and invincible offspring.

Terms of peace having been arranged, Suffolk was ordered to conduct Margaret to England. Suffolk, because he had brought Margaret and Henry together, planned to take advantage of his opportune political position and, through Margaret, rule youthful Henry and his kingdom.

Critique:

In addition to those features contained in the first part of King Henry the Sixth as described in the critique of that play, there are in this second part scenes reflecting social implications. These scenes, within the limits of the five acts, not only make clear the social strata of commoners and nobles but also point up the principal characters. This fuller realism of historical perspective and social content in no way diminishes the picture of ambition, jealousy, love, and courage among the nobility. As is true of the first part of King Henry the Sixth, this drama is a revision of an earlier play.

The Story:

The Earl of Suffolk, having arranged for the marriage of King Henry VI and Margaret of Anjou, brought the new queen to England. There was great indignation when the terms of the marriage treaty were revealed. The contract called for an eighteen-months' truce between the two countries, the outright gift of the duchies of Anjou and Maine to Reignier, Margaret's father, and omission of her dowry. As had been predicted earlier, no good could come of this union, since Henry, at Suffolk's urging, had broken his betrothal to the daughter of the Earl of Armagnac. But Henry, pleased by his bride's beauty, gladly accepted the treaty and elevated Suffolk, the go-between, to a dukedom.

The voices were hardly still from the welcome of the new queen before the lords, earls, and dukes were expressing their ambitions to gain more control in affairs of state. The old dissension between the Duke of Gloster and Cardinal Beaufort continued. The churchman tried to alienate others against Gloster by saying that Gloster, next in line for the crown, needed watching. The Duke of Somerset accused the cardinal of seeking Gloster's position for himself. And these high ambitions were not exclusively for the men. The Duchess of Gloster showed great impatience with her husband when he said he wished only to serve as Protector of the Realm. When she saw that her husband was not going to help her ambitions to be queen, the duchess hired Hume, a priest, to traffic with witches and conjurers in her behalf. Hume accepted her money; but he had already been hired by Suffolk and the cardinal to work against the duchess.

Queen Margaret's unhappy life in England, her contempt for the king, and the people's dislike for her soon became apparent. The mutual hatred she and the duchess had for each other showed itself in tongue lashings and blows. The duchess, eager to take advantage of any turn of events, indulged in sorcery with Margery Jourdain and the notorious Bolingbroke. Her questions to them, all pertaining to the fate of the king and his advisers, and the answers which these sorcerers had received from the spirit world, were confiscated by Buckingham and York when they broke in upon a seance. For her part in the practice of sorcery the duchess was banished to the Isle of Man; Margery Jourdain and Bolingbroke were executed.

His wife's deeds brought new slanders upon Gloster. In answer to Queen Margaret's charge that he was a party to his wife's underhandedness, Gloster, a broken man, resigned his position as Protector of the Realm. Even after his resignation Margaret continued in her attempts to turn the king against Gloster. She was aided by the other lords, who accused Gloster of deceit and crimes against the State; but the king, steadfast in his loyalty to Gloster, described the former protector as virtuous and mild.

York, whose regency in France had been given to Somerset, enlisted the aid of Warwick and Salisbury in his fight for the crown, his claim being based on the fact that King Henry's grandfather, Henry IV, had usurped the throne from York's great-uncle. Suffolk and the cardinal, to rid themselves of a dangerous rival, sent York to quell an uprising in Ireland. Before departing for Ireland, York planned to incite rebellion among the English through one John Cade, a headstrong, warmongering Kentishman. Cade, under the name of John Mortimer, the name of York's uncle, paraded his riotous followers through the streets of London. The rebels, irresponsible and unthinking, went madly about the town wrecking buildings, killing noblemen who opposed them, and shouting that they were headed for the palace, where John Cade, the rightful heir to the throne, would avenge the injustices done his lineage. An aspect of the poorly organized rebellion was shown in the desertion of Cade's followers when they were appealed to by loyal old Lord Clifford. He admonished them to save England from needless destruction and to expend their military efforts against France. Cade, left alone, went wandering about the countryside as a fugitive and was killed by Alexander Iden, a squire who was knighted for his bravery.

Gloster, arrested by Suffolk on a charge of high treason, was promised a fair trial by the king. This was unwelcome news to the lords; and when Gloster was sent for to appear at the hearing, he was found in his bed, brutally murdered and mangled. Suffolk and the cardinal had hired the murderers. So was fulfilled the first prophecy of the sorcerers, that the king would depose and outlive a duke who would die a violent death.

Shortly after Gloster's death the king was called to the bedside of the cardinal, who had been stricken by a strange malady. There King Henry heard the cardinal confess his part in the murder of Gloster, the churchman's bitterest enemy. The cardinal died unrepentent.

Queen Margaret became more outspoken concerning affairs of state, especially in those matters on behalf of Suffolk, and more openly contemptuous toward the king's indifferent attitude.

At the request of Commons, led by Warwick and Salisbury, Suffolk was banished from the country for his part in Gloster's murder. Saying their farewells, he and Margaret declared their love for each other. Suffolk, disguised, took ship to leave the country. Captured by pirates, he was beheaded for his treacheries and one of his gentlemen was instructed to return his body to the king.

In London, Queen Margaret mourned

her loss in Suffolk's death as she caressed his severed head. The king, piqued by her demonstration, asked her how she would react to his death. Diplomatically evasive, she answered that she would not mourn his death; she would die for him. The witch had prophesied Suffolk's death: she had said that he would die by water.

Returning from Ireland, York planned to gather forces on his way to London and seize the crown for himself. Because he also stated his determination to remove Somerset, his adversary in court matters, the king tried to appease the rebel by committing Somerset to the Tower. Hearing that his enemy was in prison, York ordered his army to disband.

His rage was all the greater, therefore, when he learned that Somerset had been restored to favor. The armies of York and Lancaster prepared to battle at Saint Albans, where Somerset, after an attempt to arrest York for capital treason, was slain by crookbacked Richard Plantagenet, York's son. Somerset's death fulfilled the prophecies of the witch, who had also foretold that Somerset should shun castles, that he would be safer on sandy plains. With his death the king and queen fled. Salisbury, weary from battle but undaunted, and Warwick, proud of York's victory at Saint Albans, pledged their support to York in his drive for the crown, and York hastened to London to forestall the king's intention to summon Parliament into session.

Critique:

Although the third part of King Henry the Sixth is not a tragedy in the classical sense, it is more poignant than many tragic dramas. A revision of an earlier play, it is an outstanding example of writing for unity of impression. Infinite and unswerving ambition in the characters, and situations of plot closely knit to reveal this unrelenting aggression are always apparent, making this play a masterpiece of gripping drama. The plot is so developed that King Henry is made a pawn to the wishes of others. The characterization is handled with finesse, an occasional line by King Henry showing his true nature. The labels frequently given him — "poltroon," "weak-willed," "willy-nilly"—are unjust and misapplied. Shakespeare's King Henry in this third part is a man caught in the mesh of circumstances and required to exhibit the qualities of leadership, when his only wish was for contentment and tranquility. Henry's was a life spent in quiet desperation.

The Story:

In the House of Parliament, York, his sons, and the Earl of Warwick rejoiced over their success at Saint Albans. Riding hard, the Yorkists had arrived in London ahead of the routed king, and Henry, entering with his lords, was filled with consternation when he saw York already seated on the throne, to which Warwick had conducted him. Some of the king's followers were sympathetic toward York and others were fearful of his power; the two attitudes resulted in defection in the royal ranks. Seeing his stand weakened, the king attempted to avert disorder by disinheriting his own son and by pledging the crown to York and his sons, on the condition that York stop the civil war and remain loyal to the king during his lifetime.

Annoyed by the reconciliation and contemptuous toward the king because of her son's disinheritance, Margaret deserted the king and raised her own army to protect her son's rights to the throne. The queen's army marched against York's castle as York was sending his sons to recruit forces for another rebellion. York's sons had persuaded their father that his oath to the king was not binding because his contract with the king had not been made in due course of law before a magistrate.

In a battle near Wakefield, Lord Clifford and his soldiers killed Rutland, York's young son, and soaked a handkerchief in his blood. Later, as he joined Margaret's victorious army, which outnumbered York's soldiers ten to one, Lord Clifford gave York the handkerchief to wipe away his tears as he wept for his son's death. York's sorrow was equaled by his humiliation at the hands of Margaret, who, after taking him prisoner, put a paper crown on his head that he might reign from the molehill where she had him placed to be jeered by the soldiers. Clifford and Margaret stabbed the Duke of York and beheaded him. His head was set on the gates of York.

Hearing of the defeat of York's forces, Warwick, taking the king with him, set out from London to fight Queen Margaret at Saint Albans. Warwick's qualities as a general were totally offset by the presence of the king, who was unable to conceal his strong affection for Margaret, and Warwick was defeated. Edward and Richard, York's sons, joined Warwick in a march toward London.

King Henry, ever the righteous monarch, forswore any part in breaking his vow to York and declared that he preferred to leave his son only virtuous deeds, rather than an ill-gotten crown. At the insistence of Clifford and Margaret, however, the king knighted his son as the Prince of Wales.

After a defiant parley, the forces met again between Towton and Saxton. The king, banned from battle by Clifford and Margaret because of his antipathy to war and his demoralizing influence on the soldiers, sat on a distant part of the field lamenting the course affairs had taken in this bloody business of murder and deceit. He saw the ravages of war when a father bearing the body of his dead son and a son with the body of his dead father passed by. They had unknowingly taken the lives of their loved ones in the fighting. As the rebel forces, led by Warwick, Richard, and Edward approached, the king, passive to danger and indifferent toward his own safety, was rescued by the Prince of Wales and Margaret before the enemy could reach him. He was sent to Scotland for safety.

After a skirmish with Richard, Clifford fled to another part of the field, where, weary and worn, he fainted and died. His head, severed by Richard, replaced York's head on the gate. The Yorkists marched on to London. Edward was proclaimed King Edward IV; Richard was made Duke of Gloster, and George, Duke of Clarence.

King Edward, in audience, heard Lady Grey's case for the return of confiscated lands taken by Margaret's army at Saint Albans, where Lord Grey was killed fighting for the York cause. The hearing, marked by Richard's and George's dissatisfaction with their brother's position and Edward's lewdness directed at Lady Grey, ended with Lady Grey's betrothal to Edward. Richard, resentful of his humpback, aspired to the throne. His many deprivations resulting from his physical condition, he felt, justified his ambition; he would stop at no obstacle in achieving his ends.

Because of their great losses, Margaret and the prince went to France to appeal for aid from King Louis XI, who was kindly disposed toward helping them maintain the crown. The French monarch's decision was quickly changed at the appearance of Warwick, who had arrived from England to ask for the hand of Lady Bona for King Edward. Warwick's suit had been granted, and Margaret's request denied, when a messenger brought letters announcing King Edward's marriage to Lady Grey. King Louis and Lady Bona were insulted; Margaret was overjoyed. Warwick, chagrined, withdrew his allegiance to the House of York and offered to lead French troops against Edward. He promised his older daughter in marriage to Margaret's son as a pledge of his honor.

At the royal palace in London, family loyalty was broken by open dissent when King Edward informed his brothers that he would not be bound by their wishes. Told that the prince was to marry Warwick's older daughter, the Duke of Clarence announced that he intended to marry the younger one. He left, taking Somerset, one of King Henry's faction, with him. Richard, seeing in an alliance with Edward an opportunity for his own advancement, remained; and he, Montague, and Hastings pledged their support to King Edward.

When the French forces reached London, Warwick took Edward prisoner. The king-maker removed Edward's crown and took it to re-crown King Henry, who had, in the meantime, escaped from Scotland, only to be delivered into Edward's hands and imprisoned in the Tower. Henry delegated his royal authority to Warwick and the Duke of Clarence, in order that he might be free from the turmoil attendant upon his reign.

Richard and Hastings freed Edward from his imprisonment. They formed an army in York; and while Warwick and Clarence, who had learned of Edward's release, were making preparations for defense, Edward, marching upon London, again seized King Henry and sent him to solitary confinement in the Tower.

Edward made a surprise attack on Warwick near Coventry, where Warwick's forces were soon increased by the appearance of Oxford, Montague, and Somerset. The fourth unit to join Warwick was led by Clarence who took the red rose, the symbol of the House of Lancaster, from his hat and threw it into Warwick's face. Clarence accused Warwick of duplicity and announced that he would fight beside his brothers to preserve the House of York. Warwick, a valiant soldier to the end, was wounded by King Edward and died soon afterward. Montague was also killed.

When Queen Margaret and her son arrived from France, the prince won great acclaim from Margaret and the lords for his spirited vow to hold the kingdom against the Yorkists. Defeated at Tewkesbury, however, the prince was cruelly stabbed to death by King Edward and his brothers. Margaret pleaded with them to kill her too, but they chose to punish her with life. She was sent back to France, her original home. After the prince had been killed, Richard of Gloster stole off to London, where he assassinated King Henry in the Tower. Again he swore to get the crown for himself.

The Yorkists were at last supreme. Edward and Queen Elizabeth, with their infant son, regained the throne. Richard, still intending to seize the crown for himself, saluted the infant with a Judas kiss, while Edward stated that they were now to spend their time in stately triumphs, comic shows, and pleasures of the court.

A High Wind Rising deals with a phase of American history which most writers have neglected. It is a story of the Pennsylvania settlements beyond the Schuylkill during the decisive years when French and English battled for control of the Ohio and Conrad Weiser helped to determine the fate of a continent by keeping the Six Nations loyal to their British allies. The writer brings the period dramatically to life in her characterizations of pioneers like Conrad Weiser and Sebastian Schantz, of frontier women like resourceful, devoted Anna Sabilla. Those people live with no self-conscious sense of national destiny, as do so many pioneers in lesser fiction. Their lives illustrate what must have been the daily life of the frontier, the hardships and dangers that they faced no more than a part of their everyday existence. Other figures great in Pennsylvania annals are more briefly viewed in this crowded canvas of people and events—Benjamin Franklin, James Logan, John Bertram, Henry Melchior Muhlenburg, Lewis Evans. The passing of time and the pressures of history shape the plot, but the story itself is as simple and realistic as homely family legend. The novel is an example of the historical chronicle at its best.

The Story:

In 1728, Conrad Weiser, white clan brother of the Mohawks, saw Ockwariowira—Young Bear—for the first time, a naked small boy daubed with clay and running wild in Chief Quagnant's village. Weiser, his quick eye seeing pale skin under the dirt and grease, bartered for the child and took him back to the German settlement at Schoharie. Young Bear was baptized Johann Sebastian, and found in Anna Eve, Conrad's wife, a second mother. The Weisers believed that Bastian was the grandson of Anna Sabilla Schantz, whose daughter Margaretta had followed an English trader into the forest.

Many of the Schoharie community were preparing to move to Pennsylvania, where there was rich land for thrifty, industrious German settlers. Anna Sabilla had already gone to her own cabin in a clearing beside the Blue Mountains. Sturdy, resolute, she cared for Nicholas, her paralyzed brother, tended her garden, called all Indians thieves and rascals, but fed them when they begged at her door. For trader Israel Fitch she carved wooden puppets in exchange for salt, cloth, tools. Weiser took Bastian to her when he went to claim his own lands along the Tulpehocken.

Growing up, Bastian helped his grandmother with plantings and harvests. From Skelet, a sickly, humpbacked Indian whom Anna Sabilla had nursed back to health, he learned the ways of animals and the deep woods. When old Nicholas died, Bastian moved into his room. Tall and strong for his age, he was the man of the family at fourteen.

The chiefs' road ran through the clearing, and along the trail Delawares and Iroquois traveled to and from the treaty councils in Philadelphia. Bastian knew them all—old Sassoonan of the Delawares, loyal Shekellimy, Weiser's friend, who ruled the Delawares for the Six Nations, Seneca, Oneida, and Mohawk spokesmen—and they remembered Ockwariowira. Sharp-tongued Anna Sabilla grumbled when he talked with them in their own tongues, but she raised few objections when he went with Weiser and the chiefs to Philadelphia for the great council of 1736.

The city was finer than Bastian had ever imagined it. Whenever he could, he left the State House and wandered through the streets and along the waterfront. He saw a shipload of German immigrants and among them a black-haired girl whose parents had died at sea. Because she had no one to pay her passage, her eyes were like those of a hurt deer, and he gave all his money to a kindly couple who offered to look after her. Bastian heard only that her name was Otilia before a runner from Weiser summoned him to the council. He went back to look for her later, but the immigrants had gone.

Anna Sabilla hinted that Anna Maria, Weiser's daughter, or the Heils' blonde Sibby would have him quickly enough, but Bastian remembered black hair and dark eyes. Tramping from clearing to clearing looking for her, he found some passengers from the ship who remembered that she had gone away with a family named Wilhelm. Again he went to Philadelphia for a treaty council. There Weiser found the girl's name on a ship's list—Otilia Zimmer. Bastian's search led him to John Bartram, the Quaker naturalist, along the Schuylkill, beyond the Blue Mountains. Nowhere did he get word of Otilia or the Wilhelms. Anna Maria Weiser became engaged to marry Henry Melchior Muhlenburg, a young pastor.

Anna Sabilla shook her head over Bastian; in her old age she wanted the comfort of another woman and children in the cabin.

The chiefs of the Six Nations and delegates from Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia met in Lancaster in 1744. Weiser was there because he was needed to hold the Long House in friendly alliance, Bastian because, as the years passed, Weiser counted greatly on his help. The weather was hot, the noise deafening. Weiser and Bastian went to a small inn to escape feasting Indians. The waitress had black hair and dark eyes. She was Ottilia, and she rode home with Bastian when the conference ended. Hump-backed Skelet ran ahead to tell Anna Sabilla that Bastian had found his squaw.

Settlers were moving beyond the Susquehanna. While Delawares and Shewanese signed treaties with the French, Weiser worked to keep the Long House neutral. Bastian went with him to Logstown on the Ohio, where Tanacharison and Scarouady promised to keep their tribes friendly toward the English. As Bastian rode home, neighbors called to him to hurry. In the kitchen of the cabin Anna Sabilla rocked a cradle in which slept the newborn *zwilling*s, Margaretta and Gertraud. At last, said Anna Sabilla, they were a real family.

But winds of violence blew from the west. Weiser gave presents at Aughwick, at Carlisle, but his arguments, feasts, and gifts could not hold the Shewanese and the Delawares, angry because their hunting grounds had been taken from them. General Braddock, marching to force the French from the Ohio, was ambushed. Fitch, the trader, brought word of burnings and killings beyond the mountains. Because Pennsylvania lay open to war parties of French and Indians, Bastian was glad when Fitch decided to stay; another man might be needed if Indians appeared on the Tulpehocken.

Bastian had gone to help a sick neighbor when the raiders struck, burning the cabin and barn and leaving Fitch's body where it fell. Anna Sabilla, Ottilia, and the twins were gone. Pretending ferocity, Skelet had taken a small part of Ottilia's scalp and left her unconscious. Anna Sabilla and the twins he took with him to Kitanning, calling Anna Sabilla his squaw. She was indignant, but she realized that his claims kept her alive and the twins safe.

Reviving, Ottilia wandered through the woods for days in company with a small boy whose parents had been killed and scalped. At last, with other fugitives, she made her way to the Moravian settlement at Bethlehem. There Bastian found her on his journey back from Philadelphia, where he and other settlers had gone to demand the formation of militia units and forts to protect the frontier. Leaving Ottilia with the Weisers, he joined the garrison at Fort Henry, built where Anna Sabilla's cabin had once stood.

One night he and a friend captured a young Frenchman who carried the carved figure of a little girl, and Bastian, recognizing Anna Sabilla's work, concluded that she and the twins were still alive. He joined a raiding party marching on Kitanning, but Anna Sabilla and the little girls were not among the white prisoners freed in the attack.

Anna Sabilla and the twins were already on the way home. Knowing that Skelet was vain and greedy, she promised money if he would guide them back to the settlements. They set out, Skelet dreaming of the rum and finery he would buy with the old woman's gold. Then, worn out by hardships on the trail, he died on the ridge above her own clearing.

Suddenly Anna Sabilla smelled chimney smoke, heard voices. She ran, urging the girls before her. Safe within the stockade, and grateful, she declared that the old humpback had been a rascal but that he had been helpful. She intended to bury him among her people.

LUCIAN TAYLOR, a would-be author

THE REVEREND MR. TAYLOR, Lucian's father, a rural clergyman

ANNIE MORGAN, Lucian's sweetheart

Critique:

This novel by Arthur Machen, in part an autobiography, received little notice when it was published. During the 1920's, after Machen's books had won him a reputation, this novel also came in for a share of attention and popularity. Machen himself said, in the introduction to a later edition of the book, that he had begun it as proof to the world and to himself that he was indeed a man of letters and that, even more important, he had thrown off the style of Robert Louis Stevenson, whom he had been accused of imitating, and had found a style of his own to express his ideas. He also related that the writing of the novel was imbedded in the work itself: that many of the trials and weird experiences which have been put into the life of the fictional Lucian Taylor were, in reality, the experiences of Machen himself as he wrote the novel. This novel will probably never be a popular one, for it is a somewhat difficult study of a highly introverted character, a man who, while searching for a way to express life, lost both himself and the power to understand humanity. Although such studies are too intense and yet too nebulous to appeal to a widely diversified body of readers, the book is likely to stand as a notable example of its type.

The Story:

Lucian Taylor, son of an Anglican rector in a rural parish, was an extraordinary lad, even before he went to school.

He was both studious and reflective, so much so that he was not accepted readily by the boys of the neighborhood. When Lucian went away to school he did very well in his studies, but he formed an acute dislike for athletics and for social life with his fellow students. In his studies he turned toward the less material, preferring to learn of the dim Celtic and Roman days of Britain, of medieval church history, and of works in magic.

In his fifteenth year Lucian returned to his home during the August holidays and found it quite changed. His mother had died during the previous year, and his father's fortunes had sunk lower and lower. As a result his father had become exceedingly moody and Lucian spent much of his time away from the house. His habit was to wander through the rolling countryside by himself.

One bright summer afternoon he climbed up a steep hillside to the site of an old Roman fort. The site was at some distance from any human habitation, and Lucian felt quite alone. Because of the heat, he had an impulse to strip off his sweaty clothing and take a nap. He did, only to be awakened by someone kissing him. By the time he had fully regained his senses, the unknown person had disappeared. Lucian was not sure whether some supernatural being or Annie Morgan, daughter of a local farmer, had awakened him thus.

Soon afterward Lucian went back to school. At last the rector told his son that he could no longer afford to send him to school and that matriculation at Oxford was out of the question. Lucian was disappointed, but he settled down to studying in his father's library or wandering about the countryside in solitary fashion, as he had done during his vacations from school.

As the elder Taylor's fortunes had declined, his popularity in the parish had diminished. Lucian's own reputation had never been high, and his failure to take a job in some respectable business establishment turned the local gentry against him. Everyone felt that his studies and his attempts to write were foolish, since they brought in no money. Nor could the people understand Lucian's failure to maintain their standards of respectability in dress and deportment.

Lucian felt, however, that he could stand beyond such criticism of his habits, but his self-respect suffered a blow when he tried to sell some of his writings. Publishers, refusing to accept his work, pointed out to him that what they wanted was sentimental fiction of a stereotyped kind. Lucian, not wishing to cheapen himself or his literary efforts, refused to turn out popular fiction of the type desired. He felt that he had to express himself in a graver kind of literature.

Lucian's social and intellectual loneliness preyed upon him, plunging him at times into the deepest despair. One afternoon, while sunk in a mood of depression, he went out for a long walk. By dusk he was far from home, or so he thought, and in the midst of a wood. Finally fighting his way clear of the dense brush, Lucian blundered onto a path and there met Annie Morgan. She sensed his mood and fell in with it. Both of them announced their love and pledged one another. Lucian went home feeling better than he had in months.

As the days passed Lucian fell into the habit of putting himself in a world apart, a world of the past, when Rome held Britain as a distant province. He dreamed that the modern town of Caermaen, near which was his father's rectory, was once again the Roman settlement it had been centuries before. Lucian called his land of make-believe Avallaunius and spent most of his time there, peopling it with men and women, buildings and customs, that he had learned of through his exhaustive studies of Roman times in Britain. He went wandering through the modern town, imagining that the people he met and the scenes before his eyes were those of ancient times. Even Annie Morgan's announcement that she was going away made little impression upon him, for he felt that she had accomplished her mission in his life by showing him how to escape into a better world.

People wondered at the strange behavior of the young man; even his father, not given to noticing anything, became worried because Lucian ate little and grew thin. People who knew him only by sight suspected him of being a drunkard because of his odd behavior and absent-mindedness.

But at last Lucian escaped physically from Caermaen; he received notice that a distant cousin who had lived on the Isle of Wight had died and left him two thousand pounds. He immediately gave five hundred pounds to his father and invested the remainder for himself. With the assurance of a small, regular income, Lucian left Caermaen behind and went to London. There he felt he could escape from the moodiness which had held him prisoner in the country. He also hoped that the different mental atmosphere would prove helpful to him in his attempts at writing.

Upon his arrival in the city Lucian found himself a single room in a private home. He soon settled down to a regular existence, writing late each night, sleeping late in the morning, reading over his work of the night before, and walking, in the afternoons. His meals were sketchy, for he was forced to live on as little as fifteen shillings a week. But the regular schedule was not to hold for long. His inspiration was not a regular thing, and Lucian felt that he had to make his writings perfection itself. He threw away as much as he wrote. Disappointment over his efforts soon began to drive him into worse moods than he had known before.

Having been impressed as a boy by the work of De Quincey in Confessions of an English Opium Eater, Lucian turned to that drug for solace and inspiration. After he began taking drugs, he knew little that was going on in the world about him. He spent much of his time lying quietly in his room and reliving the past in visions. Once he had a real inspiration to write; his story about an amber goddess was the product of true imagination. But publication of the story did little to generate ambition and the will to create; he was too far gone in his addiction to opium.

A heavy snow and a severe wave of cold struck London and southern England, but the weather made little impression on him; he might just as well have been living in a ghost city. Then one night he took too much opium. His landlady, not hearing him stir for many hours, looked into his room and found him dead at his desk, his writings spread about him. Even she felt little sorrow for him, although he had made over his small fortune to her.

HILLINGDON HALL

Type of work: Novel

Author: Robert Smith Surtees (1803-1864)

Type of plot: Comic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1845

Principal characters:

JOHN JORROCKS, a wealthy cockney grocer and sportsman

MRS. JORROCKS, his shrewish wife

EMMA FLATHER, a country girl

MRS. FLATHER, her mother

THE DUKE OF DONKEYTON, Jorrocks' neighbor

THE MARQUIS OF BRAY, his son

Critique:

Hillingdon Hall, Or, The Cockney Squire is the final novel of the Jorrocks series. Here the emphasis is on country life and its charms and oddities. John Jorrocks, a London grocer turned sporting country proprietor and agriculturist, is less a clown than he was in previous volumes, although he does meet with many undignified adventures; and the whole tone of the book is more sympathetic than picaresque. There is some good satire in the electioneering scenes and in Emma Flather's attempts to get a husband, and some current farming fads come in for good-natured ridicule. Hillingdon Hall is one of the better constructed works in the series, and the cockney speech, as in all of Surtees' work, is accurately represented.

The Story:

Hillingdon Hall was a charming example of the old-style manor house with its many haphazard additions and types of architecture. It was set in a pretty village and the nearby river added to its attractions. Mr. Westbury, the former owner, had been an old-fashioned gentleman of talent and learning who spent his whole time in the country. Since he was a kind of patriarch for the district, the village wondered after his death who would be the new owner of the hall.

When the carriage drew up at the door, curious eyes were fastened on the new arrivals. The chaise was covered with dust. A package of apple trees lay on the roof, the coach boy clutched a huge geranium, and flowers and plants of all kinds were sticking out of the windows. A huge, fat man with roses in his back pocket got out, followed by his wife in stiff brocade. John Jorrocks, the new owner, had arrived.

Mrs. Flather announced the news to her blooming daughter Emma. The two ladies thought it would be only neighborly for them to call right away, especially since there might be a son in the family. Emma at the time had an understanding with James Blake, who had the living at Hillingdon, but she was always on the alert for a better match. Mrs. Trotter, who was, if anything, quicker at gossip than Mrs. Flather, brought the news that Jorrocks was old and married and had no children.

Jorrocks tried hard to be a good gentleman farmer. He visited his tenants faithfully but found them a poor lot. They could scarcely understand his cockney accent and they were full of complaints; besides, they knew much more than he did about farming. Mrs. Jorrocks got on better at first with her country folk. Traditionally the lady of Hillingdon Hall was the patroness of the local school. When she visited the establishment, she was appalled at the drab uniforms worn by the girls. Forthwith she had a friend in London, an actress, design new costumes in the Swiss mode. These she forced on the protesting girls. Unfortunately, when she had a new sign put up at the school the spelling was bad; it announced to the world that the institution was "founder'd" by Julia Jorrocks.

One memorable day a magnificent coach drove up and an impressive footman left a card from the Duke of Donkeyton. The duke fancied himself as a politician. Thinking that Jorrocks might become a person of standing, and feeling sure that he must be a Whig, the duke wanted to make certain of his allegiance. The Jorrockses were still more astounded to receive an invitation to dine and stay the night at Donkeyton. Although much puzzled by the initials R. S. V. P., Jorrocks wrote a formal acceptance. Mrs.

Flather and Emma were also invited, but characteristically they were thinking of the duke's son, the Marquis of Bray, as a possible suitor for Emma.

On the way to Donkeyton, Jorrocks contrived to get in the same carriage with Mrs. Flather and squeezed that poor lady and stole a kiss or two. He continued his boisterous tactics at the castle. The duke was much impressed by Jorrocks' appetite for food and drink. After dinner he made the mistake of trying to keep up with Jorrocks in drinking toasts; consequently, he had to retire early and was unable to appear in time for breakfast.

The elegant and effeminate Marquis of Bray was quite taken with Emma. He fell in with a scheme that Jorrocks and the duke had for founding an agricultural society with Bray as president and Jorrocks as vice-president. He readily agreed to come to an organizational meeting, since there he would see Emma again.

The meeting was a great success. Bray was horrified at the amount of food put away by Jorrocks and his farmers, but he did his best to keep up appearances. Jorrocks' speech sounded good, although some of the farmers did not follow him very well. He advocated the growing of pineapples and the making of drain tile with sugar as the principal ingredient. Bray topped off the occasion by a speech lauding the ancient Romans. Afterward he was able to visit Emma and capture that girl's willing heart.

For some time Jorrocks had had as estate manager a jack-of-all-trades named Joshua Sneakington—Sneak for short. After he had arranged for fees and bribes to add to his income, Sneak thought himself well off. One morning, however, Jorrocks rose very early and decided to make a tour of inspection. In a secluded spot he came upon Sneak netting pheasants. Furious at the trickery, he had Sneak sent to jail. His new manager was a doughty North Countryman, James Pigg, who had been with Jorrocks at Handley Cross.

The duke showed favor to Jorrocks by giving him a prize bull, which won a ribbon at a fair, and by appointing him magistrate. Bray came again to visit, mostly to see Emma, but Jorrock's dragged him off to a rough farmers' masquerade. Bray, who was a slender youth, made the mistake of dressing as a woman. A loutish farmer who would not be put off tried to kiss him. The boisterous treatment startled Bray so much that he wandered off in the night and got lost. He came upon a sleeping household and, after awaking the inhabitants, found he had blundered on the Flather's house. After staying the night with the family, he had a chance to flirt with Emma at breakfast.

After that adventure Emma and her mother confidently expected an offer from Donkeyton. When no word came, the desperate Mrs. Flather herself went to the castle. The duchess was amused at the idea of her son's marriage with a commoner, but the duke was incensed; he knew that Bray had conducted himself properly, for he had read Chesterfield. The son had no voice in the matter at all. Later Emma and her mother had to admit he had never made an outright profession of love.

The member of Parliament from the district died. The duke immediately sent out a bid for Bray to fill the vacancy, and no opposition was expected. The Anti-

Corn-Law League wrote several times to Bray asking his stand on repeal of the grain tariff, but Bray knew nothing of the matter and did not reply. Thereupon the League put up its own candidate, Bill Bowker, a grifting friend of Jorrock's. To avoid a campaign, the duke bought off Bowker for a thousand pounds and endorsed the proposals of the League.

It was a shocking thing for the duke to advocate removal of tariffs on grain. When next the farmers tried to sell their produce at market, they found that prices had tumbled. In their anger they put forth the willing Jorrock's as their candidate. The duke was hurt that a man to whom he had given a bull and whom he had elevated to a magistracy should run against his son, but Jorrock's was obdurate. At the hustings, although the Marquis of Bray won, Jorrock's supporters demanded a poll.

The farmers all worked to get every eligible voter to vote. Pigg was a little tricky because he persuaded the Quakers to vote for Jorrock's on the grounds that his candidate was a teetotaler. When the votes were counted, Jorrock's won by a margin of two. Elated at beating a marquis, and glad to go back to London, Jorrock's left Pigg in charge of Hillingdon Hall and went on to bigger things.

HIPPOLYTUS

Type of work: Drama

Author: Euripides (480-406 B.C.)

Type of plot: Classical tragedy

Time of plot: Remote antiquity

Locale: Troezen in Argolis

First presented: 428 B.C.

Principal characters:

THESEUS, King of Athens

HIPPOLYTUS, son of Theseus and Hippolyta, Queen of the Amazons

PHAEDRA, wife of Theseus

APHRODITE, goddess of physical love

ARTEMIS, goddess of spiritual love

Critique:

The Hippolytus is probably one of the most provocative of Greek tragedies, and Phaedra, despite her comparatively brief appearance in the play, is one of the most pitiful of tragic heroines. Hippolytus himself is an insufferable prig; but because Phaedra and Theseus are victims of relentless fate our sympathies go out to them. It has been said that this play is Euripides' dramatic treatment of the conflict in the human between physical and spiritual love, although this theory may attribute too much importance to the traditional rivalry between Aphrodite and Artemis in Greek mythology. Racine treated this story in the baroque manner in his Phèdre.

The Story:

Aphrodite, goddess of physical love, became angry because Hippolytus, offspring of an illicit union between Theseus and Hippolyta, Queen of the Amazons, alone among the citizens of Troezen refused to do her homage. Instead, the youth, tutored by holy Pittheus, honored Artemis, goddess of the chase and of spiritual love. To punish him for his disdain of love and marriage, Aphrodite, jealous of Artemis and incensed at his neglect of her altars, vowed revenge: she would reveal to Theseus the love his wife, Phaedra, had for her stepson.

Some time before, Hippolytus had gone to the country of Pandion to be initiated into the holy mysteries. There Phaedra, seeing him, had fallen in love with the handsome youth, and because her heart was filled with longing she had dedicated a temple to the Cyprian goddess. Poseidon, ruler of the sea, had once promised Theseus that three of his prayers to the sea god should be answered. Through that promise Aphrodite planned to accomplish her revenge.

Now it happened that Theseus had killed a kinsman, and as punishment for his crime he had been exiled for a year in Troezen. There Phaedra, who had accompanied her husband when he left Athens, was unhappy in her secret love for the young huntsman.

Hippolytus, returning from the chase, paid his respects with song and garlands before the altar of Artemis. Reminded by a servant that an image of Aphrodite stood nearby, he answered impatiently that he acknowledged the power of the Cyprian goddess, but from afar. Dedicated to chastity, he had no desire to become her devotee. The attendant, after Hippolytus had left the shrine, asked Aphrodite to indulge the young man's foolish pride.

Phaedra, meanwhile, moped in her hopeless passion for the young prince, so much so that her servants expressed deep concern over her illness and wondered what strange malady affected her. A nurse, alarmed at Phaedra's restiveness and petulance, was the most concerned of all. When her mistress expressed a desire to hunt wild beasts in the hills and to gallop horses on the sands, the nurse decided that Phaedra was light-headed because she had not eaten food for three days.

At last the nurse swore by the Amazon queen who had borne Theseus a son that Phaedra would be a traitor to her own children if she let herself sicken and die. At the mention of Hippolytus' name Phaedra started; then she moaned pitifully. Thinking how horrible it was that she had been stricken with love for her husband's son, she bewailed the unnatural passions of her Cretan house. At the nurse's urging she finally confessed her true feelings for her stepson. The nurse, frightened at the thought of the consequences possible because of that sinful passion, was horrified. The attendants mourned at what the future seemed to hold for all concerned. Phaedra told them that she was determined to take her own life in order to preserve her virtue and to save Theseus from shame.

But the nurse, having reconsidered, advised her mistress to let matters take a natural course; she would offend Aphrodite if she were to resist her love for Hippolytus. Phaedra was quite scandalized, however, when the nurse suggested that she even see Hippolytus. The nurse said that she had a love charm that would end Phaedra's malady. As it turned out, the potion was ineffectual without a word from Hippolytus' mouth or an item of his clothing or personal belongings.

Phaedra's attendants melodically invoked Aphrodite not to look askance upon them in their concern for their mistress.

The nurse, eager to aid the lovesick woman, went to Hippolytus and told him of Phaedra's love. The young huntsman, shocked, rebuked the nurse for a bawd and expressed his dislike for all mortal woman-kind. Phaedra, having overheard her stepson's angry reproaches and his condemnation of all women, feared that her secret would be revealed. To make Hippolytus suffer remorse for her death, she hanged herself.

Theseus, who had been away on a journey, returned to discover that Phaedra had taken her life. Grief-stricken, he became enraged when he read a letter clenched in his dead wife's hand. In it she wrote that Hippolytus had caused her death by his attempts to ravish her. Wild with sorrow and rage, Theseus called upon Poseidon to grant the first of his requests: he asked the god to destroy Hippolytus that very day. His attendants, shocked, implored him to be calm, to consider the welfare of his house, and to withdraw his request.

Hippolytus, returning at that moment, encountered his father and was mystified by the passionate words of Theseus. Standing over the body of his dead wife, the king reviled his bastard son and showed him the letter Phaedra had written. Hippolytus, proudly defending his innocence, said that he had never looked with carnal desire upon any woman. Theseus, refusing to believe his son's protestations, banished the young man from his sight. Hippolytus departed, still insisting to his friends that he was the purest of mortals.

Going down to the seashore, Hippolytus entered his chariot after invoking Zeus to strike him dead if he had sinned. As he drove along the strand, on the road leading to Argos, an enormous wave rose out of the sea and from the whirling waters emerged a savage, monstrous bull whose bellowing echoed along the shore. The horses drawing Hippolytus' chariot panicked and ran away, the bull in pursuit. Suddenly one of the chariot wheels struck a rock and the car overturned. Hippolytus, dragged across the rocks, was mortally injured.

Theseus, learning with indifference that his son still lived, consented to have him brought back to the palace. While he waited, Artemis appeared and told him of his son's innocence and of Phaedra's guilty passion for Hippolytus. Aphrodite, she declared, had contrived the young hunter's death to satisfy her anger at his neglect of her shrines.

Hippolytus, his body maimed and broken, was carried on a litter into his father's presence. Still maintaining his innocence, he moaned with shameless self-pity and lamented that one so pure and chaste should meet death because of his frightened horses. They were, he said, the principal means by which he had always honored Artemis, goddess of the hunt. When she told him that Aphrodite had caused his death, he declared that he, his father, and Artemis were all victims of the Cyprian's evil designs.

Knowing the truth at last, Hippolytus, humbled, took pity on broken-hearted Theseus and forgave his father for his misunderstanding and rage. Theseus, arising from the side of the dead prince, miserably faced the prospect of living on after causing the destruction of his innocent, beloved son.

THE HISTORY OF COLONEL JACQUE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Daniel Defoe (1661?-1731)

Type of plot: Picaresque adventure

Time of plot: Late seventeenth century

Locale: England, France, Virginia

First published: 1722

Principal characters:

COLONEL JACQUE, commonly called Jack, a waif

CAPTAIN JACK, his foster brother

MAJOR JACK, another foster brother

WILL, a pickpocket

COLONEL JACQUE'S FOUR WIVES

Critique:

Although in our day Daniel Defoe is remembered chiefly for Robinson Crusoe, in its own time Colonel Jacques attained great popularity. Defoe declared that his twofold purpose was to show the ruination of youth through lack of proper training and to prove that a misspent life may be redeemed by repentance. The novel opens on a theme similar to that of Oliver Twist but follows a line of development modeled after Gil Blas. Although a rogue, Colonel Jacques aspires to win back his good name, and in the end he succeeds. Defoe, in the fashion of his day, gave the novel a grandiose title: The History and Remarkable life of the truly Honourable Colonel Jacques, vulgarly called Col. Jack, who was born a Gentleman, put 'Prentice to a Pick-pocket, flourished six and twenty years as a Thief, and was then Kidnapped to Virginia; came back a Merchant, was five times married to four Whores, went into the Wars, behaved bravely, got preferment, was made Colonel of a Regiment, came over and fled with the Chevalier, is still Abroad Completing a Life of Wonders, and resolves to die a General. The end of the novel does not fulfill, however, the promise of the title.

The Story:

The illegitimate son of a gentleman and a lady, Colonel Jack, as he was later known, was early in his life given to his nurse to rear. There he was brought up with her own son, Captain Jack, and another unwanted child, Major Jack. She treated the boys well, but she herself had little money and so they were forced to fend for themselves. When Colonel Jack was but ten years of age, the good woman died, leaving the three boys to beg their food. Lodging did not bother them; they slept in ash piles and doorways in the winter and on the ground in summer. Captain Jack soon turned to picking pockets for a living and was so successful that he took Colonel Jack into partnership. The two young rogues preyed on wealthy men who were careless of their money. One of the boys would take the money, extracting only a small note from the whole; then the other would return the rest to its rightful owner and collect a reward for its return. One of the men thus duped was so grateful to honest-seeming Colonel Jack that upon the return of his wallet he agreed to keep the reward money for the boy and pay him interest on it. Since Colonel Jack had no place to keep the stolen goods safely, he had asked the gentleman to do him that service. Later Colonel Jack took more stolen money to the same man for safe-keeping and received his note for the whole amount, to be paid only to Colonel Jack himself. In fairness let it be said that after the scamps had robbed a poor woman of all her savings, Colonel Jack was so ashamed that he later returned her money with interest.

Captain Jack, a real villain, was apprehended and taken to Newgate Prison. Colonel Jack then became a partner of a thief named Will, a really vicious rogue who plundered and robbed and at last killed. He also was caught and taken to Newgate to be hanged, a fate which Colonel Jack knew Will deserved but which made his heart sick and his own conscience a heavy burden.

Captain Jack escaped from prison. Colonel Jack being also in danger because of his deeds, the two journeyed to Scotland. They were almost caught many times, but on each occasion Captain Jack's foresight enabled them to elude capture. When they were ready to return to England, they took work on a ship bound for London, or so they thought. Since they were deserters from the army, which they had joined to save their skins, they could not afford to risk regular means of travel. But the two who had cheated so many were themselves duped. Instead of sailing for England, they found themselves on the high seas bound for America and servitude. Colonel Jack, knowing himself for a villain, accepted his fate calmly, but Captain Jack stormed against it. The defiant Captain Jack abused his master, escaped back to England, resumed his old ways, and some twenty years later was hanged.

In Virginia, Colonel Jack was the property of a good master who told him that after he had served five years he would be freed and given a small piece of land. Thus, if he were industrious and honest, he might benefit from his ill fate. Jack, respecting his master, worked diligently for him. Soon he was made an overseer, and his kind heart and keen mind were responsible for changing the Negro slaves from rebellious fiends to loyal workers. His master was so fond of Jack that he bought for him a small plantation nearby and lent him the money to supply it. He also arranged for Jack to secure his money left in keeping in London. The money was converted into goods for the plantation, goods which were lost at sea. The master offered Jack his freedom before the five years were up, but Jack was loyal and continued to serve his master until that gentleman's death.

Jack's plantation prospered. The original two slaves given to him by his old master were increased by several more slaves and bonded white workers. Jack, always a kind master, won the loyalty of his workmen. Wanting to improve his education, for he could neither read nor write, he took one of his bonded men as a tutor and soon grew to admire him as he himself had been admired by his former master.

Resolving to return to England after an absence of almost twenty years, he tried to get his tutor to travel with him. When the man refused, Jack made him the overseer of his large plantations. It was some time before Jack arrived in his native land. He was first tossed about at sea, then captured by the French, and at last exchanged for a prisoner held by the English.

Soon Jack's heart was taken by a lady who lived nearby and they were married. But she proved unfaithful to him, as well as being a gambler and a spendthrift, and shortly after the birth of their child he left her. He first attacked her lover, however, and so had to flee for his life. Later, learning that she was to have another child, he divorced her and went to France. There he joined an Irish brigade and fought in France, Germany, and Italy. Captured, he was sent to Hungary and then to Italy, where he married the daughter of an innkeeper. Eventually he was allowed to go to Paris with his wife. There he recruited volunteers to fight against the English. Tiring of war, he returned to Paris unexpectedly, only to find that his second wife had also taken a lover. After almost killing the man, he fled to London and then to Canterbury, where he lived as a Frenchman with the English and as an Englishman with the French.

Still desiring a happy home life, he married again. His wife, at first beautiful and virtuous, became a drunkard and finally killed herself. They had had three children. Wishing to provide for them, Jack married an older woman who had cared for them and whom they loved as a mother. But that good woman, after bearing him children, died from a fall, leaving him a widower once more. After smallpox took all but two of his children, he returned to Virginia. His daughter he left with her grandfather; the remaining son he took with him.

In Virginia he found his affairs in good order, the tutor having made a faithful overseer for twenty-four years. Several slaves and servants had been added to the plantations, and Jack found one of them to be his first wife. Since she had repented wholly of her sins, he married her again and lived happily with her for many years.

But he was not always to live in peace. Several captive servants who knew of his part in the rebellion, when he had served with the Irish brigade, were brought to neighboring plantations. His part in the rebellion becoming known, he had to leave Virginia until he could secure a pardon from the king. He and his wife went to Antigua, from which she later returned to Virginia to await the news of her husband's pardon. Pardoned, he was on his way home when he was captured by the Spanish. After many long months as a hostage he was released, having turned the experience into profit by trading with some of his captors. He continued the trade, which was illegal in the eyes of the Spanish government, and made thousands of pounds. He was often in danger during his voyages, even taken, but each time he turned the situation to his own advantage.

At last he left danger behind, returned to England, and sent for his beloved wife. There they remained, leaving the Virginia plantations in the hands of the faithful tutor. In his old age Colonel Jack spent many hours contemplating the goodness of the God he had formerly ignored. He believed that his story was one to make others repent of their sins and mend their broken ways.

THE HISTORY OF MR. POLLY

Type of work: Novel

MR. POLLY, a shopkeeper

MIRIAM, his wife

THE PLUMP WOMAN

UNCLE JIM, her nephew

Critique:

A timeless comedy, as funny now as when it was first published in 1909, The History of Mr. Polly has strangely enough not been one of H. G. Wells' most popular novels. It is the story of a gentle man who rebels at last against the insults heaped upon him by the world and finds the peace of mind that few achieve. Wells' special genius here is in the quiet humor that startles even as it amuses. This is a highly original book, funny, moving, and pathetic.

The Story:

Mr. Polly sat on a stile and cursed. He cursed the world, his wife, and himself. For Mr. Polly was thirty-five and buried alive. He hated his slovenly wife, his fellow shopkeepers, and every other person in the world. His life, he felt, had been nothing but one frustration after another, from babyhood into his middle thirties.

Mr. Polly had been the usual adored baby, kissed and petted by his parents. His mother had died when he was seven. After the routine sketchy schooling of his class, he was apprenticed by his father to the owner of a draper's shop.

Mr. Polly was ill-suited to work in that shop or in any other. But he served out his apprenticeship and then began a progression from one shop to another, being unable to hold one position for very long. He hated the bleak life in dreary dormitories. He hated being told to hustle when he wanted to dream beautiful dreams about adventure and romance. He spent most of his money and all his spare time on books which took him away from the humdrum of socks and neckties. He did not know what it was he really wanted, but to anyone who might have studied him the answer would have been simple. He wanted companions.

When his father died, Mr. Polly found himself in possession of several useless bits of bric-a-brac and three hundred and ninety-five pounds. It seemed at first that a whole new world was open to him with this new wealth. Various relatives had sensible suggestions for him, most of them centering on his opening a little shop. He put them off, for he wanted to spend his time in taking a holiday.

At his father's funeral, which was a proper one, Mr. Polly had met aunts and cousins he did not know existed. Three of his cousins, all female, began to set their caps for their rich relative, and before he was sure of what had happened, Mr. Polly found himself in possession of a wife, his cousin Miriam, and a draper's shop. For the next fifteen years Mr. Polly was a respectable though unhappy shopkeeper. He could get on with none of his neighbors, and before long he hated his slatternly wife as much as he hated the other shopkeepers.

For these reasons Mr. Polly sat on the stile and cursed his luck. For the first time in fifteen years he found himself, in addition to his other troubles, unable to meet the forthcoming rent. As well as he could figure, he was in debt sixty or seventy pounds. He knew how Miriam would greet this news; it was just too much for him.

At that point a plan which had been forming in the back of his mind began to take shape. He would kill himself.

Then the struggle would be over for him and Miriam would be provided for by his insurance. He would set fire to the shop, for the fire insurance, and before he burned up would cut his throat. Craftily he waited until a Sunday evening, when almost everyone was at church, and then carried out his plan. It worked so well that half the business area of the village burned down. But when Mr. Polly saw flames licking the leg of his trousers, he forgot all about cutting his throat and ran screaming down the street.

It was a beautiful fire, and because of it Mr. Polly was for the first time in his life a hero. He rescued a deaf old lady who lived on a top floor and for whose safety he felt responsible because he had started the fire. When the excitement was all over, it dawned on him that he had forgotten to cut his throat. He felt a little guilty.

But that one night of fighting back against the world changed Mr. Polly forever. Taking only twenty-one pounds for himself and leaving the rest for Miriam, he simply disappeared. Wandering through the country, he enjoyed life for the first time. He discovered the world, the beauties of nature, the casual friendship of passing acquaintances. It was wonderful.

After a month Mr. Polly arrived at a little wayside inn run by a cheerful plump woman. They felt an instant closeness, and she offered him a job as handy man. His duties were endless and varied, but there was an unhurried peace about the plump woman and the inn that brought joy to the soul of Mr. Polly. There was, however, a black spot on the peace. The plump woman had a nephew, called Uncle Jim, who was a brute and a villain. He had run off all other males who had ever stopped there, and he beat his aunt and stole her money. She knew that he would return again when he was out of funds. Mr. Polly knew this was not his fight, but he had started fighting on the night of the fire and he would not stop now. Sometimes running when he should have been chasing, hiding when he should have been seeking his adversary, Mr. Polly nevertheless bested the scoundrel in two encounters. Then Uncle Jim disappeared again, taking Mr. Polly's clothing and leaving in his place an uneasy peace.

Uncle Jim did not appear again. After five years at the inn Mr. Polly began to think of Miriam and her sadness at losing her husband. Conscience-stricken, he returned to the village and there found that Miriam and her sisters had opened a tearoom, untidy but successful enough to provide their living. They thought him dead, a body wearing his clothing having been fished out of the river. Miriam, recognizing him in terror, began at once to fret about having to pay back his insurance money. She could have spared herself the worry, however; Mr. Polly had no desire to reappear. He told her to keep her mouth shut and no one would be the wiser.

Mr. Polly made his way back to the inn and the plump woman. With Uncle Jim gone for good, he knew at last a mellow, wonderful peace.

SIR WILLIAM BEEDER, Jimson's benefactor

Critique:

The Horse's Mouth is one of several novels depicting the life and times of Gulley Jimson, artist and social rebel. Told in the first person singular, the story is a delightful combination of humor, pathos, and down-to-earth philosophy. Whether Gulley was a genius or the greatest rogue in modern art circles is a question which the writer makes no attempt to settle, but there is no doubt that Gulley is one of the most fascinating figures in modern literature. Here is the familiar picaresque romance brought up to date and enlivened by the supple, witty qualities of Mr. Cary's style.

The Story:

Just out of prison, Gulley Jimson looked up his old friend Coker, the ugly barmaid at the Eagle. Coker wanted him to press a lawsuit over some of his paintings, for if Gulley collected Coker would collect from him. At last Gulley managed to get away from her and return to his studio in an old boat shed.

The shack roof leaked and the walls sagged. His paints and brushes had either been stolen or ruined by rain and rats, but the Fall was there. The Fall, depicting Adam and Eve in their fall from grace, would be his masterpiece.

Gulley had a questionable reputation as an artist. Several years back he had painted some nudes of Sara Monday, startling portraits of a lovely girl in her bath. Sara had lived with Gulley as his wife. When the breakup came she had stolen the pictures and sold most of them to a collector named Hickson. One or two he kept for herself. Gulley, past sixty now, had done nothing since the Sara nudes to add to his reputation, but he still had faithful followers of tramps, beggars, and young Nosy. Nosy, wanting to be an artist, worshiped art and Gulley Jimson.

To complete the Fall, Gulley needed paints and brushes. In order to get Gulley to see Sara Monday and secure evidence for a lawsuit to compel Hickson to return the Sara nudes, Coker bought him some paints and brushes. Off and on he worked on the Fall, driven sometimes by compulsion to paint, sometimes by desire for a beer or two.

When Coker pinned him down and took him to see Sara, Gulley was stunned to find her an old hag to whom he felt drawn even while he pitied and despised her. Sara willingly signed a statement that she had given the stolen pictures to Hickson; then she tried to renew her affair with Gulley. Sara had been badly treated by a succession of men, but, like Gulley, she had few complaints. Both felt that the short-lived prosperity and good times they had enjoyed were now being paid for.

Gulley, working intermittently on the Fall, frequently had to trick Coker into buying him paints. Once she forced him to go with her to Hickson, to try to get the pictures or a settlement for them. When Hickson was ready to settle a small sum on Gulley, even though he had legitimately taken the pictures in return for a debt, Gulley slipped some valuable snuffboxes in his pocket and was caught by Hickson and the police. Although that bit of foolishness cost him six months, he bore no malice toward Hickson.

In jail, Gulley received a letter from Professor Alabaster, who planned to write a life history of the painter of the Sara Monday pictures. Gulley thought the idea ridiculous, until he decided there might be money in it. He had had another idea for another masterpiece, and after his release he hurried back to the boat shed to finish the Fall and get started on his new work. He found Coker pregnant and in possession of the shed. Betrayed by her latest lover, her job at the pub lost, she had moved to the shed with her mother. Gulley had to find some way to get the Fall out. Before he had made any plans, he met Professor Alabaster. Alabaster not only wanted to write Gulley's life history but also hoped to sell some of Gulley's work to Sir William Beeder, a collector who admired the paintings possessed by Hickson. Gulley tried to interest Alabaster and Sir William in one of the new masterpieces he was going to do, but Sir William had a great desire for one of the Sara nudes or something similar.

Gulley still hoped to interest Sir William in the Fall, but when he went again to the boat shed he found that Coker's mother had cut it up to mend the roof. Gulley decided there was no use in getting his temper up and doing something foolish; then he would land back in jail before he could do another masterpiece or make a sale to Sir William. Besides, he suddenly realized that he was tired of the Fall.

In the meantime, if Sir William wanted a Sara nude, perhaps Gulley could persuade old Sara to give him one of the small ones she had kept. But Sara, still vain, loved to take out the portraits of her lovely youth and dream over them. Gulley tried every trick he could think of, without success.

When Sir William left London, Gulley wheedled Alabaster into giving him the key to Sir William's apartment. Needing canvas and paints, he pawned the furniture and art collections, and even grudgingly let a sculptor rent one end of the drawing-room to chip away on a piece of marble. Gulley honestly kept the pawn tickets so that Sir William could redeem his possessions. He used one wall for a weird painting he was sure would please Sir William. But when the owner returned unexpectedly, Gulley decided to talk to him from a distance and ducked out before his benefactor found him.

With faithful Nossy, Gulley went to the country for a time. There he worked a new scheme to get money, but another crook beat him up and sent him to the hospital. While recuperating, Gulley had another vision for a masterpiece and wrote Sir William about his idea. Alabaster replied for Sir William, who still insisted on a nude and thanked Gulley for caring for his furniture.

By the time Gulley got back to the boat shed, Coker had had her baby and was firmly installed there. Gulley moved into another empty building and set about preparing the wall for a painting of the Creation. He was aided by Nossy and several young art students he had shanghaied. He tried again to get a nude from old Sara. When Hickson died and gave the Sara pictures to the nation, Gulley was famous. Alabaster found a backer for the life history, and distinguished citizens called on Gulley to see about buying more pictures from him. Gulley had, in the meantime, copied one of his old pictures of Sara from the original in the Tate Gallery and had sold it on approval to Sir William for an advance payment of fifty pounds.

He made one last try to get a picture from Sara. When she refused, he pushed her down the cellar stairs and broke her back. Knowing the police would soon be after him, he raced back to the Creation and painted like a madman, trying to finish the picture before his arrest. He never completed the painting; his spiteful landlord tore the building down over his head. Thrown from his scaffold, he came to in a police ambulance and learned that he had suffered a stroke. He did not grieve. Rather, he laughed at all the jokes life had played on him, and the jokes he had played on life.

Critique:

Le Fanu's career as a novelist dated from the publication of this book, which he began writing after the death of his wife in 1858. He withdrew from society at the time of her death and wrote to keep himself occupied. Le Fanu's novels, including this one, are novels of lush life—and something more. Death, mystery, and the supernatural are the grim twilight materials of his fiction. Constant speculation on death and the supernatural enabled him to communicate a spectral atmosphere to his novels. A master of terror, Le Fanu has been favorably compared in the past with such other masters of the supernatural as Wilkie

Collins and Poe. This novel is generally regarded as his masterpiece, although Uncle Silas was the most popular during his vogue.

The Story:

Lord Dunoran, an Irish peer, had been executed after his conviction for murdering a man named Beauclerc in London. In addition, his estates were declared forfeit to the crown, and his family was left under a shadow. Eighteen years after his death, his son, who went under the name of Mr. Mervyn, took the body back to Ireland and buried it in the family vault in the Anglican church in Chapelizod, a suburb of Dublin. Following the burial, Mervyn moved into an old house that was reputed to be haunted; several families had moved out of it after having seen strange apparitions and heard strange noises at night. Mervyn hoped that in the neighborhood he might pick up some clues that would lead him to the true murderer of Beauclerc, for the young man still believed his father innocent of the crime for which he had died years before.

About the same time that young Mervyn took up residence in the haunted house, another stranger came to Chapelizod, a man named Paul Dangerfield, who was looking after the affairs of a local nobleman. Dangerfield was a very rich man, and before long he had ingratiated himself in the hearts of the local people by his apparent good sense and his liberality. Of young Mervyn, on the other hand, the villagers were very suspicious, for he kept to himself, and only a few people knew his real identity.

The appearance of Paul Dangerfield caused fears and apprehensions in the minds of two men who lived in Chapelizod. The two were Zekiel Irons, the clerk at the Anglican church, and Dr. Barnaby Sturk, a surgeon at the garrison of the Royal Irish Artillery. Irons had been the accomplice of the man who had actually committed the murder of which Lord Dunoran had been convicted. Dr.

Sturk had been a witness to the murder. They both recognized Paul Dangerfield to be a man named Charles Archer, a ruthless wretch who would think as little of taking their lives as he had of taking those of others.

Zekiel Irons, who wanted to live without fear, resolved to help young Mervyn discover the guilt of Archer-Dangerfield, for Irons knew that he could never live securely until the man was in prison or dead. Irons had been present also when Dangerfield had killed his other accomplice, who had tried to blackmail Dangerfield. On two occasions Irons visited Mervyn and imparted a portion of what he knew; on both occasions he warned Mervyn not to tell anyone at all, lest his informant be killed.

Dr. Sturk, meanwhile, also recognized Dangerfield as Charles Archer, the man he had seen commit a murder. Dr. Sturk, pressed for money, was trying to become an agent for Lord Castlemallard, who was represented by Dangerfield. Dr. Sturk made the mistake, however, of threatening Dangerfield with exposure if the agency were not forthcoming. Dr. Sturk was found terribly beaten about the head one night. Since he was in a deep coma, no one knew who had tried to kill him. Evidence pointed, however, to Charles Nutter, the man Dr. Sturk was trying to replace as the nobleman's agent in Chapelizod, for Nutter had disappeared on the same night that Dr. Sturk was attacked. There was no evidence to indicate that Dangerfield had been the attacker. He had been so helpful to Dr. Sturk that he was under no suspicion.

Dr. Sturk lingered on, and for a time it seemed as if he might recover. Dangerfield arranged for a surgeon to come, at a high fee, to operate on the doctor. Dangerfield had convinced Mrs. Sturk that the operation was the only chance her husband had for life, but actually Dangerfield hoped the operation would be a failure and that Dr. Sturk would die without revealing the identity of his attacker. But the operation was a partial success. Dr. Sturk regained his mind and lived for several days, during which time he made depositions to the magistrates concerning the identity of his attacker and the fact that Dangerfield had murdered another man years before. These events moved Zekiel Irons to go also to the magistrates and tell what he knew about the real identity of Paul Dangerfield and the part he himself had played in the murder of Beauclerc. Even in the face of that evidence, the magistrates found it difficult to believe Dangerfield guilty. The fact that Dangerfield had paid for the operation and had lent money to Mrs. Sturk, as well as the disappearance of Charles Nutter, left them in doubt.

But Charles Nutter, apprehended in Dublin within one day of Dangerfield's arrest, was able to prove that he had been away on other business at the time of the attack on Dr. Sturk. He had, however, gone so close to the scene of the crime that he had frightened off Dangerfield before he could finish the murder.

Nutter had not run away; he had simply been to England and Scotland trying to straighten out his domestic affairs. A woman had attempted to prove he was a bigamist because he had married her several years before his marriage to the woman the people in Chapelizod knew as his wife. He had married the woman, but she herself was a bigamist, having been already married to another man. Nutter had been off to find the true husband, to prove that his marriage to the woman was really no marriage at all. He had been compelled to leave secretly lest he be arrested as a bigamist before he could gather evidence to clear his name.

In another quarter of the village the apprehension of Dangerfield had great implications. He had been engaged to the daughter of the commanding general of the Royal Irish Artillery, even though he was many years older than the girl. Because of his wealth, the general was quite anxious to have his daughter marry Dangerfield. The girl, however, was in love with Mervyn and secretly engaged to him. Dangerfield's arrest prevented the general from marrying his daughter to a man she did not love.

So far as Mervyn was concerned, the apprehension of Dangerfield did more than open the way for his marriage to the general's daughter. The information which Dr. Sturk and Zekiel Irons gave concerning the murder of Beauclerc cleared Mervyn's father, Lord Dunoran. When Parliament met again, it returned to Mervyn his good name, his title, and the estates forfeited at the time of his father's conviction.

Paul Dangerfield, alias Charles Archer, was never convicted, nor was he tried by a court. He died mysteriously in his cell in the county gaol in Dublin while awaiting trial, thus cheating the state of executing him for murder. Not long afterward, the new Lord Dunoran and the daughter of the general commanding the Royal Irish Artillery were married in a great ceremony at Chapelizod.

Critique:

This novel, translated also under the title The Malavoglia, is one of the most interesting contributions of Italian literature to modern realism. Its characters are poor, simple people who can never rest from their struggle to keep alive. The message of the novel is that man is continually being pulled apart by his own forces, so that only by working together with his fellow men can he hope to survive. Written in a completely realistic fashion, with no intrusion from the author, this novel bridges the gap between realism and naturalism.

The Story:

In the village of Trezza, on the island of Sicily, the Malavoglia family had once been great. Now the only Malavoglia left were Padron 'Ntoni and his little brood in the house by the medlar tree. But they were happy and prosperous, living well on the income brought in by their boat, the Provvidenza.

When the oldest grandson, 'Ntoni, was conscripted, the first sadness fell on the household. In that same year other things went badly, and the market for fish was poor. With 'Ntoni gone, the money that came in had to be divided with extra help that Padron was forced to hire. Eventually Padron 'Ntoni had to arrange a loan with Uncle Crucifix Dumbbell to buy a shipment of coarse black beans on credit from him. The beans were to be resold at Riposto by Padron's son, Bastianazzo. Although La Longa, Bastianazzo's wife was skeptical of this deal, she kept quiet, as befitted a woman. Soon afterward, Bastianazzo sailed away on the Provvidenza with the cargo of beans aboard. All the villagers whispered that the beans were spoiled, that Uncle Crucifix had cheated the Malavoglia. It was well known that Uncle Crucifix was an old fox in all money matters.

Nevertheless, if the beans were sold, Padron 'Ntoni's family would be well off. The man whose son was to marry Mena Malavoglia rubbed his hands in anticipation of his boy's good fortune. The women of the village, and others too, agreed that Mena was everything a girl should be. But luck went against the Malavoglia family. In the early evening a huge storm came up. Down at the tavern Don Michele, the brigadier of the coast guard, predicted the doom of the Provvidenza. When word came that the boat had been lost, Bastianazzo with her, grief engulfed the Malavoglia family. To add to their troubles, Uncle Crucifix began to demand his money. All the neighbors who brought gifts of condolence to the house by the medlar tree looked about the premises as if they saw Uncle Crucifix already in possession.

Stubbornly Padron 'Ntoni and his family set to work to repay the loan. It was decided to have Mena married as soon as possible. Alfio Mosca, who drove a donkeycart and often lingered to talk with the girl, was grieved at the news. Then one day the Provvidenza, battered but still usable, was towed into port. The Malavoglia rejoiced. At the same time 'Ntoni arrived home. Luca, the second son, was drafted. Each member of the family slaved to make enough money to repay the debt.

Meanwhile Uncle Crucifix was fiercely repeating his demands. At last he decided to pretend to sell his debt to his assistant, Goosefoot; then, when officers were sent to Padron 'Ntoni's house, people could not say that a usurer or the devil's money had been involved in their troubles. A short time later a stamped paper was served on the Malavoglia family. Frightened, they went to a city lawyer who told them that Uncle Crucifix could do nothing to them because the house was in the name of the daughter-in-law, and she had not signed the papers in the deal of beans. Padron 'Ntoni felt guilty, however; he had borrowed the money and it must be paid back. When he asked advice from the communal secretary, that official told him that the daughter-in-law must give dower rights on the house to Goosefoot, who was now the legal owner of the note. Although Goosefoot protested that he wanted his money, he nevertheless accepted a mortgage.

As the family began to gather money to repay the loan, luck again went against them. New taxes were put on pitch and salt, two necessary commodities, and personal relations between Goosefoot and the family were strained when he and young 'Ntoni came to blows over a girl. In the village there was talk of smugglers, and the rumors involved two of 'Ntoni's close friends. Goosefoot enlisted the aid of Don Michele to watch 'Ntoni closely.

When Mena's betrothal was announced, Alfio Mosca sadly left town. Padron 'Ntoni, happy over the approaching marriage of his granddaughter, offered Goosefoot part of the money on the loan. But Goosefoot, demanding all of it, refused to be moved by the fact that Mena needed a dowry. On top of these troubles the Malavoglia family learned that Luca had been killed in the war. Goosefoot began again to send stamped papers. When Padron 'Ntoni appealed to the lawyer, he was told that he had been a fool to let La Longa give up her dower rights on the house but that nothing could be done about the matter now. So the family had to leave the house by the medlar tree and move into a rented hovel.

Somewhat repaired and on a fishing excursion, the Provvidenza ran into a storm. When Padron 'Ntoni was injured by a blow from the falling mast, young 'Ntoni had to bring the boat in alone. After the old man had recovered, 'Ntoni announced his decision to leave home; he could no longer stand the backbreaking, dull work of his debt-ridden family. His mother, grief-stricken by his departure, contracted cholera and soon died. Meanwhile Mena's engagement had been called off by her betrothed's father. Everything was against the Malavoglia. Goosefoot and Uncle Crucifix gave the family no rest, but insisted that they too were poor and needed their money.

When young 'Ntoni returned to his home with no fortune and clothing more ragged than ever, the villagers laughed with derision. Alessio, the youngest son, now began to help with the work, and he and 'Ntoni were able to earn a little money to apply on the family debt. 'Ntoni, still discontented, was often drunk coming home from the tavern.

Don Michele told the boy's young sister Lia, whom he secretly admired, that she and Mena must keep their eyes on 'Ntoni because he was involved with the smugglers. Although the frightened girls tried to remonstrate with their brother, he refused to listen to their pleas. One night Don Michele knocked at Lia's door and told her that she must find her brother, for the police were planning to ambush the smugglers. His warning came too late for the sisters to act, and 'Ntoni was caught after he had stabbed Don Michele in a scuffle during the raid.

Padron 'Ntoni spent all his savings in an attempt to rescue his grandson. Then he was told a false version of the incident, that 'Ntoni had stabbed Don Michele because he had learned of an affair between the soldier and Lia. The old man was so horrified by this news that he suffered a stroke from which he never completely recovered. Lia left home immediately, without attempting to make known the true facts of the case, and young 'Ntoni was sent to the galleys for five years.

Gradually, under the direction of the youngest son, Alessio, the affairs of the family began to mend. Uncle Crucifix and Goosefoot finally got their money, and Alessio and his bride regained possession of the house by the medlar tree.

Critique:

Her facility in creating suspense would have stood Elizabeth Bowen in good stead had she chosen to write detective novels. The House in Paris gradually unravels a human secret which not only the readers but also the characters of the novel find both absorbing and oppressive. The author's method, however, is not to emphasize physical action but rather to unfold complex relationships of people, evolving slowly into a conclusion that is logical but necessarily incomplete. There are no pat endings to Miss Bowen's books, no perfect dovetailing of desire and fulfillment; as long as people live, she convincingly and calmly implies, there are questions that will be only partially answered, wishes that will be only partially granted. In this book she presents the situation that a child creates by merely existing: an inadvertent love and an inadvertent begetting that become a problem to several people. It is, in short, the problem of an illegitimate boy, and it has rarely been traced with more keenness and candor.

The Story:

Henrietta arrived at the Gare du Nord uncomfortably early in the morning. She had never been in Paris before; and she was not to be there long this time, for one day only, between two night trains. By a previous arrangement, the eleven-year-old girl was met at the station by Miss Naomi Fisher, an acquaintance of Henrietta's grandmother, who would look after her during her day in Paris.

Clutching her plush toy monkey while the taxi bumped through gray Paris streets, Henrietta drowsily absorbed Miss Fisher's nervous chatter. The flow of comments, however, was not entirely pointless: Henrietta was presently made to comprehend that her stopover would be affected by some rather unusual developments at Miss Fisher's house. For one thing, Miss Fisher's mother was ill, though today she was feeling better and Miss Fisher could still hope to take Henrietta out for a short sightseeing expedition after lunch. A more important complication seemed to be the presence of Leopold.

Leopold, Miss Fisher explained with obvious agitation, was an added responsibility which she had not foreseen when she agreed to meet Henrietta. He was nine years old, and he had come from Italy to see his mother, who was a very dear friend of Miss Fisher. Apparently, Henrietta gathered, he had never seen his mother before, a fact which struck the little girl as being quite odd and mysterious. Miss Fisher agreed that the circumstances were rather unusual, but she evaded a more direct explanation. Leopold, she was careful to bring out, was naturally excited and anxious; Henrietta might play with him, if she liked—but she must not question him about his mother.

After arriving at the house in Paris, Henrietta had breakfast and a nap on the sofa before she awoke to find Leopold standing across the salon and gazing at her curiously. The children made wary approaches to acquaintanceship and tentatively compared notes on their respective journeys. In spite of Miss Fisher's injunction, Henrietta managed to learn that Leopold lived at Spezia with his foster parents. Before she could find out more about him, she was summoned upstairs to meet the ill Madame Fisher. The latter seemed a queer person to Henrietta; her manner was ironic and penetrating, and, to her daughter's distress, she insisted on discussing Leopold's father. Once, Madame Fisher intimated, he had broken her daughter's heart. Now he was dead.

Left alone below, Leopold rummaged through Miss Fisher's purse in a vain search for information about his mother. After Henrietta rejoined him, the children had lunch and played aimlessly at cards. While they were thus occupied, the doorbell rang, and Miss Fisher was heard to go to the door. A few minutes later she entered the room, her face suffused with regret and pity. Leopold struggled manfully to affect nonchalance as she told him that, after all, his mother was not coming—she could not come.

Leopold had no way of knowing that his mother was Karen Michaelis, now married to Ray Forrestier. More than ten years earlier, her engagement to Ray had just been announced, and their friends rejoiced in what seemed an ideal match.

The marriage was to be delayed, however, until Ray's completion of a diplomatic mission in the East. Shortly after his departure from England, Karen visited her aunt in Ireland. Returning home, she found a pleasant surprise awaiting her; Naomi Fisher was spending a few days in London.

Karen and Naomi had been intimate ever since Karen, an English schoolgirl, had spent a year under the roof of Madame Fisher in Paris. There she had been housed, perfected in French, and given Madame's keen-eyed supervision, along with other English and American girls who were accepted into the establishment from time to time. There, too, she had first become conscious of Max Ebhart, a dark, taut, brilliant young man whose conversation and intellect Madame Fisher found stimulating. Rather unaccountably, Max had now become engaged to the unassuming Naomi and had accompanied her to England to aid in the settlement of an aunt's estate. Karen welcomed the opportunity to see Naomi, but she expressed reluctance to encounter Max, whose strong self-possession and penetrating mind had always affected her strangely.

Naomi's persistence prevailed, however, and on the final day of her stay in London she succeeded in getting Max and Karen together. While Naomi prepared tea inside the almost-emptied house of her dead aunt, Max and Karen sat outside on the lawn. Little was said, but both were conscious of the tension that their presence together always inspired. That night, as Karen said good-bye at the station, she looked at Max, and their eyes exchanged the mutual admission that they were in love.

A month later the Michaelis telephone rang. It was Max, in Paris, asking Karen to meet him in Boulogne the following Sunday. There they walked and talked, the thought of Naomi shadowing their conversation. Before they parted they arranged to meet again, at Hythe, the next Saturday. They spent the night together and decided that they must marry, in spite of their unwillingness to hurt Naomi. Max went back to Paris to impart the difficult news to his fiancée.

Karen never saw Max again; word of his suicide came in a telegram from Naomi. Weeks later Naomi herself crossed the channel to tell Karen how Max had slashed his wrists after a trying interview with Madame Fisher. When Karen confessed that she was going to bear Max's child, the two girls considered the plans she must make. Karen had already tried to break off her engagement with Ray Forrestier, but he had written that he would never give her up. Nevertheless, she intended to be gone when he returned to London; she would travel to Paris with Naomi and then go on to Germany for perhaps a year. She and Naomi would find a good home for the child. Meanwhile no one else—except possibly Karen's mother—should ever know.

These were the facts about his parents that Leopold had never learned. Now, his mother having failed him by not coming to get him at the house in Paris, he stood, for a moment, immovable, lapped in misery. His air of resolution and determined indifference soon gave way. Crossing to the mantelpiece and pressing himself against it, he burst into sobs. Henrietta tried to comfort him, but he ignored her. Recovering from his spasm of grief, he was sent upstairs to endure Madame Fisher's careful scrutiny. He found her surprisingly sympathetic. She told him something of his mother's marriage to Ray Forrestier, and he confided his determination not to return to his foster parents in Italy. Something in the old invalid's inner force seemed to stiffen and encourage him.

Downstairs the doorbell rang once more, and presently Miss Fisher came running swiftly up the steps. She directed Leopold to the salon where he found a tall, pleasant-looking Englishman. It was Ray Forrestier; overruling Karen's doubts, he had come to accept Leopold as his own son and to restore him to his mother.

A HOUSE OF GENTLEFOLK

Type of work: Novel

Author: Ivan Turgenev (1818-1883)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Russia

First published: 1858

Principal characters:

MARYA DMITRIEVNA, a widow

LAVRETZKY, her cousin

LIZA, her daughter

VARVARA, Lavretzky's wife

PANSHIN, an official

Critique:

A House of Gentlefolk, sometimes translated as A Nobleman's Nest, belongs with the simple, powerful group of Turgenev's romances. Here are two characters who stand as symbols of Russia: Lavretzky and Liza. Although their lot is a sad one, they are presented in heroic mold. Indeed, the author in this work exhibits a greater degree of Slavophilism than is usually found in his novels. In this work Turgenev shows little patience with the detractors of Russia, those who exalt the worth of French and German culture. Even the glittering Panshin must admit the worthiness of Lavretzky's aim to cultivate the soil.

The Story:

Marya, since the death of her husband, had become a social leader in her small provincial town. Her daughter Liza spoke French quite well and played the piano. Her other children had the best tutors available. She delighted to receive guests, especially Panshin, who had an important position in Moscow. Her evening gatherings were always entertaining when Panshin was there to quote his own poetry.

It was rumored that Lavretzky was returning to the district. Although he was a cousin of the house, Marya scarcely knew how to treat him, for Lavretzky had made an unfortunate marriage. He was separated from his pretty wife, who was reputed to be fast and flighty.

But Lavretzky's visit created no difficulties. He was a rather silent, affable man who noticed Liza with interest. Liza was a beautiful, religious-minded girl of nineteen. It was very evident that the brilliant Panshin was courting her with the full approval of her mother. On the evening of his visit Lavretzky was not impressed with Panshin's rendition of his musical romance, but the ladies were ecstatic.

The following day Lavretzky went on to his small country estate. The place was run-down because it had been uninhabited since his sister's death. Lavretzky, content to sink into a quiet country life, ordered the gardens cleaned up, moved in some newer furniture, and began to take an interest in the crops. He seemed suspended in a real Russian atmosphere close to the land. The new life was particularly pleasing after his residence in France and the painful separation from his wife.

Lavretzky had had a different upbringing. His father, disappointed by his failure to inherit an aunt's fortune, had decided to make his son a strong man, even a spartan. At twelve Lavretzky was dressed in Highland kilts and trained in gymnastics and horsemanship. He ate only one meal a day and took cold showers at four in the morning. Along with the physical culture intended to produce a natural man according to Rousseau's doctrines, the father filled his son full of Voltaire's philosophy.

The father died horribly after enduring pain for two years. During this period he lost all his bravery and atheistic independence; at the end he was a sniveling wreck. His death was a release to Lavretzky, who immediately enrolled, at the age of twenty-three, in a university in Moscow.

At the opera one night he met the beautiful Varvara, daughter of a retired general who lived mostly by his wits. At first the parents had little use for Lavretzky, for they thought him only an unimportant student. When they learned, however, that he came of good family and was a landed proprietor, they favored an early marriage. Since Varvara wanted to travel, Lavretzky wound up his affairs and installed his new father-in-law as overseer of his properties.

In Paris, Varvara began a dizzy social whirl. Her adoring husband, content merely to be at her side, let her indulge her whims freely. She soon had a reputation as a brilliant hostess, but her guests thought her husband a non-entity. Lavretzky had no suspicion that his wife was anything but a devoted wife and mother to their daughter until a letter came by accident into his hands. From it he learned of her lover and their sordid, furtive meetings in obscure apartments. Lavretzky left home immediately and took up separate residence. When he wrote to Varvara, telling her of the reason for the separation, she did not deny her guilt, but only asked for consideration. Settling an income on his wife, Lavretzky returned to Russia.

After spending some time on his estate, Lavretzky began to ride into town occasionally to call on Marya and her family. After he became better acquainted with Liza, the young girl scolded him for being so hard-hearted toward his wife. According to her religious beliefs, Lavretzky should have pardoned Varvara for her sins and gone on with the marriage. Lavretzky, in turn, warned Liza that Panshin was not the man for her. The gay young official was a diplomat, all surface and no substance. Lavretzky had an ally in Marfa, the old aunt who also saw through Panshin's fine manners and clever speeches. When Panshin proposed to Liza by letter, she postponed making a decision.

Liza's music teacher was an old, broken German named Lemm. Although Lavretsky had little ear for music, he strongly appreciated Lemm's talent. He invited the old man to his farm. During the visit the two men found much in common. Lavretsky was saddened to see that the old music teacher was hopelessly in love with Liza.

One night, in Marya's drawing-room, Panshin was brilliantly holding forth on the inadequacies of Russia. The country was much behind the rest of Europe, he asserted, in agriculture and politics. The English were superior in manufacture and merchandising, the French in social life and the arts, the Germans in philosophy and science. His views were the familiar theme of the aristocratic detractors of Russia. The usually silent Lavretsky finally took issue with Panshin and skillfully demolished his every argument. Liza listened with approval.

In a French paper Lavretsky came upon a brief notice in the society section; his wife was dead. For a while he could not think clearly, but as the import of the news came home to him he realized that he was in love with Liza. Riding into town, he gave the paper quietly to Liza. As soon as he could be alone with her, he declared his love. The young girl received his declaration soberly, almost seeming to regard their love as a punishment. Although troubled at first by her attitude, Lavretsky soon achieved a happiness he had never expected to find.

That happiness, however, was short-lived. His servant announced one day that Varvara had returned with their daughter. His wife told him she had been very ill and had not bothered to correct the rumor of her death. Now she asked only to be allowed to live somewhere near him. Suspecting that her meekness was only assumed, Lavretsky arranged for her to live on a distant estate, far from his own house, and went to break the news to Liza.

Liza was controlled. She might almost have awaited the punishment, for she knew that sorrow was the lot of all Russians. Varvara brazenly called on Marya and completely captivated her with her beauty, her French manners, and her accomplished playing and singing. Liza met Lavretsky's wife with grave composure.

For a time Varvara complied with her promise to stay isolated on the distant estate, where she frequently entertained Panshin. In the winter, when she moved to Moscow, Panshin was her devoted follower. At last she went back to Paris.

Liza entered a convent. Lavretsky saw her once from a distance as she scurried timidly to a prayer service. Taking what strength he could from the soil, he remained on his farm. When he was forty-five, he visited the house where Liza had lived. Marya and all the older people of the household had died. He felt ill at ease among the younger, laughing generation.

THE HOUSE WITH THE GREEN SHUTTERS

Principal characters:

JOHN GOURLAY, a wealthy merchant

YOUNG JOHN, his son

MRS. GOURLAY, his slovenly wife

JAMES WILSON, Gourlay's competitor

Critique:

Disgusted with the quaint and sentimental novels in which writers of the kailyard school portrayed his native Scotland, George Douglas Brown attempted to present in his work a more realistic picture of Scottish life in the late nineteenth century. The House With the Green Shutters is a forceful book, one alive with characters that grip the reader in their problems. Brown's purpose was to show the true Scottish peasant as he saw him.

The Story:

John Gourlay was proud of his twelve wagons and his many business successes, but mostly he was proud of his House with the Green Shutters. Into it he had put all the frustration he felt for his lack of friends, his slovenly wife, his weakling son. Gourlay's was a pride of insolence. He would have more than his neighbors, his betters; he would make them acknowledge him as their superior. Gourlay had not found a golden touch. He had simply worked hard, turning every shilling into pounds by any method open to him. In the process he became mean, stingy, boastful, and evil.

His son John had inherited all of his characteristics except his courage. As a schoolboy, constantly ridiculed by his mates, he took refuge in boasting of his father's wealth and power. He was no good with his fists, and his only revenge after a sound drubbing was to tell his father. Gourlay hated his son almost as much as he hated everyone else, but he could not let his son be laughed at by the sons of his enemies. Thus John was avenged by the father who despised him.

Gourlay also hated his wife. She who had once been a laughing, pretty lass had become a slattern and a bore whose son was her only reason for living. On him she lavished all the love denied her by her husband. There was one daughter.

She was ignored by her mother and favored by her father, each parent taking the opposite point of view from the other.

The whole village bowed to Gourlay, even while they prayed that he would one day meet his match. They were not to be disappointed. One James Wilson returned to the village with money he had earned during his fifteen years' absence. One of the first to meet Wilson was Gourlay. When Wilson had left years before, Gourlay had been then as now the big man in the town. Had Gourlay said a kind word or given one bit of praise for the success of his former acquaintance, Wilson would have been flattered and would have become his friend. But Gourlay was not such a man. He immediately ridiculed Wilson and laughed at the idea that he could be a success at anything. Wilson developed a hatred that was to bring the insolent Gourlay to ruin.

Wilson used his money to set up a general store, which he stocked with many items the villagers had formerly had to send away for and pay Gourlay to haul for them. He also delivered items to neighboring towns and farms. Then he started a regular carting service, cutting prices to get business from Gourlay, just as Gourlay had done to his competitors. The townspeople were glad to patronize Wilson in order to get back at Gourlay for his years of dominance and insolence. Indeed, they even gave Wilson new suggestions for expanding his trade. Gourlay's downfall started slowly, but soon it became a landslide. The peasants began to stand up to the old man, even to laugh openly at him. Gourlay's vows of vengeance were empty talk.

Gourlay turned to his son as his only hope. When Wilson's son went away to high school, John was sent, even though he had no head for books and no ambition. John played truant frequently and was a braggart and a coward as before, but his father still had power enough to keep him in school and in money and in some way the boy was graduated. Wilson sent his son to the university. Gourlay decided that John must go too. Never was a boy more miserable, for he knew he was not suited for advanced study. Gourlay hoped to make the lad a minister; his hope was to recoup some respect, if not money, for the family.

At the university John found little stimulation for his sluggish mind. He had one high spot in his career, indeed in his whole life, when he won a prize for an essay. Since that was the first honor he ever won, he swaggered and boasted about it for months. Because of the prize, also, he won his first and only word of praise from his father. In his second term John fell to his own level and became a drunken sot. Books were too much for him, and people scorned him. The bottle was his only friend.

While John was stumbling through his second term at the university, Gourlay's fortunes reached their lowest ebb. The House with the Green Shutters was mortgaged heavily, all Gourlay's other assets having been lost in wild speculations to recoup his fortunes. But Gourlay still pinned his hopes on the son he had always hated. John would save the family name, the lost fortune, the House. Thus when Gourlay learned that John had been expelled for drunkenness and insubordination, and heard that the whole town knew of the disgrace through a letter of young Wilson to his father, the news was too much for the old man. He returned to the House with the Green Shutters like a madman, as indeed he was. The first sight that greeted him was John, who had sneaked into town in the darkness. Like a cat toying with a mouse, Gourlay tortured his son. He pretended to consider him a great man, a hero. He peered at him from all angles, waited on him with strong whiskey, called him a fine son, a credit to the family. Cowardly John rushed from the house in terror, followed by the screams of his mother and sister and the howls of his father. Then his false courage returned, and he went back into the house after fortifying himself with more whiskey. Picking up a large poker which had been one of his father's prideful purchases, John swung at his father and crushed in his head.

The mother and sister convinced the authorities that Gourlay, falling from a ladder and striking his head, had died accidentally. But John was lost. For days he was haunted by red eyes glaring at him out of space, by unknown things coming to get him. His mother and sister, dependent upon him for their livelihood, tried to get him out of his madness, but nothing soothed him except whiskey, and that only briefly. One day he asked his mother for money, bought his last bottle of whiskey and a vial of poison, and ended his wretched existence.

Completely alone now, aware that even the house must go to the creditors, dying themselves of cancer and consumption, the mother and daughter divided the rest of the poison and joined Gourlay and John in death. The pride, the lust, the greed were gone. The House with the Green Shutters had claimed them all.

Critique:

E. M. Forster is not a prolific author. He is well known to students of fiction, however, as a thorough critic, as well as an important novelist in his own right, and his Aspects of the Novel is a major contribution to study in that field. Prior to his best work of fiction, A Passage to India, Howards End was ranked as his most mature novel. Particularly important in Forster's fiction are his subtle and complete characterization, his deft use of irony, the careful plotting of action, the eternal contrast between illusion and reality. Howards End is second only to A Passage to India in illustrating these characteristics.

The Story:

The Wilcox family met Margaret Schlegel and her sister Helen while both families were vacationing in Germany. Neither group expected the chance acquaintance to amount to anything more, but later, after all had returned to England, Helen Schlegel was invited to visit the Wilcox family at Howards End, their country home near London. While there, Helen fell in love with Paul Wilcox. Both families disapproved of the match, and after hard words on both sides it was broken off.

A few months later the Wilcoxes rented a town flat across the street from the Schlegel home. Both young people were out of the country. Mrs. Wilcox and Margaret Schlegel met and became friends.

Also acquainted with the Schlegels was a young man named Leonard Bast, a seedy fellow whose umbrella had been accidentally taken by Helen at a concert. The young man had interested the girls and their brother by his conversation when he had called to reclaim his umbrella. They did not know that he had an exceedingly frowsy wife, a woman some years older than he who had trapped him into a distasteful marriage.

Some months after the acquaintance between Mrs. Wilcox and Margaret Schlegel had ripened into friendship, Mrs. Wilcox became ill and died. Much to her husband's and sons' surprise, she left a note, in addition to her will, leaving Howards End to Margaret. In their anger at the prospect of letting the house go out of the family, the Wilcoxes disregarded the note, since it was not a part of the official will.

Margaret Schlegel, knowing nothing of the bequest, was really glad that the tie between herself and the Wilcox family had been broken, for she was afraid that her sister was still in love with Paul Wilcox and suffered when she came into contact with other members of the family.

One evening, long after Mrs. Wilcox's death, Margaret and her sister were sitting in the park. There they met Mr. Wilcox, who told them that the firm for which Leonard Bast worked was unreliable. Acting on that information, the girls advised the young man to change jobs. He did so. They did not know that Mr. Wilcox, in love with Margaret, had given them bad advice in order to get rid of a young man he saw as a possible rival for Margaret's love.

A few weeks later the long-term lease on the Schlegels' house was up and they were forced to move. Although they searched a long time, they found nothing suitable. Mr. Wilcox, hearing of their predicament, sent a letter to Margaret offering to lease them his house in London. Margaret went with him to look at the house. While they were there, Mr. Wilcox declared his love. Margaret, who was well into her thirties, was surprised, but without embarrassment or shock. She asked only for a few days to think over the rental of the house and the proposal of marriage. After considering both problems, she agreed to marry Mr. Wilcox, thus making any decision about the rental unnecessary.

Before Margaret's marriage to Mr. Wilcox, his daughter was also married at a house owned by the Wilcoxes near Wales. Shortly after the daughter's wedding Helen Schlegel, who had disapproved of Margaret's approaching marriage, appeared at the house with Leonard Bast and his wife. Helen had learned that through their bad advice Bast had lost everything he had, including his job. Helen thought that Mr. Wilcox ought to recompense the young man. When Mrs. Bast was discovered, rather tipsy, on the lawn, she revealed to Mr. Wilcox and Margaret that she had been Mr. Wilcox's mistress many years before. Margaret was willing to forgive Mr. Wilcox, but she resolved not to help the Basts. Under the circumstances, she felt it was unnecessary and in poor taste to do so.

Helen, who had unwittingly fallen in love with Bast, felt sorry for him. She spent part of one night with him and then remorsefully left England. She tried to give Bast five thousand pounds, most of her fortune, but he refused to accept her aid.

The relationship between her sister and Leonard Bast was unknown to Margaret, who went ahead with her marriage to Mr. Wilcox, despite the fact that his sons did not approve of their father's second marriage. Helen's refusal to return for the ceremony did not surprise her sister. Eight months went by. Helen still had not returned, and Margaret began to worry about her sister.

Helen finally came back to England and sent word that she wanted some books stored in the house at Howards End. She acted so mysteriously that Margaret and Mr. Wilcox planned to encounter her at the house. Because she refused to see them directly, Margaret, worried, thought that Helen might need mental treatment. When Margaret saw Helen, however, the reason for the mystery was plain: Helen was pregnant as the result of the night she spent with Leonard Bast. Helen asked to be permitted to spend one night with her sister in the unoccupied house at Howards End. Mr. Wilcox refused to allow Margaret to do so.

The two sisters stayed in the house in spite of Mr. Wilcox's refusal. The following morning Mr. Wilcox's older son, Charles, went to the house to get them out. A minute or two after his arrival Leonard Bast came to the house in search of Margaret, from whom he hoped to get money. As soon as he saw him, Charles seized a saber that hung on the wall and struck Bast on the shoulders with the flat of the weapon several times. The shock of seeing Helen and the beating were too much for Bast's weak heart. He died suddenly.

Charles was tried for manslaughter and sentenced to three years in prison. The disgrace was too great for his father, who became an invalid. Margaret moved her husband and her sister into the house at Howards End, where Helen's child was born. Mr. Wilcox came to love the baby during his illness and convalescence, and so Helen and the child, much to the displeasure of the other Wilcoxes, were permitted to remain. A few months before Charles' release from prison, Mr. Wilcox called a family conference. He had made a new will giving all his money to the children by his first marriage, but the house at Howards End was to go to Margaret and after her death to Helen's illegitimate child. Thus the mansion, which had played so great a part in all their lives, eventually came to Margaret Schlegel, just as the first Mrs. Wilcox had wished before her death.

Type of work: Novel

Author: Jorge Icaza (1902- )

ALFONSO PEREIRA, a debt-ridden landowner

BLANCA, his wife

LOLITA, his daughter

DON JULIO, his uncle

POLICARPIO, an overseer

ANDRÉS CHILQUINGA, an Indian laborer

CUNSHI, his wife

PADRE LOMAS, the village priest

JUANCHO CABASCANGO, a well-to-do Indian tenant farmer

Critique:

Stark, brutal realism overlies the artistry of this novel of protest against the enslavement of the Indian in rural Ecuador. Icaza is only one of many Latin-American novelists who, influenced by Dostoevski, Gorky, and other European realists, have used the indigenous theme and shown the white man's cruelty toward the Indian, but his Huasi-pungo is the best of these polemic works. Greater as a social document, perhaps, than as a work of fiction, it is made up of a series of episodes whose power lies in a graphic account of the lives and trials of the Indian. Icaza writes carelessly, with a scorn of syntax, but with a keen ear that reproduces the difficult dialect of the Quichua-speaking inhabitants of the Andean region near Quito. Types symbolizing classes rather than clearly realized individuals fill his pages, and in this novel the avaricious, lustful priest has been made especially hateful. In spite of its defects Huasi-pungo is a powerful novel, with many pirated editions in Spanish, an English translation printed in Russia, and even a version in Chinese.

The Story:

Alfonso Pereira was an Ecuadorian landowner plagued by domestic and financial troubles. His wife Blanca nagged him and he was worried over his seventeen-year-old daughter Lolita, who wanted to marry a man who was part Indian. Don Julio, his uncle, added to his difficulties by demanding repayment of a loan of ten thousand sucres, a debt already three months overdue.

When Pereira confessed himself unable to pay the loan, Don Julio suggested that his nephew try to interest Mr. Chapy, a North American promoter, in a timber concession on Pereira's mountain estate. Privately the old man suspected that Mr. Chapy and his associates were on the lookout for oil and used their lumber-cutting activities in the region as a blind. In order to interest the North Americans, however, it would be necessary to build fifteen miles of road and get possession of two forest tracts. Also, the Indians must be driven off their huasipungos, the lands supplied to them in return for working on the master's estate.

Pereira assured his uncle that such a course would be difficult. The Indians, having a deep affection for their lands along both sides of the river, would never willingly give them up. Old Julio ridiculed Pereira's sentimentality and told him to return to the estate at Tomachi and build the road.

Back home, Pereira discussed his problem with Padre Lomas, the village priest. The padre agreed to persuade the Indians to work on the road; he would tell them that the labor was the will of God. They also tried to determine how many mingas, brawls in which Indians were plied with drink to make them willing to work, would be necessary before the road could be completed. Jacinto Quintana, proprietor of the village store and saloon, promised that he and his wife Juana would make the home-brew for the first of the mingas.

Andrés Chiliquinga, an Indian workman, was unhappy because Pereira had returned, for he had gone against his master's and the priest's wishes by taking Cunshi as his wife. He was one of thirty Indians sent to start cutting wood and clearing the roadbed.

To find a wet nurse for her baby, Blanca Pereira examined some of the dirty Indian mothers. Their undernourished babies were diseased, some with malaria or dysentery; others were idiotic or epileptic. Policarpio, the overseer, finally chose Cunshi, mother of the healthiest child in the village, and took her to the Pereira house. The master, seeing the young Indian woman, forced her to sleep with him.

One night Andrés made the long trip home to see his wife. Finding no one in their hillside shack, he became suspicious and angry. The next day he deliberately let his ax fall on his foot. The Indians treated the cut with spiderwebs and mud, but when the bandage was removed, three days later, the foot was so badly infected that Andrés was sent home. A medicine man who poulticed the sore saved Andrés' life, but the wound left him lame.

One day, while Pereira and the priest were at the Quintana store discussing the building of the road, they sent Jacinto on an errand. After his departure both men forced Juana to accept their attentions.

Pereira gave Padre Lomas one hundred sucres for a big mass. Then he held a minga and work on the road was speeded up. Storms made life miserable for the Indians, unprotected as they were in their camps. Some died when they tried to drain a swamp. Others perished in quicksands. Pereira, choosing to risk the Indians rather than follow a longer, safer route, kept the workmen drunk and entertained them with cockfights. The ignorant laborers continued to toil.

The priest went to Juancho Cabascango, an Indian with a prosperous huasipungo beside the river, and asked for one hundred sucres to pay for another mass. When the Indian refused, Padre Lomas cursed him. A short time later a flash flood drowned some of the Indians and their cattle. Blaming the disaster on Juancho, his superstitious neighbors beat him to death. The priest declared the affair the will of God and easily collected several hundred sucres for his mass.

At last the road was completed, but the Indians received none of the benefits Padre Lomas had promised. He himself bought a bus and two trucks that took away all transport from those who used to drive mule teams into Quito with the products of the region. Young Indians rode the bus to the city and there ended up as criminals and prostitutes.

Because of easy transportation and the possibility of a profitable sale in Quito, Pereira decided not to give the Indians their customary grain from his plentiful harvest. Policarpio's protests did no good. When the hungry Indians went to Pereira's patio and begged their master to relieve the hunger of their families, he told them that their daily pay of fifty centavos was generous enough. Besides, the ton and a half of corn needed to feed the Indians would help considerably in reducing his debts. He did, however, heed his overseer's warning and asked that guards for his estate be sent from Quito.

Hunger stalked the region and babies and old people perished. When one of Pereira's cows died, the famished Indians begged for the carcass. He refused because they might be tempted to kill other cows, and ordered Policarpio to bury the dead animal. Desperate, Andrés dug it up. After he and his family ate some of the meat, the tainted flesh killed Cunshi. Padre Lomas demanded twenty-five sucres, more than the Indian could ever earn, in payment for burying the dead woman. That same night Andrés stole one of his master's cows and sold it to a nearby butcher. Tracked down by dogs, the Indian was captured and flogged in Pereira's patio. There was no one to protest except his small son, who was almost killed by the white men when he tried to help his father.

A score of foreigners arrived in To-machi. The Indians welcomed them timorously, thinking that these new white men could certainly be no more cruel than their Spanish masters. But Mr. Chapy's first act was to order the Indians driven from their huasipungos to make room for company houses and a sawmill.

When Andrés' son brought news of the order, the Indians rebelled. They had stolidly accepted the white man's cruelty, even his lechery toward their women, but they felt that the land was theirs. Jacinto vainly tried to stop them when they marched on the village. The enraged Indians killed six of the white men. The others, including Mr. Chapy, fled in their autos.

They returned, over the road the Indians had built, with three hundred soldiers under a leader who had killed two thousand Indians in a similar rebellion near Cuenca. Troops hunted down and machine-gunned Indians of all ages and sexes. The few survivors, taking refuge in Andrés' hillside shack, rolled down rocks on the soldiers and shot at them with birdguns. Finally the soldiers set fire to the thatched roof. When the Indians ran from the burning house, the troops shot them without mercy.

BÉLINE, his second wife

ANGÉLIQUE, Argan's daughter

CLÉANTE, her lover

BÉRALDE, Argan's brother

THOMAS DIAFOIRUS, the doctor's son

TOINETTE, Argan's maidservant

Critique:

Turning his satirical pen to the medical profession, Molière almost surpasses even his own bitterness as displayed in his earlier plays. The Hypochondriac (Le Malade Imaginaire) was his last comedy, and he was unmerciful in his attack on all doctors and pharmacists. His usual wit and humor are not lost in the irony, but they are secondary to it. It is now almost three hundred years since Molière's death, but his literary stature has not diminished with the years. He is still studied and imitated as he was in his own time.

The Story:

Argan was the worst sort of hypochondriac. Each day saw him trying a new drug of some sort, so that the doctor and apothecary could exist almost exclusively on their profits from Argan. Toinette, his maidservant, tried in vain to persuade him to end his worries about his health, for she was certain that there was absolutely nothing the matter with her master. But he would not listen to her; he was determined to be an invalid.

He was encouraged in his supposed illness by his doctor and by Béline, his second wife, who used his weakness to further her schemes to get his money. Because the law said that a second wife could not inherit, it was essential to Béline that Argan make a settlement on her while he still lived. To that end also she tried to get him to place his two daughters in a convent, so that they could not interfere by claiming money for themselves.

Argan had other plans for his older daughter, Angélique. He was going to force her betrothal to his doctor's son in order to have a doctor in the family. He told the girl that a dutiful daughter would take a husband useful to her father. But Angélique, loving a young man named Cléante, begged her father not to force her marriage to Thomas Diafoirus, the doctor's son. Argan was firm because the young man would also inherit a large sum of money from his father and another from his uncle, the apothecary. If Angélique would not obey his wishes, he threatened to place her in a convent, as her stepmother wished him to do. Toinette scolded him severely for forcing his daughter to marry against her wishes, but he would not be moved. Toinette, wishing to help Angélique, got word to Cléante that his beloved was to be given to another.

Cléante disguised himself as the friend of Angélique's singing-master and told Argan that he had been sent to give her her singing lesson. Toinette pretended to change her mind and sympathize with Argan's position regarding the marriage. In that way she could offer to guard Angélique, while in reality giving the young lovers an opportunity to be alone together.

As the supposed teacher, Cléante had to witness the meeting between Thomas and Angélique. Thomas was a great boob of a boy, quoting memorized speeches to Argan, Angélique, and Béline. His father, the doctor, was quite proud that Thomas had always been a little slow in learning and that he followed blindly the opinions of the ancients, not accepting any of the new medical discoveries—for example, the thesis that blood circulated through the system.

Poor Angélique knew that she could never marry such a stupid oaf. She begged her father at least to give her time to become acquainted with Thomas, but the most he would give her was four days. At the end of that period she must either marry Thomas or go into a convent. In order to be assured of Argan's money, Béline continued to plead with him to choose the convent for his daughter.

Argan's brother, Béralde, called on him and also pleaded Angélique's cause. He thought it wicked to force her to marry against her wishes. He knew that Argan was not really ill and did not need a doctor in the family. In fact, he knew that the doctor would soon cause his brother's death by the constant "drenching" of his abdomen. Béralde sent the medicines away, causing the doctor to renounce his patient and to predict his death within four days. The apothecary canceled his contract to give his nephew a marriage settlement, and neither of the professionals would be soothed by Argan's protestations that it was his brother and not he who had denounced them and their treatments. Argan believed that he would surely die without their attention.

Toinette and Béralde then schemed to trick the hypochondriac. Toinette disguised herself as a physician and told Argan that his former doctor had been entirely mistaken in his diagnosis of Argan's illness. His liver and bowels were not ailing, but his lungs were; he must cut off his arm and pluck out his eye because they were drawing all his strength to them. Even Argan would not take such a drastic remedy. The poor man felt that he was doomed.

Still Argan would not relent concerning Angélique. Since the doctor and the apothecary had broken their marriage contracts, Angélique must go to a convent and become a nun. When Béralde accused him of being influenced by his wife, Argan agreed to Toinette's suggestion that he allow his wife to prove her love for him. Toinette knew the greed of Béline, but she pretended to Argan that if he acted dead he would see that she loved him and not his money. In this way he could convince his brother of Béline's true love.

The plan was carried out, but when Toinette cried to Béline that Argan was dead, the wife praised heaven that she was rid of her dirty, disgusting husband. Then she tried to bribe Toinette to help her keep Argan's death a secret until she could get certain papers and money into her possession. At that Argan rose up from his supposed deathbed to confront his wife. She fled in terror.

Toinette persuaded Argan to try the same plan with his daughter. When Angélique was told that her father was dead, she wept for him. Cléante came into the room and Angélique told him that now she could not marry him. Her father was dead, and she could make amends for her previous refusals to obey him only by carrying out his wishes now. Argan again rose from his deathbed, this time to bless his daughter for her faithfulness. Toinette and Béralde reminded him of his daughter's love and of his duty to reward her by allowing her to marry the man of her choice. Argan agreed that she could marry Cléante if he would become a doctor and minister to Argan's needs. Cléante was willing, but Béralde had a better idea. Argan should become a doctor himself; then he could give himself constant attention. All that was needed was for him to don cap and gown. He could then spout gibberish and make it sound learned. So the matter was settled, and the old hypochondriac gave his blessing to the young lovers.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST

Type of work: Drama

Author: Oscar Wilde (1856-1900)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: London and Hertfordshire

First presented: 1895

Principal characters:

ALGERNON MONCRIEFF (ALGY), a man about town

LADY AUGUSTA BRACKNELL, his aunt

GWENDOLEN FAIRFAX, her daughter

JACK WORTHING, in love with Gwendolen

CECILY CARDEW, his ward

MISS LETITIA PRISM, Cecily's governess

THE REVEREND CANON CHASUBLE, D.D.

Critique:

This play is built on a pun and the plot turns on a misunderstanding over the name Ernest. The theme is an attack on earnestness, that is, the Victorian solemnity of a false seriousness which results in priggishness, hypocrisy, and so-called piety. Unlike Shaw, who used his conventional plots to reinforce his iconoclastic ideas, Wilde used his wit as an ironic counterpoint to the absurdity of the action.

The Story:

Algernon Moncrieff, nephew of the aristocratic Lady Bracknell, was compelled by necessity to live a more or less double life, or he would have been completely at the mercy of his Aunt Augusta. To escape from her incredibly dull dinner parties, he had emulated that lady's husband by inventing a wholly fictitious friend named Bunbury, whose precarious state of health required Algy's absence from London whenever his aunt summoned him to attendance.

Algy's friend, Jack Worthing, was also forced by circumstances into a similar subterfuge for quite a different reason. He had under his care a young ward named Cecily Cardew, who lived at Jack's country place in Hertfordshire under the admirable tutelage of a stern governess, Miss Prism. Jack thought it necessary to preserve a high moral tone in the presence of Cecily and her governess. To escape from this atmosphere of restraint, he invented an imaginary brother named Ernest, who was supposed to be quite a reprobate, and whose name and general mode of behavior Jack took over during his frequent trips to London.

To complicate matters, Jack had fallen in love with Gwendolen Fairfax, the daughter of Algy's aunt, Lady Bracknell. Moreover, Gwendolen had fallen in love with him, particularly with his name, Ernest, of which she was very fond. When Lady Bracknell learned "Ernest's" intentions toward Gwendolen, she naturally wanted to know something of his family history. But since "Ernest" could supply nothing more definite than the fact that he had been found in a leather bag at the Victoria Railway Station, and that his true parentage was quite unknown, Lady Bracknell refused to consider his marriage to her daughter.

Jack realized that the time had come to put an end to Ernest. He even went so far as to appear at the manor house in Hertfordshire in deep mourning for his brother Ernest. But his friend Algy, "Bunburying" as usual, had preceded him, posing as Ernest. Cecily took an immediate interest in Algy, the supposed brother of her guardian. When Jack and Algy came face to face, Jack promptly announced that his brother Ernest had been unexpectedly called back to London and was leaving at once. But Algy, having fallen in love with Cecily, refused to leave. Cecily, in turn, confessed that it had always been her dream to love someone whose name was Ernest.

Algy, realizing that his hopes of marrying Cecily depended on his name, decided to have himself rechristened Ernest, and to that effect he called upon the local clergyman, the Reverend Canon Chasuble, D.D. But Jack had preceded him with a like request. Dr. Chasuble had an engagement for two christenings at five-thirty that afternoon.

In the meantime Gwendolen arrived at the manor house. Because of the mix-up in names, both Gwendolen and Cecily believed that they were in love with the same man, the non-existent Ernest.

When Jack and Algy appeared together, the real identities of the two pretenders were established. Both girls became furious. At first Jack and Algy upbraided each other for their mutual duplicity, but they finally settled down to tea and consoled themselves by vying with one another to see who could eat the last muffin on the plate. Cecily and Gwendolen at last decided to forgive their suitors, after Algy had admitted that the purpose of his deception was to meet

Cecily, and Jack maintained that his imaginary brother was an excuse to go to London to see Gwendolen. Both girls agreed that in matters of grave importance—such as marriage—style and not sincerity was the vital thing.

Lady Bracknell, arriving in search of her daughter, discovered her nephew engaged to Cecily. Afraid that the girl, like her guardian, might possibly have only railway station antecedents, Lady Bracknell demanded to know Cecily's origin. She was informed that Cecily was the granddaughter of a very wealthy man and the heiress to one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. When she willingly gave her consent to the marriage, Jack refused to allow the match, pointing out that Cecily could not marry without his consent until she came of age, and that according to her grandfather's will she would not come of age until she was thirty-five. However, he said he would give his consent the moment Lady Bracknell approved of his marriage to Gwendolen.

There were, however, some objections to Jack as a suitable husband for Gwendolen, the main one being the question of his parentage. But the mystery was cleared up to Lady Bracknell's satisfaction by the revelation that Miss Letitia Prism, Cecily's governess, was the nurse who had left Lord Bracknell's house with a perambulator containing a male infant which she had placed in a leather handbag and left in the cloakroom of the Victoria Station. The infant was the son of Lady Bracknell's sister, a circumstance which made Jack Algy's older brother. Jack's Christian name still had to be determined. It turned out to be—Ernest. The Reverend Chasuble was relieved of his two christenings that afternoon, and Gwendolen was happy that she was actually going to marry a man named Ernest.

Critique:

With the possible exception of The Grapes of Wrath, In Dubious Battle is the most successful proletarian novel yet written in the United States. More sharply focused than the former, and more vivid in its characterizations, its effect is probably more forceful. Although the story springs directly from the clash of social and economic forces during the early part of the depression decade, it remains considerably more than a propaganda piece. An intensely vital narrative, exhibiting both the social awareness and artistic craftsmanship of the author, this book stands among the best of Steinbeck's novels.

The Story:

Jim Nolan's father was a workingman driven to his death by the blows of police clubs and pistol butts. As a youngster Jim witnessed both his father's courage and his despair; he saw his mother lose even her religious faith as poverty and starvation overwhelmed the family.

Older, but still keenly remembering his youth, with the scars of brutality and starvation deeply embedded in his heart, Jim Nolan became a member of the Communist Party. He was assigned to work with Mac, an able, experienced organizer. Together they became fruit pickers, at a time when the fruit growers had cut wages even lower than the workers had thought possible. A strike was brewing and Mac and Jim determined to hurry it along and to direct its course.

Luck was with them. Shortly after their arrival at the camp of the workers, Mac, by giving the impression that he was a doctor, delivered Lisa, daughter of the camp leader, of a baby. Word of his accomplishment spread throughout the area. After Mac and Jim became friendly with London, leader of the camp, and the other workers, they persuaded the fruit pickers to organize and to strike for higher wages and better living conditions. This was not easy to do. As usual, the orchard owners had made effective use of Communism as a bogey. Furthermore, the vigilantes were a constant menace, not to mention deputies, troops, and strikebreakers, all hirelings of the fruit growers. In addition, the authorities could always close down the camp by maintaining that it violated the sanitation laws and was a menace to public health. There was also the problem of money and food; the poor migrant workers desperately needed work to supply their daily necessities.

But at last a strike was called. On the night that the strikers were to sneak out to meet the strikebreakers called in by the owners, Mac and Jim were ambushed by vigilantes. They succeeded in escaping, but Jim was shot in the arm. Word of their plan for the next morning had leaked out, and they suspected that a stool pigeon was in their midst. Nevertheless, the next day they marched out to meet the strikebreakers at the railroad station, and to implore them not to fight against their fellow workers.

Although the police had assembled in force, they seemed afraid of the strikers. During the encounter, Joy, an old and crippled comrade, was shot and killed. The strikers carried the body back to the camp, and over the body of their comrade Mac delivered a fiery and eloquent speech, exhorting the strikers to carry on and to fight to the finish. This action proved to be the best of all possible spurs to bring the workers together, and the strikers were aroused to carry on the struggle even more fiercely.

Luck was with them in other ways. They had persuaded the father of Al Townsend, who owned a lunch cart and gave handouts to Party members, to allow them to camp on his farm, after they promised him that his crop would be picked and that his property would be protected. Doc Burton, a philosopher and skeptic, took charge of the sanitation, thus protecting the camp against the health inspectors. Dick, a handsome comrade, used his charms on women in order to get money and food for the strikers.

Meanwhile the owners tried everything to break up the strike. They attempted to intimidate the workers, to divide them, to bribe London, but all their efforts failed. Then another problem arose. The owners had an article published in which it was stated that the county was feeding the strikers. The report was not true, but those who sympathized with the strikers believed it and stopped helping them altogether. Dick was getting far fewer results from his endeavors, and the situation became desperate.

Mac was often on the point of losing his head, of letting his anger get the best of him, so that the strategy of the strike was sometimes imperiled. By contrast, Jim grew more able, more hardened. He ignored the women of the camp who sought to lure him into their tents, and did not allow his feeling for Lisa to become anything more than a casual, friendly relationship. Thus he provided a sort of balance for his emotional comrades.

Conditions grew worse. The strikers had practically no money, no food. Dick finally managed to get a cow and some beans, but the food sufficed for only a few days. Meanwhile, Doc Burton had vanished. Without his help, the sick and the wounded could not be attended to, and the sanitation of the camp grew progressively worse. One night someone managed to outwit the guards and set a barn afire. The barn and an adjacent kennel housing some favorite pointers were totally destroyed. The next day the owner called in the sheriff to evict the strikers.

The strike seemed lost. The spirits of the men were at a very low ebb, and they gave signs of yielding. On the following night a boy came and told Jim and Mac that Doc Burton was lying wounded in a field. They rushed out, only to realize, when they were fired upon, that they had fallen into a trap. Mac called out a word of warning and fell to the ground. When he got up, after the firing had stopped, he called out to Jim. He got no answer. Jim was dead. By that time the shots had aroused the others and they came forward. Over the body of his comrade and friend, Mac made a strong and rousing speech, urging the workers to stick together, to fight on, and to win the strike.

When Sigrid Undset was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1928, that award was made, according to the citation, "principally with regard to her powerful pictures of Northern life in medieval times." No one who has read Kristin Lavransdatter or The Master of Hestviken will deny the justice of that statement. Those not familiar with her novels must be prepared to find a writer who, while true to the life and spirit of a past age, pays little attention to the historical personages and actual events so necessary to the historical romancer. Madame Undset's stories of medieval life are so full-bodied and rich in detail that there is little need in her books for a parade of names and dates. In the Wilderness, the third volume of the Hestviken series, is the one exception to her usual practice, however, for the closing episode of this novel deals with the invasion of Norway by Duke Eirik of Sweden in 1308.

The Story:

Olav Audunsson had little desire to stay on at Hestviken through the summer following his wife's death, and when the sons of the English armorer in Oslo asked him to be shipmaster of their boat on a trading voyage to London it was plain that the idea pleased him. Eirik, Ingunn's son by the Icelfander, wanted also to go on the trip, but Olav told him nay—he must remain at Hestviken and be companion to little Cecilia, the daughter Ingunn had borne in her last years.

In England two adventures befell Olav. At evensong in the Dominican's church he saw a woman so much like dead Ingunn that for a moment his breath failed him. So like she was, and yet young enough to be his daughter. With her was a blind man, apparently her husband. Olav saw her again, at mass and evensong, and after a time they began to exchange glances and smiles. One night her serving-woman stopped him after the service and led him to a great house outside the walls. The strange woman was in the garden, her only dress a thin silk shift. For a moment Olav felt that he was about to clasp Ingunn again. Then he realized that she was only a wanton wife seeking sport with a stranger. Thrusting her from him, he ran away.

At another time he went with his shipmates to a famous shrine north of London. Separated from his companions, he wandered in the woods until he encountered some men beside a brook. That night they attacked him for his rich dress and jewels. While Olav fought with the robbers in the dark, he felt the battle-surge he had known in his outlawed youth. Later it seemed to him that he had been tempted by pleasures of the flesh and of violence, sent to lead him from the path of redemption he must follow to atone for the secret slaying of Teit, Eirik's father.

When Olav sailed home in late summer, he found Eirik grown taller and strong for his age and Cecilia fairer than ever, with promise of great beauty. Resolving that Liv, the slatternly serving-woman, was unfit to train the daughter of Hestviken, he wed Liv to Arnketil, his house-carl, and sent the pair to live at Rundmyr, the farm he carried on for Torhild Björnsdatter, who had borne him a son out of wedlock two years before. One day he went across the fjord to Auker, where Torhild was living, to discuss his arrangement. Seeing his son and Torhild again, he was minded to ask the woman to return and keep his house, but he sadly put the thought out of his mind.

After Liv and Arnketil moved to Rundmyr, the place began to have a bad reputation because of the dicing, wenching, and worse that went on there. At last Sira Hallbjörn, the priest, warned Olav to keep Eirik away from that thieves' den. For years Olav had been of two minds about Eirik. He wanted to like the boy whom he had claimed as his heir, yet he could not abide Eirik's insolence and boasting. He realized that he should give more time to his training but shrank from that duty because of the old clash of wills between them. Urged to marry again, he wanted no other wife beside him at table and bed.

His problem was solved in part when Asger Magnusson, an old friend, died in Tunsberg after asking Olav to foster his daughter Bothild and provide for his mother-in-law, Mæta Birgersdatter. Lady Mæta was grim and gaunt but capable. Never had Hestviken been better kept than it was under her charge. Cecilia and Bothild, close in age, lived as sisters. Lady Mæta dressed them well, and people said that in the whole southland there were no fairer maids than those at Hestviken.

But Eirik set himself against Lady Mæta from the first, and Olav was always angry when he was drawn into their rows and forced to rebuke the boy for the sake of a stranger. In the winter of Eirik's sixteenth year they quarreled after Olav found him in rude sport with a serving-girl. That night Eirik left Hestviken without farewell. There was no report of him at Rundmyr or among Olav's distant kin, but at last word came that he was in Oslo, among the men-at-arms who served Sir Ragnvald Torvaldsson. Knowing Sir Ragnvald a gentle knight from whom Eirik would learn the skills of weapons and courtly ways, Olav was satisfied. He went to Oslo and gave the runaway money and a squire's gear. There was much kindness between them when they parted, Olav almost in envy for Eirik's youth.

Three years passed more quietly than any Olav had known since boyhood. Cecilia was his great delight, with little in her nature to recall her weak-willed, sickly mother. One night some men from another parish came to Hestviken. After the drinking in the hall one of the men tried to seize Bothild and Cecilia. Bothild was terrified, but Cecilia drew her knife and slashed at the man until the blade was red. Olav felt that she should have been the boy of the house.

Olav, beginning to grow restless, was often in the company of Sira Hallbjörn, a priestly lover of falconry and hunting. One night, while they supped at a wedding feast, Olav's ancient Viking ax, Kin-fetch, rang. For a moment they saw in one another's eyes old pagan stirrings that neither could have spoken aloud. Riding home later that night, Olav went into the graveyard and called to Ingunn to arise.

On another day he went to Auken, where he found Torhild married to Ketil, a young man on the farm. Olav asked her to send Björn, their son, to live with him. She refused.

The snows lay deep that December when Duke Eirik crossed the border from Sweden to lead his troops against his father-in-law, King Haakon. Torhild brought word of the invasion to Hestviken one frosty dawn. After sending Cecilia, Bothild, and Lady Mæta to Auken for safety, Olav rode off to warn his neighbors. When the franklins tried to ambush the Swedes, they were routed by the mailed horsemen. Olav and Sira Hallbjörn were among the few who made their way to the manor at Sundrheim and there spent the Yule. Meanwhile the Swedes occupied Oslo and besieged Akershus, the royal fortress. Olav was in that great fight at Aker church and at Frysja bridge, where there was hard fighting to keep Duke Eirik from taking the castle. Sira Hallbjörn was killed at the bridge, and in the press a crossbow-bolt shattered Olav's jaw.

Olav lay in fever for days. After Duke Eirik withdrew from the siege, a merchant took Olav into Oslo and cared for him there. One day he looked at himself in a mirror. His cheek was furrowed and scarred and his hair was gray. When he went back to Hestviken in the spring, Olav felt that he had become an old man.

THEODORE COLVILLE, a middle-aged bachelor

MRS. LINA BOWEN, a middle-aged friend of Colville

IMOGENE GRAHAM, a girl chaperoned by Mrs. Bowen

EFFIE BOWEN, Mrs. Bowen's thirteen-year-old daughter

MR. MORTON, an admirer of Imogene Graham

Critique:

Many readers will find echoes in this novel of A Hazard of New Fortunes and the novels Howells wrote featuring Mr. and Mrs. Basil March in their later lives. In novels dealing with cultured older people, Howells was considerably more successful at sympathetic characterization than he was in such novels as The Rise of Silas Lapham. That he was infringing on the realm of Henry James, the master of fiction featuring American expatriates in Europe, Howells was well aware, for he comments jokingly about their work in one passage of this novel. As ever, Howells is in this novel a master of the realism of the commonplace. The details of life in the American colony in Florence at the time, the events of the pre-Lenten carnival season, and the background of the city are set forth explicitly.

The Story:

Theodore Colville studied architecture as a young man and in order to continue his professional education he spent some months in Italy. While there he went about with two young women and fell in love with one of them. The girl rejected his suit. Soon afterward he went back to the United States at the request of his older brother, who had recently purchased a newspaper. Returning to America, Colville became the editor of his brother's paper and finally purchased it. He entered politics in his fortieth year. After his defeat he left his home in Indiana and went at once again to Italy.

In Italy he tried to resume the study of architecture, but his interest was soon diverted by his meeting with Mrs. Bowen, who had been one of his companions in Italy years before, the one with whom he had not fallen in love. Mrs. Bowen, now a widow, invited Colville to visit at her home. When he went there, Colville met Mrs. Bowen's thirteen-year-old daughter Effie, who quickly became fond of him, and Imogene Graham, a twenty-year-old American woman whom Mrs. Bowen was chaperoning.

In company with Mrs. Bowen, Imogene Graham, and Effie Bowen, Mr. Colville spent a number of pleasant days and evenings. At first Imogene regarded him as an old man, since he was twice her age, but she soon realized that she enjoyed his company much more than that of many men her own age. In an effort to be companionable with her, Colville danced and went about socially as he had not done for many years. Mrs. Bowen also enjoyed Colville's company; the result was that they were together a great deal.

Mrs. Bowen chose carefully the places where she and her charges went. During the carnival season she permitted Colville to take them all to a masked ball. At the ball little Effie became ill and had to be taken home unexpectedly. As a result, Imogene and Colville were together unchaperoned during much of the evening. At that time they began to realize their affection for each other.

Mrs. Bowen quickly realized that a love affair was developing. She also realized that no one, least of all herself, had expected it. She tactfully pointed out to Imogene the differences between the girl and a man so much older. When she said, rather less tactfully, that she thought Colville had been trying only to be amusing, the girl reported the conversation to Colville. Hurt, he went to Mrs. Bowen and talked with her, finally agreeing to her suggestion that for propriety's sake he leave Florence. Unfortunately, it was a weekend, and Colville, having insufficient funds to leave the city after settling his hotel bills, was forced to wait until the following Monday. By that time Imogene had decided that it was unfair to make him leave the city because of her. She requested that he stay. He decided to do so.

A few days later Colville and Imogene met accidentally in a public park. Quickly coming to an agreement that they loved one another, they went back to Mrs. Bowen's residence and told her that they had decided to be married. Mrs. Bowen, as Imogene's chaperone, told them she would be forced to write immediately to the girl's parents to inform them of this recent development. The lovers, agreeing to her plan, also promised to say nothing about an official engagement until they heard from America. Imogene warned her chaperone, however, that she would marry Colville, even without her parents' consent.

While they were awaiting word from America, a young minister named Morton, also in love with Imogene, returned to Florence to pay her court. Both Colville and Mrs. Bowen wished to let the young man know the state of affairs, but the girl refused to permit them to tell Mr. Morton of her engagement. To make the situation appear normal, the four—Mrs. Bowen, Mr. Morton, Imogene, and Colville—went about together. Finally word came from Imogene's parents. Her mother had decided to sail for Europe, to see Colville for herself before giving her decision.

During the intervening days before Mrs. Graham's arrival, the four people went on an excursion to Fiesole to see the Etruscan ruins there. At one interval Colville and the young minister walked a short distance beside the carriage. While they were doing so, a peasant driving a band of sheep came over the brow of a hill. The horses, frightened at the sight of the sheep, began to back the carriage dangerously close to a precipitous drop at the side of the road. The two men rescued the women from the carriage. While Mr. Morton was taking Imogene from the vehicle, Colville ran to the horses' heads in an attempt to hold them. Unable to do so, and with his hand caught in the curb strap, he was dragged with the team when the carriage plunged over the edge of the road.

For two weeks Colville lay very ill.

When he was finally able to have visitors, Imogene's mother came to see him. She told him that she was taking her daughter to America immediately, even though she felt that Colville had acted as a gentleman in the entire affair. She then gave her reason for preventing the marriage. Her daughter, she said, was not really in love with Colville, although she thought too much of him to break the engagement. The shock was a great one to Colville, but he immediately saw that the girl's departure was the only answer to the problems that the situation had developed. After her mother left, Imogene herself came into the sickroom and bade Colville a hasty goodbye.

Some time later Mrs. Bowen and Colville talked over the affair. During the conversation they both admitted their love for each other. Mrs. Bowen refused to marry Colville, however, because of the embarrassing position in which she had been placed during his affair with Imogene. She had hated herself the whole time she tried to prevent the affair because, although she hoped she could see the situation objectively, she had always feared that her actions and thinking had been colored by her feeling for Colville.

Little Effie Bowen, having formed a very strong attachment for Colville, refused to hear of his departure. Within a few months, under the influence of their mutual love and Effie's attitude toward her mother's suitor, Mrs. Bowen was reconciled to a marriage. They were married quietly and then moved to Rome, where no one who knew them could spread gossip about the affair with Imogene. Not long after their marriage they heard that Mr. Morton, who had been deeply in love with Imogene, had been appointed to a church in a community near Buffalo, where the Grahams lived. Both Mr. and Mrs. Colville hoped that he and Imogene Graham would make a match of their own.

INDIANA

Type of work: Novel

Author: George Sand (Mme. Aurore Dudevant, 1804-1876)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: France

First published: 1832

Principal characters:

INDIANA, a young Creole

MONSIEUR DELMARE, her husband

NOUN, her foster sister and maid

RODOLPHE BROWN (SIR RALPH), Indiana's cousin

RAYMON DE RAMIÈRE, her lover

Critique:

Written at the height of the French romantic movement, Indiana exhibits all the conventions and idiosyncrasies of the most pronounced romanticism. For this reason modern readers find the characters unbelievable, their words and actions more laughable than tragic, despite the basic tragedy underlying the greater part of the story. The chief value of the book derives from the fact that it typifies a popular literary form and a philosophy which still survive, though in lesser degree, in contemporary literature.

The Story:

Indiana was married to pompous, quick-tempered Monsieur Delmare, a retired army officer no longer young. Loyal to her suspicious and jealous husband, she had lived a discontented, uneventful life. Her cousin, Sir Ralph Brown, himself unhappy and frustrated, was her only companion. Although Monsieur Delmare kept a watchful eye over the young couple, there was nothing untoward in the relationship between them. As a matter of fact, Sir Ralph had secured the good graces of Monsieur Delmare and was accepted as one of the household. If not an intimate friend, he was at least a close companion. Indiana was as reserved in her behavior toward Sir Ralph as she was toward her husband, but to a close observer it was clear that in a friendly, inarticulate manner, Sir Ralph was fond of Indiana.

The submerged tensions of the household erupted one evening when someone was discovered scaling the garden wall and entering the grounds of the estate. Monsieur Delmare rushed out and fired in the darkness at the intruder. When the wounded prowler was brought into the house, he revealed himself as Raymon de Ramière, a young man who, so he maintained, wished to see Monsieur Delmare about the latter's manufacturing enterprise. De Ramière said that his brother had a similar business in another part of the country and would profit by Delmare's information.

Delmare's suspicions were dissolved. He had not, however, noticed the behavior of Noun, Indiana's friend and maid. Noun had become extremely agitated at the entrance of de Ramière, a fact which nobody noticed in the excitement. She knew that de Ramière had come to the estate not to see Delmare on business, but to keep a rendezvous with her. Noun had been his mistress for some time. Once in the house, however, he was immediately attracted to Indiana, especially so since he was already tiring of Noun.

De Ramière began systematically his suit for Indiana's affections and to that end he enlisted the aid of both his mother and Indiana's aunt. Before long Indiana began to reciprocate his attentions and the affair became the subject of much discussion in Parisian salons. Delmare remained ignorant of the gossip. But in spite of de Ramière's urgent avowals and protestations, Indiana refused to yield herself to him because she preferred a pure and spiritual love. Upset by her refusals, de Ramière contracted a fever which kept him confined to his bed for several days. Indiana, too, was strongly affected and experienced several spells of swooning.

One night, impatient to achieve his desire, de Ramière impetuously entered the Delmare house. Indiana was away, but Noun was there awaiting the return of her mistress. The two met in Indiana's room and Noun, as passionate as ever, enticed the young man's surrender. Aroused by the return of Indiana, Noun escaped, leaving de Ramière to face her mistress alone. Indiana, disturbed to find her suitor in her room, ordered him to leave before his presence was discovered.

A short time later, Noun's body was discovered floating in a nearby stream. Pregnant, she had taken her life because of de Ramière's refusal to marry her or even to continue their relationship. Indiana was broken-hearted at the death of her maid and de Ramière himself was greatly perturbed. By that time he had tired of his pursuit of Indiana and had determined to forget her. One night Indiana, having decided at last to become his mistress in fact, went to his rooms. Learning that he was not at home, she waited until he returned at dawn. Then she offered herself to him. Unfortunately, while they were talking, dawn broke. Compromised by her presence in de Ramière's rooms at that hour, Indiana returned to her home, where Delmare, agitated by the discovery of her absence, received her with cold suspicion.

Soon afterward Delmare suffered business reverses and faced complete ruin. Indiana contritely went with him to the Isle of Bourbon, where he hoped to make another fortune. Unhappy in her new home, she lived only for the letters de Ramière wrote her. At last she decided to leave Delmare and arranged for her secret passage back to France. On her arrival in Paris, she learned that fickle de Ramière had recently married.

For weeks she lived a miserable existence. Penniless and starving, she decided to die. When she and Sir Ralph, who had followed her to Paris, were strangely reunited, they agreed to commit suicide by drowning. At the last minute, however, they changed their minds. Moved by Sir Ralph's devotion, Indiana realized that he was the man she truly loved. Together they forsook civilization and lived as recluses, away from all people and society, but satisfied and happy at last.

entire story covers only a single night in Dublin. O'Flaherty has given a realistic picture of the slum and its people, and of the tight-knit revolutionary organization which could flourish so completely only in Ireland.

The Story:

Francis McPhillip came to the door of the public lodging-house. He was unobtrusively and shabbily dressed. With the caution born of necessity, he waited in the doorway until he was sure he was not followed. He kept his hand inside his raincoat to touch the reassuring butt of his pistol. For six months he had been a hunted man, hiding out in the wild mountains.

It was in October that he had killed the secretary of the Farmers' Union. He had orders from the revolutionary organization to use his gun only if he had to; after the killing the organization had disavowed his act and expelled him. So he had been a lone fugitive. Now he was back in Dublin to see his family once more.

He searched among the public rooms crowded with Dublin's poor. In the dining-room he found the man he had come to see: Gypo Nolan. Gypo was eating from a huge plate of cabbage and bacon he had stolen from a locker. Francis sat down and inquired hoarsely of Gypo if the police were still watching his parents' house. Gypo gave only grunts at first, and then said he thought the coast was clear. After eating voraciously from Gypo's plate, Francis slipped out.

Gypo thought stolidly of his former companion in the organization. Then he thought bitterly of his empty pockets; he could not buy a bed tonight. He tried to link up these two facts, but Gypo thought only with great difficulty. The organization had expelled him too, for he had been Francis' companion at the time of the murder. Without Francis' agile brain he could make no plans. At last a light came. He marched off to the police station and told the officers where they could find Francis. For his information he received twenty pounds. Shortly afterward, Francis shot himself as police officers surrounded his father's house.

In a public house Gypo met Katie Fox, a prostitute who took care of him occasionally when he was destitute. He bought her a few glasses of gin and told her he had no need of her bed that night. She was suspicious because he was in funds and accused him of robbing a church. During the quarrel she accidentally let drop the word "informer." Gypo was startled. He was glad to leave her and go out in the night.

To keep up appearances, Gypo went to the McPhillip house. He quarreled with Francis' father, who blamed him for the wild life Francis had led. Francis' mother and his sister Mary, however, upheld Gypo for his visit of sympathy. As he left he gave Mrs. McPhillip four silver coins.

Bartly followed him out. Bartly was an organization member sent out to bring Gypo in. After Bartly made a taunting reference to the coins he had given Francis' mother, Gypo choked Bartly, and only the arrival of an armed friend saved his life. By threats and persuasion Gypo was led to the organization headquarters, where he met the feared and respected Dan Gallagher, the revolutionists' leader.

Because of his stupidity and his great strength, Gypo had no fear of men or guns, but Dan was intelligent and soon overcame Gypo's hostility. If Gypo could only give them a lead on the person who had informed the police of Francis' return, he would be taken back into the organization. Dan brought out a bottle and gave Gypo several drinks. Under their influence Gypo concocted a story: Rat Mulligan had a grudge against Francis for betraying his sister, and Gypo declared he had seen Rat following Francis away from the lodging-house. Though he was skeptical, Dan sent for Rat and ordered Gypo to appear for the hearing that night at one-thirty.

Followed by his shadow Bartly, Gypo went out confidently. In a street fight he knocked out a policeman from sheer exuberance. Trailed by an admiring rabble, he went to a lunch stand and bought food for all his admirers. In the confusion he slipped away from Bartly.

Gypo was elated. He had money; he was safe; he would be back in the organization. He went to a superior brothel and spent money recklessly. A well-dressed woman with a scar on her face held aloof. She refused Gypo's advances, saying she was the wife of an army officer and wanted to get back to London. Gypo gave her the fare and accepted the companionship of another girl, Maggie. Bartly found him with her and reminded him of the inquiry. Gypo gave Maggie a pound to take to Katie and followed Bartly willingly.

Meanwhile Dan had been at the McPhillip house to take the family's statements. He made love briefly to Mary and induced her to accompany him to the inquiry, a kangaroo court held in the wine cellar of a ruined house. Dan acted as prosecutor and three of his men were judges.

First Rat Mulligan was questioned, but it soon developed that Rat could not possibly have been the informer. When Gypo was brought in, Dan made a convincing case: Gypo knew where Francis was going, Gypo had left the lodging-house at the right time, Gypo had been squandering money all night. At last Gypo broke down and confessed his guilt. Dan had him imprisoned in a cellar room with armed guards at the door.

Long ago Francis had discussed with Gypo how to get out of the cell. In the ceiling there was a trapdoor covered with dirt. Exerting his great strength, Gypo seized an iron ring with his hands, and with his legs forced up both trapdoor and covering earth. As he scrambled out the alerted guards shot at him, but he got away. Dan was terrified. Gypo might go to the police and the secret organization would be broken up. Mary was astonished at the weakness of resourceful Dan. When he pulled himself together, he sent agents to cover the roads leading out of the area. Gypo was trapped.

Every time Gypo tried to leave the slum district, he found waiting guards. His only refuge was Katie's room. She let him stay, and he thankfully fell into brutish sleep. Somehow Katie began to think of her own lost and vicious life, and she identified her misery with Gypo. With a notion that she would be canonized, she crept off to inform the organization of Gypo's hiding place.

As four armed men closed in on him, Gypo awoke just in time to fight them off. He crippled two of them in a struggle on the stairs, but he was wounded several times as he ran to escape execution.

Gypo became weaker as he fled. Dan saw him but shrugged as he turned away. He knew the informer was done for. In growing confusion Gypo went into a church where early mass was being celebrated. With dimming vision he made out Mrs. McPhillip. He fell in front of her seat and confessed his treachery. When she forgave him, Gypo stood up and in a loud voice called to Francis that his mother had forgiven him. With a gurgle he fell forward and shivered as blood gushed from his mouth.

Critique:

The Innocent Voyage, equally well-known under its alternate English title, A High Wind in Jamaica, is an unusual novel on which the author has realistically shown the effect—or lack of effect—of a series of horrible experiences upon the minds of seven young children. These experiences include a hurricane, capture by pirates, seduction, murder, and a trial at Old Bailey. Written with varied humor that runs from macabre playfulness to biting satire, the novel ranks as a minor classic because of its convincing insights into the childhood psyche. For the world of childhood, as the writer makes plain, is quite different from the adult one, and also different from what most grownups suppose. The Bas-Thornton children are not young monsters, as some mistaken readers have supposed. They are children protected and insulated by the amorality of their own innocence from an adult world of compulsions, frustrations, and fears.

The Story:

Five young Bas-Thorntons lived on the family's run-down sugar plantation in Jamaica. On the day after Emily's tenth birthday they were allowed to make their first visit away from home. They went to meet Margaret and Harry Fernandez, children of creole neighbors, on a nearby plantation. The Fernandez children often ran around barefoot, like Negroes; Emily thought it quite wonderful. During their visit the region was shaken by a slight quake. Emily, wildly excited, galloped her pony into the sea. For the first time she realized that there were forces in the world over which neither she nor adults had any control.

If the earthquake was the most thrilling event of Emily's life, the death of a pet cat was soon to be the most terrible. The next evening, back home, a hurricane struck the island. While the house shook under the force of wind and rain, Tabby streaked through the house and dashed out into the storm pursued by a pack of wild jungle cats. That night the house and the surrounding countryside were blown flat, but the destruction was nothing compared with the mystery of Tabby's horrible fate.

Mr. and Mrs. Bas-Thornton had no way of knowing what was passing through the children's minds. Fearing that the hurricane must have been a shock to them, the parents reluctantly decided to send them back to England to school. They and the Fernandez children were shortly put aboard the Clorinda, in care of Captain James Marpole.

Off the Cuban coast pirates boarded the vessel. Her stores and valuables were seized, and the children removed to the marauder for their supper. Captain Marpole, mistaking efforts to return the children for the splash of bodies thrown overboard, left the scene under full sail. Later he wrote the Bas-Thorntons that the pirates had callously murdered the children. Actually, Captain Jonsen, leader of the pirate crew, was surprised to find himself the custodian of seven young travelers.

The Clorinda's cargo was auctioned off at Santa Lucia, Cuba. While playing, Emily's older brother John fell forty feet to his death from a warehouse doorway. The vessel presently put to sea with the surviving children.

For weeks the pirate ship sailed aimlessly over the ocean in search of booty. The children, allowed to do much as they pleased, amused themselves with two pigs and a monkey the vessel carried. Emily began to be aware of her identity as a separate personality; shipboard life which she had accepted unquestioningly at first began to disturb her. One night Captain Jonsen, drunk, came into the children's quarters. When he tried to stroke Emily's hair she bit his thumb. Margaret, more mature, was sick after the incident, but a few days later she went to the captain's cabin to live. From that time on she avoided the other children.

As both bore an individual weight of guilt, Emily and the captain evaded each other after the drunken incident, until a thigh wound Emily received from a marlin spike dropped by Rachel brought about a reconciliation. Captain Jonsen carried her to his cabin, dressed the gash, and gave her his bunk.

Emily was still confined to bed, her wound healing, when the pirates captured a Dutch steamer carrying a cargo of wild animals. Her captain was bound and left tied on the floor of Emily's cabin while Captain Jonsen and his crew amused themselves with the animals aboard their prize.

While Emily screamed futilely, the Dutch captain managed to roll toward a knife lying in a corner. He was not a handsome man. He seemed to have no neck and he reeked of cigar smoke; the fact that he was tied up like an animal added to Emily's terror. His fingers were groping for the blade when she threw herself out of her bunk. Seizing the knife, she slashed at him until he was covered with wounds. Leaving him to bleed to death, she then hurled the weapon toward the door and dragged herself back to the bunk.

Margaret was the first to enter the cabin, and so the first boatload of pirates to return from the captured steamer thought she had committed the crime. Horrified, they dropped her overboard to drown. The freebooters in the second boat, assuming that she had accidentally fallen in, picked her up. In the excitement caused by the murder no one noticed her come aboard, and she was not disturbed when she rejoined the younger children in the hold.

With the captain's death hanging over their heads, intimacy between children and pirates came to an end. Realizing the wantonness of her deed, Emily had to bear the double burden of her conscience and the fear that Margaret would identify the real culprit.

The sight of a man-of-war on the horizon finally brought Captain Jonsen to a decision; it was time he and the children parted company. With his ship disguised as a shabby cargo vessel, the Lizzie Green, he persuaded the captain of a passing steamship to relieve him of his young passengers. The children were laying their own plans for capturing another prize when the mate called Emily aside to coach her in what he hoped would be the children's story. Emily willingly promised to say that the captain of the Lizzie Green had rescued them from pirates; but it was she who, in a childish burst of confidence to the stewardess aboard the steamer, told the secret of the pirate vessel. On that information, a gunboat apprehended Captain Jonsen and his men; they were imprisoned in Newgate. The young Bas-Thorntons were reunited with their parents, who had sold the plantation and moved to England. Margaret and Harry Fernandez went to stay with relatives.

Although Emily had revealed their captors' identities readily enough, the prosecuting attorney had good reason for doubting his ability to obtain a conviction. The children told about the pirates' monkey and some turtles the Clorinda had carried, but of life aboard the pirate ship they had little to say. All memory of John seemed obliterated from their minds. It was accepted by the grownups, and gradually by the children, that he had died trying to protect the girls. This conclusion was substantiated by Margaret's condition of shock and loss of memory.

Emily became the chief witness for the Crown. Asked about the Dutch captain and the possibility that he had been murdered, she became hysterical but managed to say she had seen him lying in a pool of blood. Her statement was enough for a conviction. As she left the courtroom she saw in Captain Jonsen's eyes the same desperate and despairing look she had seen in Tabby's the night of the hurricane. Captain Jonsen was condemned to be hanged.

A few days later Emily was taken to her new school by her parents. The head mistress spoke feelingly of the experiences Emily had undergone, but anyone else, looking at her, would have found that Emily's innocent young face blended perfectly with the others as she stood chattering with the quiet-mannered young ladies who were to be her new friends.

THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

Type of work: Drama

Author: Nikolai V. Gogol (1809-1852)

Type of plot: Political satire

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Russia

First presented: 1836

Principal characters:

ANTON ANTONOVICH SKVOZNIK-DMUKHANOVSKY, prefect of a small provincial town

ANNA, his wife

MARIA, his daughter

IVAN ALEXANDROVICH HLESTAKOV, a traveler

OSIP, Ivan's servant

Critique:

This comedy, the high point of Gogol's work in the drama, represents an effective protest on his part against the fumbling, venal bureaucracy of Russia's small towns. Under the tsars, favoritism was rife, and the practice of giving and accepting bribes and favors is here satirized. The characters in the play are numerous but unimportant. The situation, which is credibly presented, and the system of government portrayed are what make this comedy live. The resemblances to modern manners and customs are close enough for us to enjoy the basic similarity to bureaucratic institutions in our own time.

The Story:

The prefect of the town, Anton Antonovich, had received a disquieting letter. A friend wrote that an inspector was coming to visit the province and particularly his district. The inspector would probably travel incognito. The friend advised the prefect to clean up the town and hide evidence of any bribes that might discredit him. Anton in haste called a meeting of the local dignitaries and instructed them how to make a good impression on the official from the capital.

Artemy Filippovich Zemlyanika, the hospital manager, was advised to put clean nightcaps on the patients and take away their strong tobacco for a time. The manager was thoughtful; he had always proceeded on the theory that if a patient were going to die, he would die anyway. He decided, however, to clean up both the patients and the hospital and to put up a sign in Latin over each bed to tell the patient's malady.

Ammos Fedorovich Lyapkin-Tyapkin, the judge, spent most of his time hunting. He kept a whip and other sporting equipment in his courtroom, and in the vestibule the porter kept a flock of geese. His assessor always smelled of liquor. Ammos protested that the assessor was injured as a baby and had smelled of brandy ever since. Anton suggested that he be made to eat garlic to cover the smell.

Luka Lukich Hlopov, the head of the school, was advised to cover up the more obvious foibles of his teachers. The one with a fat face, for instance, always made horrible grimaces when a visitor came and pulled his beard under his necktie, and the history teacher jumped on his desk when he described the Macedonian wars.

Piqued by a recital of their weaknesses, the others turned on Anton and reminded him that he took money bribes and only recently had had the wife of a non-commissioned officer flogged. During the wrangle the postmaster came in to see if they had had any news of the inspector's arrival. Anton advised the postmaster to open all letters in an attempt to discover who the inspector might be and when he would arrive. The advice was superfluous, for the postmaster always read all the letters anyway.

Two squires of the town, Bobchinsky and Dobchinsky, rushed in with exciting news. A mysterious stranger, obviously a high-born gentleman, was at that moment lodging in the local inn, and had been there a fortnight. His servant had let it out that his master was from St. Petersburg. Sure that the stranger was the inspector, the company trembled to think what he might already have learned. They scattered to repair any damage they could.

At the inn Osip was lying on his master's bed and ruminating on the queerness of gentlefolk. His gentleman was always gambling, always broke, always selling his clothes to get funds. They were stuck in this wretched inn because there was no money to pay their bill. At this point, Ivan Alexandrovich burst in, loudly calling for supper.

When the waiter was summoned, he insolently refused to serve Ivan until the guest had paid his bill. After a long argument, some watery soup and a tough hen were brought, and perforce Ivan dined poorly. As the dishes were being removed amidst a tussle between Osip and the waiter for the remains of the supper, visitors were announced.

Nervous and apologetic, the prefect stood before Ivan's august person. Ivan thought, however, that he was to be put in jail. For a time the conversation was at cross purposes, but Ivan had the nimbler wit and allowed the prefect to do most of the talking. When he began to suspect what Anton was trying to say, he coolly accepted two hundred roubles to pay his bill, an invitation to stay at the prefect's house, and a nomination as the guest of honor at an official dinner at the hospital.

Anna and Maria were arguing about clothes, as usual, when Dobchinsky rushed in to announce the arrival of the inspector and his fine condescension in coming to stay at their house. Dobchinsky thought that he was being honest when he assured them their guest was a general. Thrilled at the idea of entertaining a general, the two ladies began to primp and preen.

When the men came in, Anton tried to impress the inspector by saying that he never played cards. Ivan approved; he especially abhorred gambling. Osip snickered at his master's remark, but fortunately he was not noticed. To impress the household Ivan then informed them that he was an author; besides writing for the papers he composed poetry and novels. When he referred casually to his high political connections, his hearers were agog, particularly the ladies. Meanwhile

Ivan was steadily drinking wine. At last he fell into a drunken sleep in his chair.

With only Osip remaining, Anton tried to pump the servant as to his master's habits and tastes, while the ladies tried to find out something about Ivan's love life. Since Anton kept giving him money, Osip obliged by telling many details of his master's place in high society.

Ivan was put to bed to sleep off the wine. When he awoke, the dignitaries of the town waited on him one by one. Ammos, the judge, introduced himself and asked for the inspector's orders. Ivan carelessly promised to speak well of the judge to his friends, and just as carelessly borrowed money from his suppliant. The postmaster was impressed with Ivan's friendliness and was glad to lend him three hundred roubles. Both Luka and Artemy were glad to lend the inspector three or four hundred roubles, but Bobchinsky and Dobchinsky together could raise only sixty-five roubles.

When the petitioners left, Osip begged his master to leave while the pickings were still good. Ivan, agreeing that immediate departure might be prudent, sent the servant to make arrangements. Osip wangled the best coach the town could offer. In the meantime several shopkeepers also came in to protest against the prefect, who was making them pay tribute. From them Ivan borrowed five hundred roubles.

When Maria came in, Ivan was so elated at his successes that he made love to her and finally kissed her on the shoulder. The daughter scurried away as her mother came in, and Ivan ogled the older lady, too. The daughter came back, full of curiosity, and in his confusion Ivan proposed marriage to Maria, who accepted him graciously. After writing a letter to a friend, in which he detailed his humorous adventures, Ivan left town. He promised, however, to return the next day.

In the morning Anton and his wife received the envious congratulations of friends. The ladies, green with envy, assured Maria that she would be a belle in St. Petersburg society. The parents, much taken with the idea, decided that their new son-in-law would insist on taking the whole family to live in the capital. Anton was sure that he would be made a general at least.

At that moment the postmaster arrived with Ivan's letter. When he read the frank description of the pretended inspector's love-making and his franker opinion of the muddle-headed town officials, the tremendous hoax gradually dawned on the company.

As the crestfallen crowd was counting up the losses, a gendarme came in with an official announcement. An inspector from St. Petersburg had just arrived and desired them all to wait upon him immediately. He was staying at the inn.

IOLANTHE

Type of work: Comic opera

Author: W. S. Gilbert (1836-1911)

Type of plot: Humorous satire

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: 1882

Principal characters:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR

STREPHON, an Arcadian shepherd

QUEEN OF THE FAIRIES

IOLANTHE, Strephon's fairy mother

PHYLLIS, a shepherdess and ward in Chancery

THE EARL OF MOUNTARARAT, and

EARL TOLLOLLER, her suitors

PRIVATE WILLIS, a palace guard

Critique:

The story of a shepherd lad, the top of him a fairy but his feet mired in human form, Iolanthe, Or, The Peer and the Peri is a light-hearted satire on many human foibles. In particular, the drama pokes fun at the House of Lords, but it is such gentle fun that no one in Victorian England could take offense. Iolanthe is a delightful comedy, one of many from the pen of Sir William Schwenck Gilbert, whose name will always be associated with that of his composer-collaborator, Sir Arthur Seymour Sullivan.

The Story:

The Fairy Queen had banished Iolanthe because she had married a mortal. Normally the punishment for such an act was death, but the queen so loved Iolanthe that she had been unable to enforce a penalty so grave. Iolanthe had been sentenced to penal servitude for life, on the condition that she never see her mortal husband again. At last the other fairies begged the queen to relent, to set aside even this punishment, for Iolanthe had served twenty-five years of her sentence by standing on her head at the bottom of a stream.

The queen, unable to resist their pleas, summoned the penitent Iolanthe and pardoned her. Iolanthe explained that she had stayed in the stream to be near her son Strephon, an Arcadian shepherd who was a fairy to his waist and a human from the waist down. While they spoke, Strephon entered, announcing that he was to be married that day to Phyllis, a ward of Chancery. The Lord Chancellor had not given his permission, but Strephon was determined to marry his Phyllis anyway. He was delighted when he learned that his mother had been pardoned, but he begged her and all the fairies not to tell Phyllis that he was half fairy. He feared that she would not understand.

The queen determined to make Strephon a member of Parliament, but Strephon said that he would be no good in that august body, for the top of him was a Tory, the bottom a Radical. The queen solved that problem by making him a Liberal-Unionist and taking his mortal legs under her particular care.

Phyllis talked with Strephon and warned him that to marry her without the Lord Chancellor's permission would mean lifelong penal servitude for him. But Strephon could not wait the two years until she was of age. He feared that the Lord Chancellor himself or one of the peers of the House of Lords would marry her before that time had passed.

Strephon's fears were well founded; the Lord Chancellor did want to marry his ward. Fearing that he would have to punish himself for marrying her without his permission, however, he decided to give her instead to one of the peers of the House of Lords. Two were at last selected, the Earl of Mountararat and Earl Tolloller, but there was no agreement as to the final choice. Phyllis herself did not wish to accept either, for she loved only Strephon. Then she saw Strephon talking with Iolanthe, who, being a fairy, looked like a young and beautiful girl, even though she was Strephon's mother. Phyllis was filled with jealousy, augmented by the laughter of the peers when Strephon in desperation confessed that Iolanthe was his mother. Weeping that he had betrayed her, Phyllis left Strephon. No one had ever heard of a son who looked older than his mother.

The Fairy Queen herself told the Lord Chancellor and the peers that they would rue their laughter over Iolanthe and her son. To punish them, Strephon would change all existing laws in the House of Lords. He would abolish the rights of peers and give titles to worthy commoners. Worst of all, from then on peers would be chosen by competitive examinations. Strephon would be a foe they would not soon forget.

The queen's prediction came true. Strephon completely ruled the House of Lords. Every bill he proposed was passed, the fairies making the other members vote for Strephon even when they wanted to vote against him. The peers appealed to the fairies, but although the fairies admired the peers, they could not be swayed against Strephon.

The Earl of Mountararat and Earl Toller tried to decide who should have Phyllis. Each wanted the other to sacrifice himself by giving up all rights to her. Both had a family tradition that they must fight anyone who took their sweethearts, and since a fight meant that one of them would die and the survivor would be left without his friend, each wanted to make the sacrifice of losing his friend. At last the two decided that friendship was more important than love. Both renounced Phyllis.

Strephon and Phyllis met again, and at last he convinced her that Iolanthe was really his mother. Phyllis still could not believe that Strephon looked like a fairy, and she could not quite understand that his grandmother and all his aunts looked as young as his mother. She was sensible, however, and promised that whenever she saw Strephon kissing a very young girl she would know the woman was an elderly relative. There was still the Lord Chancellor to contend with. When they went to Iolanthe and begged her to persuade him to consent to their marriage, Iolanthe told them that the Lord Chancellor was her mortal husband. He believed her dead and himself childless, and if she looked on him the queen would carry out the penalty of instant death.

Iolanthe could not resist the pleas of the young lovers. As she told the Lord Chancellor that she was his lost wife, the queen entered and prepared to carry out the sentence of death against Iolanthe. Before she could act, however, the other fairies entered and confessed that they too had married peers in the House of Lords. The queen grieved, but the law was clear. Whoever married a mortal must die. But the Lord Chancellor's great knowledge of the law saved the day. It would now read that whoever did not marry a mortal must die. Thinking that a wonderful solution, the queen took one of the palace guards, Private Willis, for her husband. Knowing that from now on the House of Lords would be recruited from persons of intelligence, because of Strephon's law, the peers could see that they were of little use. Sprouting wings, they all flew away to Fairyland.

IPHIGENIA IN AULIS

Type of work: Drama

Author: Euripides (480-406 B.C.)

Type of plot: Classical tragedy

Time of plot: Beginning of Trojan War

Locale: Aulis, on the west coast of Euboea

First presented: 405 B.C.

Principal characters:

AGAMEMNON, King of Mycenae

CLYTEMNESTRA, his wife

IPHIGENIA, their daughter

ACHILLES, a Greek warrior

MENELAUS, King of Sparta

Critique:

In Iphigenia in Aulis, Agamemnon, the co-commander of all the Greek forces in the Trojan War, impresses one as being essentially the civilian executive, the upper middle-class husband and father who would rather be dictating business, not military policies. Likewise, Clytemnestra, his wife, resembles the society-conscious suburban matron, rather than a queen. Hence, despite its heroic background and despite the nominally heroic aspects of its characters, the play is in many respects a domestic tragedy. Lacking are the terrible and compulsive passions which motivate the story of Clytemnestra and Agamemnon in the dramas of Aeschylus.

The Story:

At Aulis, on the west coast of Euboea, part of Greece, the Greek host had assembled for the invasion of Ilium, the war having been declared to rescue Helen, wife of King Menelaus, after her abduction by Paris, a prince of Troy. Lack of wind, however, prevented the sailing of the great fleet.

While the ships lay becalmed, Agamemnon, commander of the Greek forces, consulted Calchas, a seer. The oracle prophesied that all would go well if Iphigenia, Agamemnon's oldest daughter, were sacrificed to the goddess Artemis. At first Agamemnon was reluctant to see his daughter so destroyed; but at last Menelaus, his brother, persuaded him that nothing else would move the weather-bound fleet. Agamemnon wrote to Clytemnestra, his queen, and asked her to conduct Iphigenia to Aulis, his pretext being that Achilles, the outstanding warrior among the Greeks, would not embark unless he were given Iphigenia in marriage.

The letter having been dispatched, Agamemnon had a change of heart; he felt that his continued popularity as co-leader of the Greeks was a poor exchange for the life of his beloved daughter. In haste he dispatched a second letter countermanding the first, but Menelaus, suspicious of his brother, intercepted the messenger and struggled with him for possession of the letter. When Agamemnon came upon the scene, he and Menelaus exchanged bitter words. Menelaus accused his brother of being weak and foolish, and Agamemnon accused Menelaus of supreme selfishness in urging the sacrifice of Iphigenia.

During this exchange of charge and countercharge a messenger announced the arrival of Clytemnestra and Iphigenia in Aulis. The news plunged Agamemnon into despair; weeping, he regretted his kingship and its responsibilities. Even Menelaus was affected, so that he suggested disbanding the army. Agamemnon thanked Menelaus but declared it was too late to turn back from the course they had elected to follow. Actually, Agamemnon was afraid of Calchas and of Odysseus, and he believed that widespread disaffection and violence would break out in the Greek army if the sacrifice were not made. Some Chalcian women who had come to see the fleet lamented that the love of Paris for Helen had brought such stir and misery instead of happiness.

When Clytemnestra arrived, accompanied by Iphigenia and her young son, Orestes, she expressed pride and joy over the approaching nuptials of her daughter and Achilles. Agamemnon greeted his family tenderly; touching irony displayed itself in the conversation between Agamemnon, who knew that Iphigenia was doomed to die, and Iphigenia, who thought her father's ambiguous words had a bearing only on her approaching marriage. Clytemnestra inquired in motherly fashion about Achilles' family and background. She was scandalized when the heartbroken Agamemnon asked her to return to Argos, on the excuse that he could arrange the marriage details. When Clytemnestra refused to leave the camp, Agamemnon sought the advice of Calchas. Meanwhile the Chalcian women forecast the sequence of events of the Trojan War and hinted in their prophecy that death was certain for Iphigenia.

Achilles, in the meantime, insisted that he and his Myrmidons were impatient with the delay and anxious to get on with the invasion of Ilium. Clytemnestra, meeting him, mentioned the impending marriage, much to the mystification of Achilles, who professed to know nothing of his proposed marriage to Iphigenia. The messenger then confessed Agamemnon's plans to the shocked Clytemnestra and Achilles. He also mentioned the second letter and cast some part of the guilt upon Menelaus. Clytemnestra, grief-stricken, prevailed upon Achilles to help her in saving Iphigenia from death by sacrifice.

Clytemnestra then confronted her husband, who was completely unnerved when he realized that Clytemnestra was at last in possession of the dreadful truth. She rebuked him fiercely, saying that she had never really loved him because he had slain her beloved first husband and her first child. Iphigenia, on her knees, implored her father to save her and asked Orestes, in his childish innocence, to add his pleas to his mother's and her own. Although Agamemnon was not heartless, he knew that the sacrifice must be made. He argued that Iphigenia would die for Greece, a country and a cause greater than them all.

Achilles, meanwhile, spoke to the army in behalf of Iphigenia, but he admitted his failure when even his own Myrmidons threatened to stone him if he persisted in his attempt to stop the sacrifice. At last he mustered enough loyal followers to defend the girl against Odysseus and the entire Greek host. Iphigenia refused his aid, however, saying that she had decided to offer herself as a sacrifice for Greece. Achilles, in admiration, offered to place his men about the sacrificial altar so that she might be snatched to safety at the last moment.

Iphigenia, resigned to certain death, asked her mother not to mourn for her. Then she marched bravely to her death in the field of Artemis. Clytemnestra was left in prostration in her tent. Iphigenia, at the altar, said farewell to all that she held dear and submitted herself to the sacrifice.

The Chalcian women, onlookers at the sacrifice, invoked Artemis to fill the Greek sails now with wind so that the ships might carry the army to Troy to achieve eternal glory for Greece.

IPHIGENIA IN TAURIS

Type of work: Drama

Author: Euripides (480-406 B.C.)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Several years after the Trojan War

Locale: Tauris, in the present-day Crimea

First presented: c. 420 B.C.

Principal characters:

IPHIGENIA, a priestess of Artemis

ORESTES, her brother

PYLADES, Orestes' friend

THOAS, King of Tauris

ATHENA, goddess of the hunt

Critique:

Actually, Iphigenia in Tauris is not a tragedy in the classic sense at all; instead, it is a romantic melodrama. Iphigenia, after years in a barbaric land, may still have felt hatred for the Greeks, but her sentimental longing to return to Argolis, her birthplace and the scene of her happy childhood, was intense. Her feelings are described most touchingly by Euripides. The play abounds in breathtaking situations of danger and in sentimental passages of reminiscence. The recognition scene is perhaps the most thrilling, if not the most protracted in the classic Greek drama. Goethe dramatized this story in his Iphigenie auf Tauris (1787).

The Story:

When the Greek invasion force, destined for Ilium, was unable to sail from Aulis because of a lack of wind, Agamemnon, the Greek commander, appealed to Calchas, a Greek seer, for aid. Calchas said that unless Agamemnon gave Iphigenia, his oldest daughter, as a sacrifice to Artemis, the Greek fleet would never sail. By trickery Agamemnon succeeded in bringing Clytemnestra, his queen, and Iphigenia to Aulis, where the maiden was offered up to propitiate the goddess. At the last moment, however, Artemis substituted a calf in Iphigenia's place and spirited the maiden off to the barbaric land of Tauris, where she was doomed to spend the rest of her life as a priestess of Artemis. One of Iphigenia's duties was to prepare Greek captives—any Greek who was apprehended in Tauris was by law condemned to die—for sacrifice in the temple of the goddess.

Iphigenia had been a priestess in Tauris for many years when, one night, she had a dream which she interpreted to mean that her brother Orestes had met his death; now there could be no future for her family, Orestes having been the only son.

Orestes, however, was alive; in fact, he was actually in Tauris. After he and his sister Electra had murdered their mother to avenge their father's death at her hands, the Furies had pursued Orestes relentlessly. Seeking relief, Orestes was told by the Oracle of Delphi that he must procure a statue of Artemis which stood in the temple of the goddess in Tauris and take it to Athens. Orestes would then be free of the Furies.

Orestes and his friend Pylades reached the temple and were appalled at the sight of the earthly remains of the many Greeks who had lost their lives in the temple. They resolved, however, to carry out their mission of stealing the statue of Artemis.

Meanwhile Iphigenia, disturbed by her dream, aroused her sister priestesses and asked their help in mourning the loss of her brother. In her loneliness she remembered Argos and her carefree childhood. A messenger interrupted her reverie with the report that one of two young Greeks on the shore had in a frenzy slaughtered Taurian cattle which had been led to the sea to bathe. The slayer was Orestes, under the influence of the Furies. In the fight which followed Orestes and Pylades held off great numbers of Taurian peasants, but at last the peasants succeeded in capturing the two youths. The Greeks were brought to Thoas, the King of Tauris.

Iphigenia, as a priestess of Artemis, directed that the strangers be brought before her. Heretofore she had always been gentle with the doomed Greeks and had never participated in the bloody ritual of sacrifice. Now, depressed by her dream, she was determined to be cruel.

Orestes and Pylades, bound, were brought before Iphigenia. Thinking of her own sorrow, she asked them if they had sisters who would be saddened by their deaths. Orestes refused to give her any details about himself, but he answered her inquiries about Greece and about the fate of the prominent Greeks in the Trojan War. She learned to her distress that her father was dead by her mother's treachery and that Orestes was still alive, a wanderer.

Deeply moved, Iphigenia offered to spare Orestes if he would deliver a letter for her in Argos. Orestes magnanimously gave the mission to Pylades; he himself would remain to be sacrificed. When he learned that Iphigenia would prepare him for the ritual, he wished for the presence of his sister to cover his body after he was dead. Iphigenia, out of pity, promised to do this for him. She went to bring the letter. Orestes and Pylades were convinced that she was a Greek. Pylades then declared that he would stay and die with his friend. Orestes, saying that he was doomed to die anyway for the murder of his mother, advised Pylades to return to Greece, marry Electra, and build a temple in his honor.

Iphigenia, returning with the letter, told Pylades that it must be delivered to one Orestes, a Greek prince. The letter urged Orestes to come to Tauris to take Iphigenia back to her beloved Argos; it explained how she had been saved at Aulis and spirited by Artemis to Tauris. Pylades, saying that he had fulfilled the mission, handed the letter to Orestes. Iphigenia, doubtful, was finally convinced of Orestes' identity when he recalled familiar details of their home in Argos. While she pondered escape for the three of them, Orestes explained that first it was necessary for him to take the statue of Artemis, in order to avoid destruction. He asked Iphigenia's aid.

Having received a promise of secrecy from the priestesses who were present, Iphigenia carried out her plan of escape. As Thoas, curious about the progress of the sacrifice, entered the temple, Iphigenia appeared with the statue in her arms. She explained to the mystified Thoas that the statue had miraculously turned away from the Greek youths because their hands were stained by domestic murder. She declared to King Thoas that it was necessary for her secretly to cleanse the statue and the two young men in sea water. She commanded the people of Tauris to stay in their houses lest they too be tainted.

When Orestes and Pylades were led from the temple in chains, Thoas and his retinue covered their eyes so that they would not be contaminated by evil. Iphigenia joined the procession and marched solemnly to the beach. There she ordered the king's guards to turn their backs on the secret cleansing rites. Fearful for Iphigenia's safety, the guards looked on. When they beheld the three Greeks entering a ship, they rushed down to the vessel and held it back. The Greeks beat off the Taurians and set sail. The ship, however, was caught by tidal currents and forced back into the harbor.

Thoas, angry, urged all Taurians to spare no effort in capturing the Greek ship. Then the goddess Athena appeared to Thoas and directed him not to go against the will of Apollo, whose Oracle of Delphi had sent Orestes to Tauris to get the statue of Artemis. Thoas meekly complied. Iphigenia, Orestes, and Pylades returned to Greece, where Orestes, having set up the image of the Taurian Artemis in Attica, was at last freed from the wrath of the Furies. Iphigenia continued, in a new temple, to be a priestess of Artemis.

THE ITCHING PARROT

Type of work: Novel

Author: José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi (1776-1827)

Type of plot: Picaresque satire

Time of plot: The 1770's to 1820's

Locale: Mexico

First published: 1816

Principal characters:

PEDRO SARMIENTO, The Itching Parrot, or Poll, a young Mexican

DON ANTONIO, Poll's prison mate and benefactor

JANUARIO, Poll's schoolmate

AN ARMY COLONEL, Poll's superior and benefactor

Critique:

This novel, written by the most rabid controversialist among Mexican authors during the unsettled years when Mexico was seeking to become independent of Spain, was suppressed after the publication of the eleventh chapter in 1816, and the complete novel was not published until three years after the author's death. Scholars have viewed it as the first Spanish-American novel, and it is reputed to have sold over one hundred million copies. Lizardi managed to smuggle into the novel most of the polemical tracts which had earned him nationwide fame as The Mexican Thinker, pamphlets directed against whoever sat at the head of the Mexican government, whether he was Spanish viceroy or revolutionist dictator. Lizardi, like his fictional hero, spent many months in jail. He considered himself a no-party man, and many Mexican regimes resorted to prison sentences to silence him; but Lizardi, always placing Mexico above its rulers, alternately satirized and advised them.

The Story:

Pedro Sarmiento was born to upper middle-class parents in Mexico City between 1771 and 1773; of the actual date, he was not sure. As a child he was willful, and his mother's excessive devotion only made him worse. He became such a scamp that at last his father sent him off to school. At school he was nicknamed Parrot. A little later, when he contracted the itch, his schoolmates nicknamed him The Itching Parrot, or Poll for short, and the name stuck to him through most of his life.

In addition to his nickname, Poll acquired many vicious habits from his school-fellows. Poll's father resolved to put Poll out as an apprentice in a trade, but Poll's mother, not wishing her son to disgrace her family by becoming a vulgar tradesman, insisted that the boy be sent to college. Against his better judgment, the father agreed, and so Poll was sent off to study for a college degree. After learning some Latin, some Aristotle, some logic, and a little physics, Poll was awarded a baccalaureate degree by the College of San Ildefonso.

Shortly after receiving his degree, Poll went into the countryside to visit a hacienda owned by the father of a former schoolmate. At the hacienda he earned the hatred of his schoolmate, Januario, by making advances to the latter's cousin, with whom Januario was infatuated.

Januario took his revenge by tempung Poll into a bullfight. Poll, who lost both the fight and his trousers, became the laughingstock of the hacienda. Still unsatisfied, Januario tricked Poll into trying to sleep with the girl cousin. Through Januario, the girl's mother discovered the attempt, beat Poll with her shoe, and sent him back to Mexico City in disgrace.

Upon his return to the city Poll was told by his father that he had to find some means of earning a livelihood. Poll, searching for the easiest way, decided he would study theology and enter the Church. Theology quickly proved uninteresting, and Poll gave up that idea. Trying to escape his father's insistence that he learn a trade, Poll then decided to enter a Franciscan monastery. There he soon found that he could not stand the life of a monk; he was glad when his father's death gave him an excuse to leave the monastery. After a short period of mourning Poll rapidly exhausted his small inheritance through his fondness for gambling, parties, and women. The sorrow he caused his mother sent her, also, to an early death. After his mother died, Poll was left alone. None of his relatives, who knew him for a rogue, would have anything to do with him.

In his despair Poll fell in with another schoolmate, who supported himself by gambling and trickery. Poll took up a similar career in his schoolmate's company. A man he gulled discovered Poll's treachery and beat him severely. After his release from the hospital Poll went back to his gambling partner and they decided to turn thieves. On their very first attempt, however, they were unsuccessful. Poll was caught and thrown into prison.

Because he had no family or friends to call upon, Poll languished in jail for several months. He made one friend in jail who helped him; that friend was Don Antonio, a man of good reputation who had been unjustly imprisoned. Although Don Antonio tried to keep Poll away from bad company, he was not entirely successful. When Don Antonio was freed, Poll fell in with a mulatto who got him into all kinds of scrapes. By chance Poll was taken up by a scrivener who was in need of an apprentice and was pleased with Poll's handwriting. The scrivener had Poll released from prison to become his apprentice.

Poll's career as a scrivener's apprentice was short, for he made love to the man's mistress, was discovered, and was driven from the house. The next step in Poll's adventures was service as a barber's apprentice. He left that work to become a clerk in a pharmacy. After getting into trouble by carelessly mixing a prescription, Poll left the pharmacy for the employ of a doctor.

Having picked up some jargon and a few cures from his doctor-employer, Poll set out to be a physician. Everything went well until he caused a number of deaths and was forced to leave the profession.

Trying to recoup his fortunes once more, Poll returned to gambling. In a game he won a lottery ticket which, in its turn, won for him a small fortune. For a time Poll lived well; he even married a girl who thought he had a great deal of money. But the life the couple led soon exhausted the lottery money, and they were almost penniless again. After his wife died in childbirth, Poll set out once again in search of his fortune. His work as a sacristan ended when he robbed a corpse. Poll then joined a group of beggars. Finding that they were fakers, he reported them to the authorities. One of the officials, pleased with Poll, secured him a place in government service.

For a time all went well, but Poll, who was left in charge of the district when his superior was absent, abused his authority so much that he was arrested and sent in chains to Mexico City. There he was tried, found guilty of many crimes, and sent to the army for eight years.

Through his good conduct and pleasing appearance, Poll was made clerk to the colonel of the regiment. The colonel placed a great deal of trust in Poll. When the regiment went to Manila, the colonel saw to it that Poll was given an opportunity to do some trading and save up a small fortune. Poll completed his sentence and prepared to return to Mexico as a fairly rich man. All his dreams and fortune vanished, however, when the ship sank and he was cast away upon an island. On the island he made friends with a Chinese, in whose company Poll, pretending all the while to be a nobleman, returned to Mexico. When they reached Mexico the lie was discovered, but the Chinese continued to be Poll's friend and patron.

Poll stayed with the Chinese for some time, but he finally left in disgrace after having introduced prostitutes into the house. Leaving Mexico City, Poll met the mulatto who had been his companion in jail. Along with the mulatto and some other men, Poll turned highwayman but barely escaped with his life from their first holdup. Frightened, Poll went into retreat at a church, where he discovered his confessor to be a boy he had known years before in school. The kind confessor found honest employment for Poll as an agent for a rich man. Poll became an honest, hardworking citizen, even being known as Don Pedro rather than Poll or The Itching Parrot. Years passed quickly. Then one day Don Pedro, befriending some destitute people, found the man to be his old benefactor of prison days, Don Antonio. The other people were Don Antonio's wife and daughter. Don Pedro married the girl, thus completing his respectability. He lived out the rest of his days in honesty, industry, and respect.

JACK OF NEWBERRY

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Deloney (1543?-1607?)

Type of plot: Picaresque adventure

Time of plot: Reign of Henry VIII

Locale: England

First published: 1597

Principal characters:

JACK WINCHCOMB, a weaver

JACK'S MASTER'S WIDOW

JACK'S SECOND WIFE

HENRY VIII, King of England

QUEEN CATHERINE, his wife

CARDINAL WOLSEY, Lord Chancellor of England

Critique:

Jack of Newberry, originally titled The Pleasant Historie of John Winchcomb, in his Younger Yeares called Jack of Newberry, the Famous and Worthy Clothier of England, is an important work because it marks the first successful attempt of any writer to use the material found in the lives of ordinary working people as the material for prose fiction. For this reason Deloney's book marks a great step toward the novel as we know it today. In a day when authors were writing about the gentry and nobility and were dedicating books to them, Thomas Deloney wrote about the lower classes and dedicated his volumes to them. Since almost no original copies of his publications have come down to modern times, it is a fairly safe guess that Deloney found a ready audience for his materials. Even the style in which he wrote smacked of the language of the people, rather than the absurdly elevated and involved style of such authors as Lyly, author of Euphues, and Sir Philip Sidney. Like his own Jack of Newberry, Deloney was a man of the people and a cloth weaver by trade. The pictures Deloney gave of bourgeois England were exaggerated, but highly entertaining. The real Jack of Newberry is known to have died there in 1519.

The Story:

In the days of King Henry VIII there lived in the English town of Newberry a young weaver named Jack Winchcomb. As a young man he was something of a prodigal, spending as much as he made and having a reputation as a gay young fellow, known in all the county of Berkshire as Jack of Newberry. But after his master died, Jack changed his ways, for his mistress, having acquired a fondness for the young man, entrusted to him the entirety of her husband's business. Jack became a careful man, both with his mistress' affairs and with his own, and soon lost his reputation for prodigality. In its place he acquired a reputation as an honest, hardworking, and intelligent businessman.

His mistress thought so highly of Jack that she even made him an adviser in affairs of the heart. His advice was of little value to her, however, for she had already made up her mind, despite the difference in their years, to marry Jack himself. She tricked him into agreeing to further her marriage with an unknown suitor. When they arrived at the church, Jack found that he was the man; thus Jack became her husband and the master of her house and business.

The marriage went none too smoothly at first, for despite her love for Jack the woman did not like to be ordered about by the man who had once been her servant. But at last they came to an understanding and lived happily for several years, at which interval the good woman died, leaving Jack master of the business and rich in the world's goods.

Not long after his first wife died, Jack remarried, the second time to a young woman. The wife was a poor choice, even though he had the pick of the wealthy women of his class in the county. Not many months passed after the marriage, which had been a costly one, before James, King of Scotland, invaded England while King Henry was in France. The justices of the county called upon Jack to furnish six men-at-arms to join the army raised by Queen Catherine. Jack, however, raised a company of a hundred and fifty foot and horse, which he armed and dressed at his own expense in distinctive liveries. Jack himself rode at the head of his men. Queen Catherine was greatly pleased and thanked Jack Winchcomb personally for his efforts, although his men were not needed to achieve the English victory at Flodden Field. In reward for his services, Jack received a chain of gold from the hands of the queen herself.

In the tenth year of his reign King Henry made a trip through Berkshire. Jack Winchcomb introduced himself in a witty way to the king as the Prince of the Ants, who was at war with the Butterflies, a sally against Cardinal Wolsey. The king, vastly pleased, betook himself to Newberry, along with his train, where all were entertained by Jack at a fabulous banquet. After the banquet the king viewed the weaving rooms and warehouses Jack owned. Upon his departure the king wished to make Jack a knight, but the weaver refused the honor, saying he would rather be a common man and die, as he had lived, a clothier.

In his house Jack of Newberry had a series of fifteen paintings, all denoting great men whose fathers had been tradesmen of one kind and another, including a portrait of Marcus Aurelius, who had been a clothier's son. Jack kept the pictures and showed them to his friends and workmen in an effort to encourage one and all to seek fame and dignity in spite of their humble offices in life.

Because of the many wars in Europe during King Henry's reign, trade in general was depleted. The lot of the clothiers and weavers being particularly bad, they joined together and sent leaders to London to appeal to the government on their behalf. One of the envoys they sent was Jack Winchcomb of Newberry. The king remembered Jack and in private audience assured him that measures would be taken to alleviate the hardships of the clothiers. Another man who had not forgotten Jack was the Lord Chancellor, Cardinal Wolsey. In an attempt to circumvent the king's promise, he had Jack and the other envoys thrown into prison for a few days. Finally the Duke of Somerset intervened and convinced the cardinal that the clothiers meant no harm.

Some time later an Italian merchant named Benedick came to the house of Jack of Newberry to trade. While there, he fell in love with one of Jack's workers, a pretty girl named Joan. But she paid no attention whatever to Benedick and asked a kinsman to tell the Italian not to bother her. When the kinsman did as he was asked, he angered the Italian, who vowed to make a cuckold of the kinsman for his pains. With gifts and fair speech the Italian finally had his way with the weaver's wife, although the woman was immediately sorry. She told her husband, who had his revenge on the Italian by pretending that he would see to it that the Italian was permitted to go to bed with Joan. The Italian fell in with the scheme and found himself put to bed with a pig, whereupon all the Englishmen laughed at him so heartily that he left Newberry in shame.

Jack's second wife was a good young woman, but she sometimes erred in paying too much attention to her gossiping friends. At one time a friend told her that she was wasting money by feeding the workmen so well. She cut down on the quantity and the quality of the food she served the workers, but Jack, who remembered only too well the days when he had been an apprentice and journeyman forced to eat whatever was placed in front of him, became very angry and made her change her ways again. His workers were gratified when he said that his wife's friend was never to set foot in his house again.

At another time Jack of Newberry went to London, where he found a draper who owed him five hundred pounds working as a porter. Learning that the man, through no fault of his own, had become a bankrupt, Jack showed his confidence in the man by setting him up in business again. Friends warned him that he was sending good money after bad, but Jack's judgment proved correct. The man paid back every cent and later became an alderman of London.

Jack was always proud of his workers. One time a knight, Sir George Rigley, seduced a pretty and intelligent girl who worked for Jack. Jack vowed that he would make it right for her. He sent the woman, disguised as a rich widow, to London. There Sir George fell in love with her, not knowing who she was, and married her. The knight was angry at first, but he soon saw the justice of the case and was very well pleased with the hundred pounds Jack gave the girl as a dowry. Still knowing their places in life, Jack and his wife gave precedence to Sir George and his new lady, even in their own house.

JACK SHEPPARD

Type of work: Novel

Author: William Harrison Ainsworth (1805-1882)

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: 1702-1724

Locale: London and its environs

First published: 1839

Principal characters:

JACK SHEPPARD, a housebreaker and popular jailbreaker

JOAN SHEPPARD, his mother

OWEN WOOD, a London carpenter

MRS. WOOD, his wife

WINIFRED, their daughter

SIR ROWLAND TRENCHARD, an aristocrat

THAMES DARRELL, Sir Rowland's nephew and foster son of Owen Wood

JONATHAN WILD, a thief-taker

BLUESKIN, devoted henchman of Jack Sheppard

Critique:

Jack Sheppard differs from most of Ainsworth's work in that it has a rogue instead of a historical figure for its title character. Extremely popular in its own day, it has remained the most widely read of this author's novels. The plot is based on the life of a famous English criminal who so appealed to the public imagination that both Hogarth and Sir James Thornhill used him as a model in their paintings. Abounding in characters, circumstantial incident, obviously delineated protagonists and antagonists, and scattered references to historical incident, the novel illustrates the typically Victorian treatment of the rogue theme in fiction. Thackeray, critical of Ainsworth's characterization of Sheppard, wrote Catherine in protest against this book.

The Story:

When Owen Wood went to offer his condolence to Joan, the widow of Tom Sheppard, who had been executed for stealing from Wood, he found the woman living in misery near the Old Mint, a haven for mendicants, thieves, and debtors. Joan told Wood that Van Galgebroek, a Dutch seaman and conjurer, had prophesied that her baby, Jack, would be executed as his father had been. The prophecy was based on the presence of a mole behind Jack's ear. Wood offered to take the infant out of that sordid environment in order to avert fulfillment of the prophecy, but the mother refused to part with her child.

Left alone with the infant while Joan went to the attic to get a key which her deceased husband had ordered given to

Wood, the carpenter was accosted by a mob led by Sir Rowland Trenchard, in pursuit of a young man named Darrell. In the confusion Jonathan Wild, a thief-taker, picked up the key which Joan was to return to Wood.

While a great storm raged, Darrell, the fugitive, with a baby in his arms, was again pursued by Sir Rowland. The chase continued to the flooded Thames, where Darrell was drowned after a struggle with Sir Rowland. Wood, on his way home, rescued the baby from drowning. Some falling bricks saved him and the baby from Sir Rowland's wrath. Wood, understanding little of the night's strange events, took the child home with him. He named the boy Thames Darrell.

Twelve years later Wood had taken Jack Sheppard as an apprentice in his carpenter shop, but he found the boy indifferent and listless in his work. Thames Darrell, reared by the Woods, was a model apprentice. A third child in the household was Winifred, Wood's daughter, a charming, beautiful girl. The three twelve-year-olds were very fond of each other.

Mrs. Wood, a termagant, had long berated her husband for his kindness to Jack and to Joan Sheppard, who lived modestly and respectably in Willesden. Following an episode in which Thames was injured while trying to prevent injury to Jack, Mrs. Wood reprimanded Jack and predicted that he would come to the same end that his father had met. Her chastisement was strong enough to arouse a spirit of misdemeanor and criminality in Jack.

Jonathan Wild, who had hanged Tom Sheppard, boasted that he would hang the son as well. A resolute and subtle plotter, he worked slyly to bring about the boy's ruin. One day he gave Jack the key which he had found on the floor of the Mint twelve years before. It was Wood's master key; his hope was that Jack would rob the carpenter. Investigating Thames' parentage, Wild learned also that Thames was the child of Sir Rowland Trenchard's sister, Lady Alvira, whose husband Sir Rowland had drowned and whose child he had tried to destroy on the night of the great storm. Later Lady Alvira had been forced to marry her cousin, Sir Cecil Trafford. Lady Trafford was dying, in which event the estates would revert to her brother if she left no other heir. Wild promised Sir Rowland that he would remove Thames in order that Sir Rowland could inherit the entire estate. As a hold over the nobleman, he told him also that he knew the whereabouts of Sir Rowland's other sister, Constance, carelessly lost in childhood to a gipsy.

Wild and Sir Rowland trapped Thames and Jack in Sir Rowland's house and accused them of robbery. Imprisoned, Jack and Thames made a jail break from Old Giles' Roundhouse, the first of innumerable and difficult escapes for Jack, and the last for Thames, who was sent off to sea to be disposed of by Van Galgebroek, the Dutch seaman and conjurer.

Jack was soon fraternizing with the patrons of the Mint, much to the pleasure of the derelicts, prostitutes, and gamblers, who gathered there. It was in this environment that Joan saw Jack as the criminal he had become. When she went there to admonish her son to live a life of righteousness, she was answered by the taunts and sneers of the patrons, who reminded her that she had at one time enjoyed the life of the Mint. Jack, egged on by two prostitutes, spurned her pleas. Joan returned to her little home in Willesden to pray for Jack.

Jonathan Wild, having rid himself of Thames, one obstacle in the thief-taker's scheme to get control of the fortune of Sir Montacute Trenchard, Thames' grandfather, set about to remove Sir Rowland as well. Wild, plotting against the aristocrat, had him arrested for treason in connection with a proposed Jacobite uprising against the crown.

Jack Sheppard used the key given him by Wild to rob Wood's house. Caught and jailed in the Cage at Willesden as he was going to visit his mother, he soon escaped from the supposedly impregnable structure. At his mother's house Jack declared his undying love for her but announced that he could not return to honest living. Questioned by Joan as to how long he would wait to execute his threat against Jack, Wild, who had followed Jack to Willesden, answered boldly and confidently, "Nine."

Nine years later, in 1724, Jack had become the most daring criminal and jail-breaker of the day. By that time the Woods were affluent citizens living in Willesden. Joan Sheppard, insane because of worry over Jack, had been committed to Bedlam, a squalid, filthy asylum. Sir Rowland had been released from prison. Thames Darrell, thrown overboard by Van Gagebrok, had been picked up by a French fishing boat and carried to France, where he was employed by and subsequently commissioned by Philip of Orleans. Wild had continued in his pleasures of execution and collecting keepsakes of his grisly profession.

Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, one of Wild's henchmen, quarreled with Wild because he would not help Thomas Darrell get his rightful share of the estate which Sir Rowland had confiscated, and Blueskin became Jack's loyal henchman. The two robbed the Wood home again, Blueskin slashing Mrs. Wood's throat as she attempted to detain him.

Jack went to see his mother, a haggard, demented object of human wreckage, in chains and on a bed of straw. Wild followed Jack to the asylum. During a brawl Wild struck Joan and the blow restored the poor woman's senses. After her release from Bedlam, Wild divulged to Sir Rowland Trenchard the fact that Joan was his long-lost sister and an heir to the Trenchard estates.

Wild disposed of Sir Rowland by bludgeoning him and throwing him into a secret well. Sir Rowland, almost dead from the beating, attempted to save himself by catching hold of the floor around the opening of the well, but Wild trampled his fingers until the nobleman dropped to his watery grave. The thief-taker, still plotting to secure the Trenchard wealth, took Joan captive, but she killed herself rather than be forced into a marriage with the villain. At her funeral Jack was apprehended after a jail break that required passage through six bolted and barred doors and the removal of innumerable stones and bricks from the prison walls.

In the meantime Thames Darrell had returned from France to visit in the Wood household. Through information contained in a packet of letters which reached him in circuitous fashion, he learned that his father, the fugitive known only as Darrell, had been the French Marquis de Chatillon. His paternity proved, he inherited the Trenchard estates as well. He married Winifred Wood.

Jack Sheppard, after his seizure at his mother's funeral, was executed at Tyburn. As his body swung at the end of the rope, Blueskin cut him down in an attempt to save his life. A bullet from Wild's gun passed through Jack's heart. The body was buried beside Joan Sheppard in Willesden cemetery; and in later years the Marquis de Chatillon and his wife tended the grave and its simple wooden monument. Jonathan Wild eventually paid for his crimes; he was hanged on the same gallows to which he had sent Jack Sheppard and his father.

Critique:

One of a series of novels dealing with the Whiteoak family, Jalna describes the violent passions of a household that is as familiar to many readers as John Galsworthy's fictional Forsytes. The brothers and sisters are strangely different from each other, but all are bound together by family ties which few of them can understand. Over all towers the somewhat frightening figure of Grandma Whiteoak, binding them to her with the uncertain terms of her will and her unyielding spirit. This indomitable old woman is a character lifting the Jalna novels above the level of popular fiction.

The Story:

The Whiteoaks of Jalna were quite a family. The parents were dead, and the children, ranging in age from eight to over forty, were held together by Renny, the oldest son, and tyrannized by Grandma Whiteoak, a matriarch of ninety-nine years. The family estate of Jalna had been founded by Grandfather Whiteoak, but it had dwindled somewhat from its original greatness. By common consent Renny managed the farms and the family, although he frequently encountered resistance from both.

Meg, the oldest daughter, had in her youth been engaged to Maurice Vaughan, a neighbor and a friend of the family. But while he waited out the long engagement insisted upon by Meg, he had become entangled with a low-class girl and fathered a child, Pheasant. The girl had disappeared and Maurice had grudgingly raised Pheasant. Meg, deaf to the pleas of Maurice and her family for a forgiving heart, had broken the engagement and gone into almost complete retirement. Maurice was never allowed at Jalna again, although he and Renny served in the war together and remained friends.

Renny had remained a bachelor, the head of the family, and a man with quite a reputation with the women. Only his passions had been involved in these affairs, however, and thus it seemed that he would never marry. Renny accepted his power and his position but seemed not greatly to enjoy either.

The rest of the children were half-brothers to these two. Eden was a poet and a dreamer. Farm life disgusted him, and since he had recently had a book of poetry accepted by a New York publisher, he hoped to get away from Jalna and make his way with his writing. However, work of any kind was so distasteful to Eden that it seemed unlikely he could ever break the ties which held him to Jalna.

Piers was a plodder, with no flights of fancy or dreams of grandeur. Doing most of the manual work on the farms, he took orders from Renny in a lethargic way. Renny, learning that Piers had been seen with Pheasant Vaughan, warned the boy that such an alliance could lead only to trouble for both.

Finch was the real problem. Still in school, he barely managed to return each term. Different from the rest, he had no ambition, no drive of any kind. The family obviously considered him useless, but they stuck by him because he was family. Finch brooded. On his lonely walks through the woods and fields, he often saw through matters other members of the family tried to conceal.

Wakefield was just eight, and thus greatly spoiled. He had a heart condition which allowed him to get his own way without effort.

Over them Grandma Whiteoak held a whip. Her will had been made—and often changed—to be used as a weapon over the children and her two sons, who also lived at Jalna. She was ninety-nine and a despot. In many ways she was evil, using her power to force the children to obey her whims.

The first to cause a real stir at Jalna was Piers. He and Pheasant eloped. When they returned home, both Maurice and the Whiteoaks scorned them. Meg became hysterical and swore she would not have Maurice's daughter in her house. Grandma hit Piers over the head with her cane and would have hit Pheasant, but Renny quieted them and said that Pheasant was now part of the family and would be treated accordingly. Instantly everyone, even Meg, accepted his authority.

Eden went to New York to see his publisher and there met and married Alayne Archer, a reader for the publishing house. She felt she had discovered him through his poetry and could inspire him. An orphan, she looked forward to being part of such a large family. But when they reached Jalna, she felt an unexplained coldness. She was warmly welcomed by all but Piers, who resented the difference between her reception and Pheasant's, but she could feel tensions that were just under the surface. Grandma was revolting to the gentle Alayne, who knew she must make the old tyrant like her if she was to know any peace at Jalna.

With Alayne, Finch found his first real happiness. Seeing the artistic need in the boy, she tried to encourage the others to help him. Only Renny listened to her, and because of her arranged to have Finch take music lessons from a good teacher. The boy drove the rest of the family crazy with his practicing, but for the first time he began to be less restless.

Eden, reluctant to get down to serious writing, began to accuse Alayne of nagging him when she tried to encourage him. She wanted to get away from Jalna, for the place was exerting an uneasy hold on her. Worse, she and Renny were unwillingly drawn to each other. He kissed her once, and although they both pretended it was only a brotherly kiss, each knew it was more. At last they confessed their love for each other, but both knew that they would never bow to it because Eden was Renny's brother.

Eden grew troublesome about working at his writing or anything else. When he was injured in a friendly family scuffle, Alayne nursed him tenderly, hoping to hurry him back to health so that they could leave Jalna and Renny. Pheasant also helped nurse Eden, spending hours in his room. When they fell in love, they too tried to fight it because Pheasant's husband was family. At last Eden was able to be about again. Finch, during one of his wanderings, saw Pheasant in Eden's arms. He ran to Piers and told him about his wife and brother. Piers went prepared to kill them, but Pheasant escaped to her father's house. Renny and Piers followed her there. Piers, deciding that she was his wife and therefore his responsibility, took her back to Jalna, where he locked her in her room and allowed no one to see her for weeks. Eden fled, leaving Pheasant and Alayne to face disgrace alone.

When Piers took Pheasant back to Jalna, Meg, refusing to stay in the same house with Pheasant, moved into an abandoned hut on the farm. After a few weeks, Maurice Vaughan went to see her and persuaded her to forgive him his old sin. Soon afterward they were married, trying to make up quickly for all the years they had lost. Alayne prepared to return to New York alone. There would be no divorce, no marriage to Renny. The scandal would be too much for the family—whose pattern would never change.

JOANNA GODDEN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Sheila Kaye-Smith (1888-1956)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Rural England

First published: 1921

Principal characters:

JOANNA GODDEN, a wealthy landowner

ELLEN GODDEN, her younger sister

ARTHUR ALCE, Joanna's perennial suitor

MARTIN TREVOR, Joanna's betrothed

ALBERT HILL, Joanna's betrayer

Critique:

Joanna Godden is the powerful story of a strong and vibrant woman who ruled her sister and her farm with an iron hand. She herself, however, was often bewildered by emotions she did not understand. When tragedy involved her, she did not let it ruin her as it might have lesser women. She simply marshaled all her forces and went to meet it. That was Joanna's way. The novel is also notable for its atmosphere of the English countryside in all weathers and seasons.

The Story:

After her father's funeral, Joanna Godden took immediate command of her sister Ellen and of the prosperous farm, Little Ansdores. She had always had many notions about making the farm even more productive, and she proposed now to execute these ideas, even though her neighbors and her advisers thought her a stubborn and foolish woman. Her perennial suitor, Arthur Alce, stuck by her, although he knew he could never change Joanna's mind about the farm or about accepting him as a husband.

In addition to the farm, her sister Ellen consumed much of Joanna's energy. Ellen must be a lady. To this end she was sent to school and humored in many other ways. But Joanna was the boss. No matter how much she babied Ellen, Joanna still made all decisions for her. Ellen was pliable, but she secretly planned for the day when she could escape her sister's heavy hand.

Little Ansdores prospered under Joanna. She shocked her neighbors by painting her house and wagons in bright colors and by appearing in loud clothing and jewels as soon as the period of mourning was over. In spite of their distrust of her, they were forced to admire her business acumen. Many men failed while she accumulated money in the bank. Through it all, Arthur stood by her and ran her errands. Once she felt stirrings of passion for one of her farm hands, but she quickly subdued the feeling because the ignorant lad was unsuitable. Joanna knew vaguely that she was missing something every woman wanted, something she did not completely understand but still longed for.

When Joanna met Martin Trevor, the son of a neighboring squire, she knew almost at once that Martin was the kind of man she had waited for. Although they were at first antagonistic, they soon were drawn together in real love and announced their engagement. Joanna was happy; Martin made her feel she was a woman first and a successful farmer second. The sensation was novel for Joanna. Martin's father and clergyman brother accepted her, in spite of a social position lower than theirs. Poor Arthur Alce grieved to lose her, even though he had never possessed more than her friendship. He sincerely wished her happiness.

The only thing that dimmed their happiness was Joanna's insistence upon waiting for the wedding until there should be a slack time on the farm. Martin knew that if he gave in to her he would forever play second fiddle to Ans-dore. On a walk, one rainy day, he begged her to marry him at once, both to please him and to show him that he was first in her heart. She refused, but at home a few nights later she knew that she must give in, for herself as well as for Martin. When she hurried to his home to see him the next day, she found Martin gravely ill. He had not been strong and the walk in the rain had caused a serious lung congestion. Joanna, realizing that her happiness was not to last, felt no surprise when Martin died. Her grief was so deep that she could feel nothing, only numbness. She felt that she had missed the only real happiness of her life.

The farm claimed her once more, and to it she gave all her energy and hope. Ellen also felt Joanna's will. Seventeen and finished with school, she was a lady. But Joanna was not pleased with her. Ellen had more subdued taste than Joanna, and the two girls clashed over furnishings, clothing, manners, and suitors for Ellen. Ellen usually submitted, but her one ambition was to get out from under Joanna's domination. Marriage seemed her only course. When Joanna began to ask Arthur to escort Ellen various places so that the young girl would not be so bored, Ellen thought it would be a good joke to take Arthur away from Joanna. However, Joanna herself thought a match between Ellen and Arthur would be a good thing. Unknown to Ellen, she asked Arthur to marry her sister. Arthur protested that he loved and would always love Joanna. She, in her usual practical way, overrode his objections and insisted that he marry Ellen. Finally he proposed to Ellen and was accepted. Ellen believed that she had stolen her sister's lover.

At first Ellen was happy with Arthur, for she was genuinely fond of him, but she resented his continuing to run errands for Joanna. She attributed these acts to Joanna's domineering ways, never realizing that her husband still loved her sister. Because Ellen also resented not meeting any of the gentlefolk of the area, Joanna arranged for her to meet Squire Trevor, Martin's father. It was an unfortunate meeting. Ellen became infatuated with the old man, left Arthur, and followed the squire to Dover. When she asked for a divorce, Arthur refused. Joanna was alternately furious with Ellen for her immorality and sorry for her heartbreak. At last Ellen went home to Little Ans-dore. Joanna took her in and treated her like a little girl again.

When a neighboring estate, Great Ans-dore, was put on the market, Joanna bought it. Her triumph was now complete; she was the wealthiest farmer in the area. New power went with the land. She chose the rector for the village church and in other ways acted as a country squire. But she still longed for Martin; or perhaps only for love. At any rate, when Arthur refused to stay after Ellen came home, Joanna for the first time saw him as a man she might love. Too sensible to risk more trouble from that quarter, however, she brushed off his goodbye kiss and turned her mind back to Ans-dore.

After a time Arthur was killed in a hunting accident at his new home. His will, leaving his old farm to Joanna, made Ellen dependent on her sister as before.

Ellen was furious, but Joanna could see no harm in Arthur's having left his money to his friend rather than to his faithless wife. Meanwhile Joanna would take care of Ellen, who would no doubt marry again.

Time began to take its toll of Joanna. Following her doctor's advice, she combined a business trip and a vacation. During that time she met Albert Hill, a young man thirteen years her junior. Thinking herself in love with Albert, Joanna the strong, the moral, the domineering, gave herself to the young man. They planned to marry, but Joanna, on second thought, realized that she did not love Albert, could never marry him. Learning that she was pregnant, she confessed to Ellen, who demanded that she marry Albert to protect their family name. But Joanna wanted her baby to grow up in happiness and peace, not in the home of parents who did not love each other. She would sell Ansdore and go away. As she made her plans, Martin's face came back to her and gave her strength. He would have approved. The past seemed to fuse with the years ahead. Joanna Godden, her home, her sister, her good name, and her lover all gone, still faced the years with courage and with hope.

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Dinah Maria Mulock (Mrs. George Craik, 1826-1887)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Turn of the nineteenth century

Locale: Rural England

First published: 1857

Principal characters:

JOHN HALIFAX, one of Nature's gentlemen

URSULA, his wife

GUY, their oldest son

MAUD, a daughter

ABEL FLETCHER, John's benefactor

PHINEAS FLETCHER, his invalid son

LORD RAVENEL, a landowner

Critique:

The story of John Halifax is one depicting the simple pleasures of lower middle-class life in rural England. In the book there is also a plea that a man be judged by his merits, not by his social class or his birth. But primarily the story is one of simple domesticity, of the real love that exists among members of a simple family who place the happiness and security of others above themselves. The theme was common among nineteenth-century authors, one that found immediate reception from readers who were slowly awakening to a new social order. Shortly after its publication the book was translated into French, German, Italian, Russian, and Greek.

The Story:

When Phineas Fletcher and his father, Abel, first saw John Halifax, they were immediately struck with his honest face and worthy character. For although the boy was only fourteen and an orphan, he would accept help from no one. Instead, he preferred to make his own way, even though it meant that he was always half-starved. Phineas, just sixteen, and an invalid, would have enjoyed having John for a companion, but Abel Fletcher, a wealthy Quaker, put the boy to work in his tannery. Although Abel was a real Christian and wanted to help others, he knew that the boy would be better off if he helped himself. Then, too, there was a class distinction between Phineas and John that even Abel could not entirely overlook.

Phineas and John became good friends, the orphan being the only friend Phineas ever loved as a brother. John rose rapidly in the tannery because of his honesty and his willingness to work at any job. He also had the ability to handle men, an ability ably proved when a hungry mob would have burned down the Fletcher home and the mill which the Quaker owned. John arranged to have the workers get wheat for their families, and from then on they were loyal to him through any crisis.

When they were in their early twenties, Phineas and John took a cottage in the country so that Phineas might have the advantage of the country air. While there they met a lovely girl, Ursula March, who had taken her dying father to the same spot. John was from the first attracted to the modest girl, but since she was a lady he felt that he could not tell her of his feelings. After the death of her father, it was learned that she was an heiress, and to John even more unattainable. However, John knew himself to be a gentleman, even if others did not, and at last circumstances brought him an opportunity to let her know his heart. When Ursula saw his true character and gladly married him, everyone was shocked but Phineas. Ursula's kinsman, a dissolute nobleman, refused to give her her fortune, and John would not go to court to claim the fortune, as was his legal right as Ursula's husband.

After the death of Abel Fletcher, Phineas lived with John and Ursula and their children, the oldest of whom was a lovely blind girl. Abel had made John a partner in the tannery, and since John did not like the tan-yard and also since it was losing money, he sold it and put the money into the operation of the mill. Times were often hard during the next few years, but finally, for political reasons Ursula's kinsman released her fortune to John. After settling a large amount on his wife and children, he used the rest to lease a new mill and expand his business interests. His hobby was a steam engine to turn the mill, and before long he began to see his project materialize. The family moved to a new home in the country and lived many long years there in peace and happiness. John, becoming influential in politics, used his power by choosing honorable men for office. He made some powerful enemies too, but his concern was only for the right. During this time his income grew until he was a very wealthy man. He continued to use his money to help others.

The steam engine, built and put into operation, gave John new advantages, but he provided generously for his workmen so that they would not suffer because of the machine. Then tragedy struck the family. Shortly after the birth of their last child, a daughter, the blind child was taken by death. It was a sorrow from which John never completely recovered. The years brought other troubles to his household. Two of his sons loved the same girl, the governess of their little sister. The brothers had a bitter quarrel, and the loser, who was the oldest son, Guy, left home and went abroad, almost breaking his mother's heart. After two or three years they learned that Guy had almost killed a man in Paris and had fled to America. From that time on, Ursula aged, for Guy was her favorite son.

Shortly afterward, John learned from Lord William Ravenel that that nobleman was in love with the youngest daughter, Maud. Lord Ravenel was not only the son of a worldly family; he himself had led a useless and sometimes wild life. John would not listen to the man's pleas, and Lord Ravenel, agreeing that he was unworthy of her, left without telling Maud of his love. But John was to revise his opinion somewhat when, after the death of his father, Lord Ravenel gave up his inherited fortune to pay his father's debts. After this incident Lord Ravenel was not heard from for many years. Maud did not marry. Her parents knew that she had never lost her affection for Lord Ravenel, although she did not know that he had returned her feelings.

Years passed. The married children gave John and Ursula grandchildren. John could have had a seat in Parliament, but he rejected it in favor of others. He continued to do good with his money and power, even when suffering temporary losses. And always he longed for his lost blind child, just as Ursula longed for her missing oldest son. Their own love grew even deeper as they reached their twilight years. John often suffered attacks that left him gasping in pain and breathlessness, but in order to spare his family any unnecessary worry he kept this information from all but Phineas.

Then came wonderful news: Guy was coming home. All of the family rejoiced, Ursula more than any other. They had six anxious months when he did not appear and his ship was not accounted for, but at last he arrived. He had been shipwrecked and lost, but had eventually made his way home. With him was Lord Ravenel, who had gone to America after being rejected by John. Both men had done well there, but had lost everything in the shipwreck. In their happy reunion, the money seemed of little importance. John knew now that Lord William Ravenel had proved himself worthy of Maud, and the two lovers were at last allowed to express their love for each other. Guy, too, began to show interest in a childhood friend, and another wedding in the family seemed likely.

John felt that his life was now complete, his peace and happiness being broken only by longing for his dead child. He was soon to join her. One day he sat down to rest, and so his family found him in the peaceful sleep of death. That night, as she sat by her husband's body, Ursula must have felt that she could not lose him, for the children and Phineas found her lying dead beside her husband. They were buried side by side in the country churchyard.

JOHN INGLESANT

Type of work: Novel

Author: Joseph Henry Shorthouse (1834-1903)

Type of plot: Historical-philosophical romance

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: England and Italy

First published: 1881

Principal characters:

JOHN INGLESANT, an Englishman interested in spiritual affairs

EUSTACE INGLESANT, his materialistic twin brother

FATHER ST. CLARE, a Jesuit and John's mentor

CHARLES I, King of England, who used John's services as an agent

LAURETTA CAPECE, John's Italian wife

CARDINAL CHIGI, John's Italian patron

Critique:

John Inglesant, a philosophical and historical romance, was done, according to its author, in the style of the great American writer of romances, Nathaniel Hawthorne. In all literature there is probably no better picture of the complicated political and ecclesiastical affairs in England during the stormy years of the reign of

Charles I and the ensuing Civil War. In this novel many of the historical personages of the time—King Charles, Archbishop Laud, John Milton, Thomas Hobbes, and others—make their appearance, adding to the realism of the story and demonstrating the parts they played in seventeenth-century England. While Shorthouse, in his author's introduction to the second edition, laid the greatest emphasis on the philosophical content of the novel, the modern reader is likely to find the historical aspects considerably more important and certainly more interesting than the nebulous philosophical gropings adumbrated in the story.

The Story:

The family of Inglesant had long been loyal to the British crown, which had conferred lands and honors upon it, and yet the family also had strong leanings toward the Roman Catholic Church. Such inclinations were dangerous during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, when the whole of England was forced to change religions several times, according to the monarch who sat on the throne. In 1622 two sons were born to the family, twins whose mother died at their birth. One was named Eustace, after his father; the other, born a few minutes later and therefore the younger son of the family, was named John.

In boyhood the twins saw little of one another. Eustace, the older, was given a worldly training, for his father, outwardly conforming to the Anglican Church under James I and Charles I, wished him to make a place for himself at court. The younger son, John, was given bookish training in the classics and philosophy by various tutors. At the age of fourteen, John was placed under the tutelage of Father St. Clare, who was in England on a political and ecclesiastical mission for his order. The priest saw in the highly intelligent and cultured young lad the prospects of a fine instrument that his order might use; in addition, he felt that the boy deserved the training which would make him fitted for that unquestioning discipline of the highest order, as the Jesuits saw it: the discipline that is enforced from within the individual but controlled from without.

After several years of study and training, John Inglesant became a page in the train of the queen at the court of Charles

I. Father St. Clare had sent him to court that he might come to the attention of the Roman Catholic nobles and serve to further the interests of the Roman Church in England.

As the country became more and more troubled, and civil war threatened because of rivalry between the Puritans and the adherents to the crown and the Anglican Church, the Roman Catholics felt themselves in a rather strong position with the king and everyone loyal to him. It was the dream of Father St. Clare, as a member of the Society of Jesus, to return England to the domination of Rome. With that end in view, he did all he could to aid the crown against the Puritans. Because John Inglesant, who came from a family long noted for its loyalty to the king, was active as an agent between Roman Catholic leaders and the crown, he was often employed on secret missions by the king. Father St. Clare, who saw Inglesant as having greater value as an Anglican communicant with papist leanings, advised the young man against conversion to the Roman Church. Inglesant, puzzled, followed his mentor's wishes.

When fighting broke out between the Cavaliers and the Puritans, Inglesant spent much of his time on missions for the king and Father St. Clare. Eustace Inglesant, after marrying a rich woman some ten years his senior, believed the king's cause doomed to failure and left England for France. John Inglesant was sent on a secret mission to Ireland, where Lord Glamorgan was attempting to raise an Irish army to aid the royal cause in England. From Ireland, young Inglesant was sent to bear tidings of imminent relief to the royal garrison at Chester, which was under siege.

Inglesant reached Chester and gave his message to Lord Biron, the commander. Weeks went by, but the relief did not appear. At last the garrison learned that the king had been forced to deny any part in the plan for an Irish invasion of England, because of popular outcry against the project. Chester was given up to the Puritans, and Inglesant, wishing to protect his monarch, permitted himself to be sent to London as a prisoner charged with treason.

Weeks turned into months; still Inglesant languished in prison. Meanwhile the Puritans were trying to implicate the king in the charge against Inglesant. Finally the king's forces were utterly defeated and Charles I was taken prisoner. In an effort to make him give evidence against the king, Inglesant was condemned and actually taken to be executed, but, true to his Jesuit training, he remained steadfast.

Through the good offices of Father St. Clare, Inglesant was released after the beheading of Charles I. One day Eustace Inglesant, who had returned to England under the protection of his wife's Puritan kinsmen, brought his brother's pardon to the Tower of London. Immediately, the two brothers set out for the estate of Eustace's wife.

Eustace, in the meantime, had been warned by an astrologer that his life was in danger, and he was murdered during the journey by an Italian, an enemy whom he had encountered while traveling in Italy years before. John Inglesant, after a period of sickness and recuperation spent at his sister-in-law's estate, left for France, where he hoped to find Father St. Clare and to gather information about his brother's murderer, whom he had resolved to kill in revenge.

Arriving in France, he was not immediately successful in finding Father St. Clare. In the interval he tried to evaluate his spiritual life. A Benedictine acquaintance tried to encourage him to enter that order, but Inglesant felt that his spiritual answers did not lie in that direction. He believed that somehow he had been singled out by heaven to find salvation more independently. When he finally found Father St. Clare, the priest told him to go to Rome and there continue his spiritual search under the protection of the Jesuits, who were indebted to him for the many missions he had undertaken in their cause.

On the way to Rome, a journey taking several months, Inglesant stopped many times. He spent several weeks in Siena as a guest of the Chigi family. One of the Chigis was a cardinal who had hopes of being elected pope when the incumbent died. From Siena, Inglesant journeyed to Florence. There he met Lauretta Capece, with whom he fell in love.

After his eventual arrival in Rome, Inglesant was sent to the Duke of Umbria on a mission by influential Jesuits who wished the nobleman to turn his lands over to the Papal See after his death. His mission accomplished, Inglesant married Lauretta Capece. He returned to Rome as a temporary aide to Cardinal Chigi during the conclave to elect a new pope. The cardinal was elected. Inglesant retired to an estate given to him by the Duke of Umbria.

Inglesant and his wife lived in Umbria for several years, until a great plague broke out in Naples. Inglesant went to that city in an effort to save his brother-in-law, who had been in hiding there. In Naples, also, he found his brother's murderer; the man had become a monk after having been beaten and blinded by a mob. Now, with his brother's murderer in his power, Inglesant had lost his desire for revenge. In company with the blind monk, he continued his search and finally discovered his dying brother-in-law. After the sick man had died, Inglesant returned home, only to learn that his family had been wiped out by the plague.

Once again he journeyed to Rome in search of spiritual consolation, but because of his independent attitudes he got into serious trouble with the Inquisition. Because of Jesuit influence, he was not condemned to prison or death. Instead, he was sent back to England, where he lived out his days in philosophical contemplation.

JONATHAN WILD

Type of work: Novel

Author: Henry Fielding (1707-1754)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Late seventeenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1743

Principal characters:

JONATHAN WILD, a "great man"

LAETITIA, his wife

LA RUSE, a rogue

HEARTFREE, a good man

MRS. HEARTFREE, his good wife

Critique:

Although The History of Jonathan Wild the Great is possibly the least known of Fielding's novels, it is the one likely to appeal most to those who enjoy barbed satire and pure irony. Jonathan was a "great man"—not a good man. Fielding makes it quite clear that greatness and goodness are never to be found in one person. A "great man" is a pure villain, with none of the minor virtues with which ordinary villains are endowed. The characters are vivid; the plot is sure and swift. Jonathan Wild is, in all ways, a delightful book.

The Story:

Jonathan Wild was prepared by nature to be a "great man." His ancestors were all men of greatness, many of them hanged for thievery or treason. Those who escaped were simply shrewder and more fortunate than the others. But Jonathan was to be so "great" as to put his forefathers to shame.

As a boy he read about the great villains of history. At school he learned little, his best study being to pick the pockets of his tutors and fellow students. When he was seventeen, his father moved to town, where Jonathan was to put his talents to even better use. There he met the Count La Ruse, a knave destined to be one of the lesser "greats." La Ruse was in prison for debt, but Jonathan's skill soon secured his friend's freedom. Together they had many profitable ventures, picking the pockets of their friends and of each other. Neither became angry when the other stole from him, for each respected the other's abilities.

Jonathan, for unknown reasons, traveled in America for seven or eight years. Returning to England he continued his life of villainy. Since he was to be a truly "great" man, he could not soil his own hands with too much thievery because there was always the danger of the gallows if he should be apprehended. He gathered about him a handful of lesser thieves who took the risks while he collected most of the booty. La Ruse joined him in many of his schemes, and the two friends continued to steal from each other. This ability to cheat friends showed true "greatness."

Jonathan admired Laetitia Snap, a woman with qualities of "greatness" similar to his own. She was the daughter of his father's friend, and she too was skilled in picking pockets and cheating at cards. In addition, she was a lady of wonderfully loose morals. But try as he would, Jonathan could not get Laetitia to respond to his passion. The poor fellow did not at first know that each time he approached her she was hiding another lover in the closet. Had he known, his admiration would have been even greater.

Jonathan's true "greatness" did not appear until he renewed his acquaintance with Mr. Heartfree, a former schoolmate. Heartfree would never be a "great" man because he was a good man. He cheated no one, held no grudges, and loved his wife and children. These qualities made him the sort of person Jonathan liked to cheat. Heartfree was a jeweler who by hard work and honest practices had become moderately prosperous. With the help of La Ruse, Jonathan was able to bring Heartfree to ruin. They stole his jewels and his money and hired thugs to beat him unmercifully, all the time convincing the good man that they were his friends.

La Ruse approached the greatness of Jonathan by leaving the country after stealing most of their booty. Poor Heartfree was locked up for debt after the two scoundrels had ruined him. Then Jonathan performed his greatest act. He had also a strong passion for Mrs. Heartfree, a good and virtuous woman, and he persuaded her that her husband had asked him to take her and some remaining jewels to Holland until her husband could obtain his release. So cleverly did he talk that the woman did not even tell her husband goodbye, though she loved him dearly. Instead, she put her children in the hands of a faithful servant and accompanied the rogue on a ship leaving England immediately.

When a severe storm arose, Jonathan was sure that death was near. Throwing caution aside, he attacked Mrs. Heartfree. Her screams brought help from the captain. After the storm subsided, the captain put Jonathan adrift in a small boat. The captain did not know that Jonathan was a "great" man, not destined to die in ignoble fashion. After a while he was rescued. He returned to England with tall tales of his adventure, none of which were the least bit true.

In the meantime Heartfree had begun to suspect his friend of duplicity. When Jonathan returned, he was for a time able to persuade Heartfree that he had done everything possible to help the jeweler. He told just enough of the truth to make his story acceptable, for in "greatness" the lie must always contain some truth. But Jonathan went too far. He urged Heartfree to attempt an escape from prison by murdering a few guards. Heartfree saw his supposed friend as the rogue he was and denounced Jonathan in ringing tones. From that time on Jonathan lived only to bring Heartfree to complete destruction.

While Jonathan was plotting Heartfree's trip to the gallows, Laetitia's father finally gave his consent to his daughter's marriage to the rogue. It took only two weeks, however, for his passion to be satisfied; then the couple began to fight and cheat each other constantly.

After his marriage Jonathan continued in all kinds of knavery, but his most earnest efforts were directed toward sending Heartfree to the gallows. At last he hit upon a perfect plan. He convinced the authorities that Heartfree himself had plotted to have his wife take the jewels out of the country in order to cheat his creditors. Mrs. Heartfree had not returned to England. Although Jonathan hoped she was dead, he thought it better to have her husband hanged at once in case she should somehow return. Before Heartfree's sentence was carried out, however, Jonathan was arrested and put in jail. He was surprised by a visit from Laetitia. She came only to revile him. She, having been caught picking pockets, was also a prisoner. Her only wish was that she could have the pleasure of seeing Jonathan hanged before her turn came to die on the gallows.

On the day that Heartfree was to be hanged his wife returned. After many adventures and travel in many lands, she came back in time to tell her story and to save her husband from hanging. She had brought with her a precious jewel which had been given to her by a savage chief she met on her travels. Heartfree was released and his family was restored to prosperity. It was otherwise with Jonathan, whose former friends hastened to hurry him to the gallows. On the appointed day he was hanged, leaving this world with a curse for all mankind. His wife and all his friends were hanged, save one. La Ruse was captured in France and broken on the wheel. Jonathan Wild was a "great" man because he was a complete villain.

JORROCKS' JAUNTS AND JOLLITIES

Type of work: Tales

Author: Robert Smith Surtees (1803-1864)

Type of plot: Comic romance

Time of plot: The 1830's

Locale: England and France

First published: 1838

Principal characters:

JORROCKS, a grocer and sportsman

MR. STUBBS, a Yorkshireman

THE COUNTESS BENVOLIO

Critique:

This volume of Jorrocks' adventures differs from the others in that there is no connecting plot; the work is simply a series of tales given unity by the irrepressible and immortal Jorrocks. The satire here is double-edged; first there is the pretentious cockney aping his aristocratic betters; second, sporting life comes in for uncomfortably keen depiction. The wealth of detail furnishes us with a good contemporary account of town and country life in Victorian England.

The Story:

When they went out to hunt, the members of Jorrocks' Surrey fox hunt did not always keep their minds on the sport. As they gathered, their talk included shouts to the dogs and quotations on the price of cotton, advice on horses, and warnings of bank policies. While waiting for the dogs to run the fox closer, they all eagerly pulled out bread and meat from their capacious pockets.

One morning a swell joined the veteran Surrey hunters. He was plainly an aristocrat. While the others were paunchy and stooped, he was thin and straight. His handsome mount contrasted sharply with their skinny nags. They all watched him enviously. He was new in Surrey evidently, for he drove his horse at a fast clip through the bottom lands, heedless of the numerous flints. The riders were glad when he had to retire from the chase with a lame horse.

As he left, Jorrocks rushed up with the news that the stranger was no less a personage than a Russian diplomat. The whole hunt joined in heartily wishing him back in Russia for good.

In town Jorrocks ran into agreeable Mr. Stubbs, a footloose Yorkshireman and invited him to go to the hunt on Saturday morning. So long as Jorrocks paid the bills, the Yorkshireman was glad for any entertainment. On the appointed foggy morning Jorrocks was on time. He was riding his own bony nag and leading a sorry dray horse for his guest. The fog was so thick that they bumped into carriages and sidewalk stands right and left. The Yorkshireman would have waited for the fog to lift, but doughty Jorrocks would countenance no delay. Mrs. Jorrocks had a fine quarter of house-lamb for supper and her husband had been sternly ordered to be back at five-thirty sharp. Jorrocks was never late for a meal.

On the way Jorrocks' horse was nearly speared by a carriage pole. The resourceful hunter promptly dismounted and chaffered a bit with a coach driver. When he remounted, he had a great coach lamp tied around his middle. Thus lighted, the two horsemen got safely out of town.

The hunt that day held an unexpected surprise for both of them. Thinking to show off a little for his younger friend, Jorrocks put his horse at a weak spot in a fence. He wanted to sail over in good time and continue after the fox. Instead, he landed in a cesspool. His bright red coat was covered with slime and mud for the rest of the day. But the Yorkshireman noted that Jorrocks carried on till the end of the hunt and got home in time for his house-lamb.

As usual, Jorrocks went hunting in Surrey on a Saturday. When his horse went lame, he stopped at the smith's shop for repairs, and his five-minute delay made him lose sight of the pack. Consequently, he lost out on a day's sport. As he sat in a local inn nursing a grouch and threatening to withdraw his subscription to the Surrey hunt, in came Nosey Browne. Jorrocks was delighted to see his old friend and willingly accepted an invitation to a day's shooting on Browne's estate.

A few days later he collected the Yorkshireman and set out eagerly for the shooting. He was dashed to find that Nosey's big estate was little more than a cramped spot of ground covered with sheds and other outbuildings. Squire Cheatum, learning that Nosey was a bankrupt, had forbidden his neighbor to hunt in his woods, and so Jorrocks was forced to hunt in the yard behind sheds. Soon he saw a rabbit. In his excitement he took a step forward and shot the animal. As he was about to pick up his prize, a gamekeeper arrived and accused him of trespassing. After an extended argument it was shown that Jorrocks' toe had indeed at the moment of shooting been over the line on Squire Cheatum's land; and so the wrathful Jorrocks was fined one pound one.

He was no man to accept calmly a fine so obviously unfair. He hired a lawyer and appealed the case to the county court. On the day of the trial Jorrocks beamed as his own attorney pictured him as a substantial citizen with a reputation for good works. He squirmed as the squire's lawyer described him as a cockney grocer who was infringing on the rights of country-folk. At the end the judges woke up and sustained the fine.

After the fox-hunting season ended, Jorrocks accepted an invitation to a stag hunt. The Yorkshireman came to breakfast with him on the appointed morning. Jorrocks led him down into the kitchen, where the maid had set out the usual fare. There were a whole ham, a loaf of bread, and a huge Bologna sausage. There were muffins, nine eggs, a pork pie, and kidneys on a spit. The good Betsy was stationed at the stove, where she deftly laid mutton chops on the gridiron.

As the two friends ate, Mrs. Jorrocks came in with an ominous face. She held up a card, inscribed with a woman's name and address, which she had found in her spouse's pocket. Jorrocks seized the card, threw it into the fire, and declared it was an application for a deaf and dumb institute.

The men set out for the hunt in Jorrocks' converted fire wagon. Ahead of them was a van carrying a drowsy doe. They were shocked to learn on arriving that their "stag" was that same tame deer imported for the day. She had to be chased to make her stop grazing on the common. Jorrocks' disappointment was complete when he learned that he had been invited only for his contribution to the club fund.

Abandoning the hunt for a while, Jorrocks took a boat trip to Margate with the Yorkshireman. That expedition was also a failure, for he left his clothes on the beach when he went for a swim and the tide engulfed them. The unhappy grocer was forced to go back to London in hand-me-downs.

Seeing numerous books for sale at fancy prices, Jorrocks determined to write a four-volume work on France that would sell for thirty pounds. With little more ado he collected the Yorkshireman and set out for Dover.

He was charmed with Boulogne, for the French were gay and the weather was sunny. On the coach to Paris he met the Countess Benwolio, as Jorrocks, in cockney fashion, called her. She was quite receptive to the rich grocer. The countess seemed a beautiful, youthful woman until she went to sleep in the coach and her teeth dropped down. Once in Paris, Jorrocks was snugly installed as the favored guest in her apartment. He began to collect information for his book.

The countess was avid for presents, and before many days Jorrocks began to run short of money. He tried to recoup at the races, but the Frenchmen were too shrewd for him. Finally he offered to race fifty yards on foot, with the Yorkshireman perched on his shoulders, against a fleet French baron who was to run a hundred yards. Jorrocks took a number of wagers and gave them to the countess to hold. He won the race easily. When he regained his breath and looked about for the countess, she had disappeared.

With little money and no French, the Englishmen were quite some time getting back to the countess' apartment. By the time they arrived, a gross Dutchman was installed as her favorite. When Jorrocks tried to collect his wagers, she presented him with a detailed board bill. Pooling his last funds with the Yorkshireman's hoard, he was barely able to pay the bill. Chastened by his sojourn among the French, Jorrocks returned to England.

JOURNEY'S END

Type of work: Drama

Author: Robert C. Sherriff (1896- )

Type of plot: Impressionistic realism

Time of plot: March, 1918

Locale: A battlefield in France

First presented: 1929

Principal characters:

CAPTAIN DENNIS STANHOPE, a British company commander

LIEUT. OSBORNE, Stanhope's middle-aged second-in-command

LIEUT. RALEIGH, Stanhope's school friend, his fiancée's brother

2ND LIEUT. HIBBERT, a cowardly officer in Stanhope's company

Critique:

Originally Robert Sherriff had no literary ambitions, and Journey's End was written to be used by a group of amateurs who were interested in dramatics. At that time Sherriff was an insurance claims adjuster. The play grew out of letters Sherriff had written to his family during World War I, when he served as an officer in the British Army. On a chance suggestion, Journey's End was sent to George Bernard Shaw, who helped to get the play produced. It was an immense success; at one time there were nine companies playing it in the United States and England. The play made the author famous, and he became a professional writer. Although he has written other plays and novels, none has been as successful as Journey's End.

The Story:

Captain Stanhope's infantry company entered the front lines on Monday, March 18, 1918, at a time when the Allied Powers were expecting a strong German attack near St. Quentin. Lieutenant Osborne, a middle-aged officer who had been a schoolmaster in civilian life, met Lieutenant Raleigh, a new officer, when the latter arrived at the headquarters dugout. Discovering that Raleigh was an ardent hero worshiper of Captain Stanhope, who was absent at the time, Osborne tried to make the new officer realize that Stanhope's three years in the lines had made a different man of him.

Raleigh could barely realize just how much his friend had changed. Stanhope had become a battle-hardened, cynical infantry officer who drank whiskey incessantly in order to keep his nerves together.

After supper that evening Stanhope confided to Osborne that he was fearful of young Raleigh's opinion, and he declared that he meant to censor all the young officer's mail, lest Raleigh reveal to his sister the kind of man Stanhope, her fiancé, had become. Stanhope was bitter that Raleigh had landed in his company when there were so many others in France to which he might have been assigned. He was also concerned over Lieutenant Hibbert, another officer who was malingering in an effort to get sent home to England. Stanhope, who hated a quitter, resolved that Hibbert should be forced to stay.

The following morning the company prepared for the expected German attack. Stanhope sent out parties to put up a barbed wire enclosure in case neighboring units were forced to withdraw. Stanhope, having received orders to stand, meant to do so. During the morning Raleigh and Osborne had a long talk and became very friendly. After their talk Raleigh went to write a letter to his sister. When he finished, Stanhope made him hand it over for censoring. Raleigh, after some bitter words, did so. Stanhope, angry with himself for insisting, could not bring himself to read the letter. Osborne, anxious to keep harmony in the company, read it and reported to Stanhope that Raleigh had written only praise of the captain to his sister.

That afternoon word from regimental headquarters reported that the German attack was sure to occur on Thursday morning, and Stanhope hurried up preparations for the expected attack. As he finished a conference with his sergeant major, the colonel commanding the regiment stepped into the company headquarters for a conference. He had come because the matter was a serious one; he wanted Stanhope to send a raiding party to capture prisoners, from whom the colonel expected to gain information about the Germans' disposition for the attack. The raid would be a dangerous one because it had to be made in daylight.

The officers selected to lead the raid were Osborne, because of his experience, and Raleigh, because of his youthful vitality. Stanhope hated to send either, for he needed Osborne and he was afraid that Raleigh was too inexperienced. Above that, there was the possibility that they would never return.

After the colonel had gone, Hibbert told Stanhope that he was going to the doctor to be relieved from duty. Stanhope, realizing that the man was feigning illness, threatened to shoot him if he left. Having bullied the man into behaving himself, Stanhope, to show that he held no ill will, promised to stand duty with Hibbert that night.

Later in the afternoon Osborne and Raleigh were told the details of the proposed raid. Osborne was quiet, knowing what they were in for; Raleigh, not knowing how dangerous the raid would be, took the assignment as a great adventure.

By the next afternoon preparations for the raid had been completed. A gap had been made in the barbed wire between the lines by trench mortars. The Germans, to let the British know they realized what was coming, had gone out and hung red rags on the gap, and they had zeroed in their machine guns on the gap. Stanhope tried to get the raid called off, but the colonel insisted that it was necessary. The mortars laid down a barrage of smoke shells to hide the rush of the raid. While Osborne and his party went to the German parapet and kept the way clear, Raleigh and another group of men clambered into the trench to capture a prisoner.

The raid went as well as could be expected. Raleigh and his men returned with a prisoner from whom they obtained valuable information on the disposition of German troops. Osborne and several of his enlisted men had been killed by the Germans, and Raleigh was crushed by the death of his newly made friend. The other officers, trying to pass off the incident, had a chicken dinner with champagne that night to celebrate the success of the raid. Raleigh, thinking them barbarous in their conduct, remained away from the dugout. He could not see that the other officers were simply trying to forget what had happened; any one of them might be killed during the next raid.

After the dinner Stanhope gave Raleigh a violent tongue-lashing for his conduct and tried to explain to the young officer why it had been necessary for the living to celebrate, even though Osborne had been killed.

The next morning the German attack began. During the first bombardment several men in the company, including Raleigh, were wounded. Stanhope ordered Raleigh to be brought into the dugout, where the captain tried to comfort him with word that the wound was serious enough to require evacuation to England for treatment and convalescence. For the first time since Raleigh's arrival at the company the two were able to meet as friends. Their renewed friendship was short-lived, however, for Raleigh was wounded so severely that he died within a few minutes. Stanhope, turning his back on his friend's body, went out to direct the defense against the Germans.

JULIUS CAESAR

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: 44 B.C.

Locale: Rome

First presented: 1601

Principal characters:

JULIUS CAESAR, dictator of Rome

MARCUS ANTONIUS, his friend

MARCUS BRUTUS, a conspirator against Caesar

CAIUS CASSIUS, another conspirator against Caesar

PORTIA, wife of Brutus and Cassius' sister

CALPURNIA, Caesar's wife

Critique:

Actually, The Tragedy of Julius Caesar tells the story of Brutus rather than that of Caesar. At Shakespeare's hands the mighty dictator of Rome emerges as little more than a braggart whose chief activity, at least in this play, is a consistent refusal to read the handwriting on the wall. Brutus himself is a forerunner of Hamlet. Since Cassius, the so-called villain of this play, is presented rather sympathetically, some of our respect for Brutus is lost near the end of the play.

The Story:

At the feast of Lupercalia all Rome rejoiced, for the latest military triumphs of Julius Caesar were being celebrated during that holiday. Yet tempers flared and jealousies seethed beneath this public gaiety. Flavius and Marallus, two tribunes, coming upon a group of citizens gathered to praise Caesar, tore down their trophies and ordered the people to go home and remember Pompey's fate at the hands of Caesar.

Other dissatisfied noblemen discussed with concern Caesar's growing power and his incurable ambition. A soothsayer, following Caesar in his triumphal procession, warned him to beware the Ides of March. Cassius, one of the most violent of Caesar's critics, spoke at length to Brutus of the dictator's unworthiness to rule the state. Why, he demanded, should the name of Caesar have become synonymous with that of Rome when there were so many other worthy men in the city?

While Cassius and Brutus were speaking, they heard a tremendous shouting from the crowd. From aristocratic Casca they learned that before the mob Marcus Antonius had three times offered a crown to Caesar and three times the dictator had refused it. Thus did the wily Antonius and Caesar catch and hold the devotion of the multitude. Fully aware of Caesar's methods and the potential danger that he embodied, Cassius and Brutus, disturbed by this new turn of events, agreed to meet again to discuss the affairs of Rome. As they parted Caesar arrived in time to see them, and suspicion of Cassius entered his mind. Cassius was not contented-looking; he was too lean and nervous to be satisfied with life. Caesar much preferred to have fat, jolly men about him.

Cassius' plan was to enlist Brutus in a plot to overthrow Caesar. Brutus himself was one of the most respected and beloved citizens of Rome; if he were in league against Caesar, the dictator's power could be curbed easily. But it would be difficult to turn Brutus completely against Caesar, for Brutus was an honorable man and not given to treason, so that only the most drastic circumstances would make him forego his loyalty. Cassius plotted to have certain false papers denoting widespread public alarm over Caesar's rapidly growing power put into Brutus' hands. Then Brutus might put Rome's interests above his own personal feelings.

Secretly, at night, Cassius had the papers laid at Brutus' door. Their purport was that Brutus must strike at once against Caesar to save Rome. The conflict within Brutus was great. His wife Portia complained that he had not slept at all during the night and that she had found him wandering, restless and unhappy, about the house. At last he reached a decision. Remembering Tarquin, the tyrant whom his ancestors had banished from Rome, Brutus agreed to join Cassius and his conspirators in their attempt to save Rome from Caesar. He refused, however, to sanction the murder of Antonius, planned at the same time as the assassination of Caesar. The plan was to kill Caesar on the following morning, March fifteenth.

On the night of March fourteenth, all nature seemed to misbehave. Strange lights appeared in the sky, graves yawned, ghosts walked, and an atmosphere of terror pervaded the city. Caesar's wife Calpurnia dreamed she saw her husband's statue with a hundred wounds spouting blood. In the morning she told him of the dream and pleaded that he not go to the Senate that morning. When she had almost convinced him to remain at home, one of the conspirators arrived and persuaded the dictator that Calpurnia was unduly nervous, that the dream was actually an omen of Caesar's tremendous popularity in Rome, the bleeding wounds a symbol of Caesar's power going out to all Romans. The other conspirators then arrived to allay any suspicion that Caesar might have of them and to make sure that he attended the Senate that day.

As Caesar made his way through the city, more omens of evil appeared to him. A paper detailing the plot against him was thrust into his hands, but he neglected to read it. When the soothsayer again cried out against the Ides of March, Caesar paid no attention to the warning.

At the Senate chamber Antonius was drawn to one side. Then the conspirators crowded about Caesar as if to second a petition for the repealing of an order banishing Publius Cimber. When he refused the petition, the conspirators attacked him, and he fell dead of twenty-three knife wounds.

Craftily pretending to side with the conspirators, Antonius was able to reinstate himself in their good graces, and in spite of Cassius' warning he was granted permission to speak at Caesar's funeral after Brutus had delivered his oration. Before the populace Brutus, frankly and honestly explaining his part in Caesar's murder, declared that his love for Rome had prompted him to turn against his friend. Cheering him, the mob agreed that Caesar was a tyrant who deserved death. Then Antonius rose to speak. Cleverly and forcefully he turned the temper of the crowd against the conspirators by explaining that even when Caesar was most tyrannical, everything he did was for the people's welfare. Soon the mob became so enraged over the assassination that the conspirators were forced to flee from Rome.

Gradually the temper of the people changed, and they became aligned in two camps. One group supported the new triumvirate of Marcus Antonius, Octavius Caesar, and Aemilius Lepidus. The other group followed Brutus and Cassius to their military camp at Sardis.

At Sardis, Brutus and Cassius quarreled constantly over various small matters. In the course of one violent disagreement Brutus told Cassius that Portia, despondent over the outcome of the civil war, had killed herself. Cassius, shocked by this news of his sister's death, allowed himself to be persuaded to leave the safety of the camp at Sardis and meet the enemy on the plains of Philippi. The night before the battle Caesar's ghost appeared to Brutus in his tent and announced that they would meet at Philippi.

At the beginning of the battle the forces of Brutus were at first successful against those of Octavius. Cassius, however, was driven back by Antonius. One morning Cassius sent one of his followers, Titinius, to learn if approaching troops were the enemy or the soldiers of Brutus. When Cassius saw Titinius unseated from his horse by the strangers, he assumed that everything was lost and ordered his servant Pindarus to kill him. Actually, the troops had been sent by Brutus. Rejoicing over the defeat of Octavius, they were having rude sport with Titinius. When they returned to Cassius and found him dead, Titinius also killed himself. In the last charge against Antonius, the soldiers of Brutus, tired and discouraged by these new events, were defeated. Brutus, heartbroken, asked his friends to kill him. When they refused, he commanded his servant to hold his sword and turn his face away. Then Brutus fell upon his sword and died.

Critique:

The Life and Death of King John, is unknown, has as its strongest feature based on a play of which the authorship the depiction of character. In a number of long, unbroken scenes, this aspect of the play is achieved by the stream-of-consciousness presentation. Mother-love plays a major part in this superficial plot of political vacillation. King John, one of the earliest histories by Shakespeare, is one of his weaker dramas.

The Story:

King John sat on the throne of England without right, for the succession should have passed to Arthur of Bretagne, the fourteen-year-old son of King John's older brother. John and Elinor, his mother, prepared to defend England against the forces of Austria and France, after Constance of Bretagne had enlisted the aid of those countries to gain the throne for her son Arthur.

As John and Elinor made ready for battle, Philip Faulconbridge, the natural son of Richard the Lion-Hearted by Lady Faulconbridge, was recruited by Elinor to serve John's cause in the war. The Bastard, weary of his half-brother's slights regarding his illegitimacy, willingly accepted the offer and was knighted by King John.

The French, Austrian, and British armies met at Angiers in France, but the battle was fought with words, not swords. To John's statement that England was ready for war or peace, King Philip of France answered that for the sake of right-doing France would fight for Arthur's place on the throne. When Elinor accused Constance of self-aggrandizement in seeking the throne for her son, Constance accused her mother-in-law of adultery. The Bastard and the Archduke of Austria resorted to a verbal volley.

Louis, the Dauphin of France, halted the prattle by stating Arthur's specific claims, which John refused to grant. The citizens of Angiers announced that they were barring the gates of the city to all until they had proof as to the actual kingship. The leaders prepared for a battle.

After excursions by the three armies, heralds of the various forces appeared to announce their victories to the citizens of Angiers, but the burghers persisted in their demands for more definite proof. At last the Bastard suggested that they batter the walls down and then continue to fight until one side or the other was conquered. Arrangements for the battle brought on more talk, for the citizens suggested a peace settlement among the forces and promised entrance to the city if Blanch of Castile were affianced to the Dauphin of France.

John gladly offered certain provinces as Blanch's dowry, and it was agreed the vows should be solemnized. The Bastard analyzed John's obvious motives: it was better to part with some parcels of land and keep the throne than to lose his kingdom in battle.

Constance, displaying the persistence and tenacity of a mother who wished to see justice done her child, doubted that the proposed alliance would succeed; she wished to have the issue settled in battle. Her hopes rose when Cardinal Pandulph appeared to announce John's excommunication because of his abuse of the Archbishop of Canterbury. John, unperturbed by the decree of excommunication, denounced the pope. The alliance between France and England, the outgrowth of Louis' and Blanch's marriage, could not stand, according to Pandulph, if France hoped also to avoid excommunication. King Philip wisely decided that it would be better to have England as an enemy than to be at odds with Rome.

His change of mind made war necessary. The battle ended with the English victorious. The Bastard beheaded the Archduke of Austria. Arthur was taken prisoner. When Hubert de Burgh pledged his unswerving support to the king, John told him of his hatred for Arthur; he asked that the boy be murdered.

Grieved by her separation from Arthur, Constance lamented that she would never see her son again. Even in heaven, she said, she would be denied this blessing because Arthur's treatment at the hands of the English would change him from the gracious creature he had been.

Pandulph, unwilling to let John have easy victory, persuaded Louis to march against the English forces. The cardinal explained that with Arthur's death—and news of French aggression would undoubtedly mean his death—Louis, as Blanch's husband, could claim Arthur's lands.

In England, Hubert de Burgh had been ordered to burn out Arthur's eyes with hot irons. Although Hubert professed loyalty to John, he had become attached to Arthur while the boy was in his charge. Touched by Arthur's pleas, he refused to carry out King John's orders. After hiding Arthur in another part of the castle, he went to tell John of his decision. On his arrival at the palace, however, he found Pembroke and Salisbury, in conference with the king, pleading for Arthur's life. The people, they reported, were enraged because of John's dastardly action; they threatened to withdraw their fealty to the cruel king. John's sorrow was increased by the information that a large French army had landed in England and that Elinor was dead.

The Bastard, who had been collecting tribute from monks, appeared with Peter of Pomfret, a prophet. When Peter prophesied that John would lose his crown at noon on Ascension Day, John had Peter jailed and ordered his execution if the prophecy were not fulfilled.

Told of Hubert de Burgh's refusal to torture Arthur, the king, overjoyed, sent his chamberlain in pursuit of Pembroke and Salisbury to tell them the good news. But Arthur, fearful for his welfare, had attempted escape from the castle. In jumping from the wall, he fell on the stones and was killed. When Hubert overtook the lords and blurted his tidings, he was confronted by information and proof that Arthur was dead. Pembroke and Salisbury sent word to John that they could be found with the French.

Harried at every turn—deserted by his nobles, disowned by his subjects, attacked by his former ally—John, on Ascension Day, surrendered his crown to Cardinal Pandulph, thus fulfilling Peter's prophecy. He received it back only after he had acknowledged his vassalage to the pope. In return, Pandulph was to order the French to withdraw their forces. Opposed to such arbitration, however, the Bastard secured John's permission to engage the French. King Louis rejected Pandulph's suit for peace. His claim was that officious Rome, having sent neither arms, men, nor money for France's cause in opposing John's hereticism and deviltry, should remain neutral.

Under the direction of the Bastard, the English made a strong stand against the French. The defaulting barons, advised by Melun, a dying French lord, that the Dauphin planned their execution if France won the victory, returned to the king and received his pardon for their disloyalty. But John's graciousness to his barons and his new alliance with Rome brought him only momentary happiness. He was poisoned at Swinstead Abbey and died after intense suffering.

After his death Cardinal Pandulph was able to arrange a truce between the English and French. Prince Henry was named King of England. King Louis returned home to France. The Bastard, brave, dashing, vainglorious, swore his allegiance to the new king. His and England's pride was expressed in his words that England had never been and would never be at a conqueror's feet, except when such a position might lead to future victories.

CORDELIA, Lear's daughters

Critique:

Despite the 300-year-old debate regarding the lack of unity in the plot of King Lear, it is one of the most readable and gripping of Shakespearean dramas. The theme of filial ingratitude is so keenly present in the depiction of two different families, although circumstances do eventually bring the families together to coordinate the plot for unity, that King Lear is not only an absorbing drama but a disturbing one as well. The beauty of diction and the overwhelming pathos of the treatment given to innocence and goodness add to the tragic sadness of this poignantly emotional play. Like the great tragic dramas, the story of Lear and his folly purges the emotions by terror and pity.

The Story:

King Lear, in foolish fondness for his children, decided to divide his kingdom among his three daughters. Grown senile, he scoffed at the foresight of his advisers and declared that each girl's statement of her love for him would determine the portion of the kingdom she would receive as her dowry.

Goneril, the oldest and the Duchess of Albany, spoke first. She said that she loved her father more than eyesight, space, liberty, or life itself. Regan, Duchess of Cornwall, announced that the sentiment of her love had been expressed by Goneril, but that Goneril had stopped short of the statement of Regan's real love. Cordelia, who had secretly confided that her love was more ponderous than her tongue, told her father that because her love was in her heart, not in her mouth, she was willing to sacrifice eloquence for truth. Lear angrily told her that truth alone could be her dowry and ordered that her part of the kingdom be divided between Goneril and Regan. Lear's disappointment in Cordelia's statement grew into a rage against Kent, who tried to reason Cordelia's case with his foolish king. Because of Kent's blunt speech he was given ten days to leave the country. Loving his sovereign, he risked death by disguising himself and remaining in Britain to care for Lear in his infirmity.

When Burgundy and France came as suitors to ask Cordelia's hand in marriage, Burgundy, learning of her dowerless fate, rejected her. France, honoring Cordelia for her virtues, took her as his wife, but Lear dismissed Cordelia and France without his benediction. Goneril and Regan, wary of their father's vacillation in his weakened mental state, set about to establish their kingdoms against change.

Lear was not long in learning what Goneril's and Regan's statements of their love for him had really meant. Their caustic comments about the old man's feebleness, both mental and physical, furnished Lear's Fool with many points for his philosophical recriminations against the king. Realizing that his charity to his daughters had made him homeless, Lear cried in anguish against his fate. His prayers went unanswered, and the abuse he received from his daughters hastened his derangement.

The Earl of Gloucester, like Lear, was fond of his two sons. Edmund, a bastard, afraid that his illegitimacy would deprive him of his share of Gloucester's estate, forged a letter over Edgar's signature, stating that the sons should not have to wait for their fortunes until they were too old to enjoy them. Gloucester, refusing to believe that Edgar desired his father's death, was told by Edmund to wait in hiding and hear Edgar make assertions which could easily be misinterpreted against him. Edmund, furthering his scheme, told Edgar that villainy was afoot and that Edgar should not go unarmed at any time.

To complete his evil design, he later advised Edgar to flee for his own safety. After cutting his arm, he then told his father that he had been wounded while he and Edgar fought over Gloucester's honor. Gloucester, swearing that Edgar would not escape justice, had his son's description circulated so that he might be apprehended.

Edmund, meanwhile, allied himself with Cornwall and Albany to defend Britain against the French army mobilized by Cordelia and her husband to avenge Lear's cruel treatment. He won Regan and Goneril completely by his personal attentions to them and set the sisters against each other by arousing their jealousy.

Lear, wandering as an outcast on the stormy heath, was aided by Kent, disguised as a peasant. Seeking protection from the storm, they found a hut where Edgar, pretending to be a madman, had already taken refuge. Gloucester, searching for the king, found them there and urged them to hurry to Dover, where Cordelia and her husband would protect Lear from the wrath of his unnatural daughters.

For attempting to give succor and condolence to the outcast Lear, Gloucester was blinded when Cornwall, acting on information furnished by Edmund, gouged out his eyes. While he was at his grisly work, a servant, rebelling against the cruel deed, wounded Cornwall. Regan killed the servant. Cornwall died later as the result of his wound. Edgar, still playing the part of a madman, found his father wandering the fields with an old retainer. Without revealing his identity, Edgar promised to guide his father to Dover, where Gloucester planned to die by throwing himself from the high cliffs.

Goneril was bitterly jealous because widowed Regan could receive the full attention of Edmund, who had been made Earl of Gloucester. She declared that she would rather lose the battle to France than to lose Edmund to Regan. Goneril's hatred became more venomous when Albany, whom she detested because of his kindness toward Lear and his pity for Gloucester, announced that he would try to right the wrongs done by Goneril, Regan, and Edmund.

Cordelia, informed by messenger of her father's fate, was in the French camp near Dover. When the mad old king was brought to her by faithful Kent, she cared for her father tenderly and put him in the care of a doctor skilled in curing many kinds of ills. Regaining his reason, Lear recognized Cordelia, but the joy of their reunion was clouded by his repentance for his misunderstanding and mistreatment of his only loyal daughter.

Edgar, protecting Gloucester, was assisted by Oswald, Goneril's steward, on his way to deliver a note to Edmund. After Edgar had killed Oswald in the fight which followed, Edgar delivered the letter to Albany. In it Goneril declared her love for Edmund and asked that he kill her husband. Gloucester died, feeble and broken-hearted after Edgar had revealed himself to his father.

Edmund, commanding the British forces, took Lear and Cordelia prisoners. As they were taken off to prison, he sent written instructions for their treatment.

Albany was aware of Edmund's ambition for personal glory and arrested him on a charge of high treason. Regan, interceding for her lover, was rebuffed by Goneril. Regan, suddenly taken ill, was carried to Albany's tent. When Edmund, as was his right, demanded a trial by combat, Albany agreed. Edgar, still in disguise, appeared and in the fight mortally wounded his false brother. Learning from Albany that he knew of her plot against his life, Goneril was desperate. She went to their tent, poisoned Regan, and killed herself.

Edmund, dying, revealed that he and Goneril had ordered Cordelia to be hanged and her death to be announced as suicide because of her despondency over her father's plight. Edmund, fiendish and diabolical always, was also vain. While he lay dying he looked upon the bodies of Goneril and Regan and expressed pleasure that two women were dead because of their jealous love for him.

Albany dispatched Edgar to prevent Cordelia's death, but he arrived too late. Lear refused all assistance when he appeared carrying her dead body in his arms. After asking forgiveness of heartbroken Kent, whom he recognized at last, Lear, a broken, confused old man, died in anguish.

Edgar and Albany alone were left to rebuild a country ravaged by bloodshed and war.

THE KING OF THE GOLDEN RIVER

Type of work: Fairy tale

Locale: Stiria

First published: 1851

SCHWARTZ, and

HANS, evil brothers

GLUCK, their good brother

THE SOUTH-WEST WIND

THE KING OF THE GOLDEN RIVER

Critique:

First written for the enjoyment of a little girl and not intended for publication, The King of the Golden River, Or, The Black Brothers, a Legend of Stiria has become one of the most popular of Ruskin's works. The plot is not new: the good youngest brother triumphs after the evil older brothers fail and are punished. But just as the stories of Cinderella and Aladdin are always new, so is this story of ancient Stiria and Treasure Valley.

The Story:

In the ancient country of Stiria, there lay a beautiful and fertile valley called Treasure Valley. Surrounded on all sides by high mountainous peaks, the region never knew famine. No matter what droughts or floods attacked the land beyond the mountains, Treasure Valley produced bountiful crops of apples, hay, grapes, and honey. Above the valley beautiful cataracts fell in torrents. One of these shone like gold in the sunlight and thus was named the Golden River.

Treasure Valley was owned by three brothers, Schwartz, Hans, and Gluck. Schwartz and Hans, the older brothers, were stingy and mean. They farmed the valley and killed everything that did not bring them money. They paid their servants nothing, beating them until the servants could stand no more and then turning them out without wages. They kept their crops until they were worth double their usual value in order to sell them for high profits. Gold was stacked up on the floors, yet they gave never a penny to charity. Often people starved at their doorstep without receiving even a morsel of food. Neighbors nicknamed them the Black Brothers.

The youngest brother, Gluck, was a good and honest lad of twelve. Although his heart was filled with pity for the poor, he was helpless against his brothers. He did all their scrubbing and cooking, getting nothing for his pains but an educational cuffing or kicking. One year, when all the country was flooded and only the brothers had a harvest, Schwartz and Hans left Gluck alone one day to turn the roast. A terrible storm was raging. Suddenly Gluck was startled to hear a knock at the door. Investigating, he saw the most peculiar little man imaginable, a creature only about four feet six inches tall, dressed in queer, old-fashioned clothing, who begged to come in out of the rain. Gluck, knowing what his brothers would do if they returned and found a stranger using their fire for warmth, was afraid to open the door. But his heart was so good and tender that he could not long refuse the stranger. The little man dripped so much water that he almost put out the fire. When he asked for food, Gluck feared to give him any. However, his brothers had promised him one slice of the mutton, and he prepared to give the stranger that piece. Before he could finish cutting it, the brothers came home. Furious, they attempted to throw the stranger out, but when Schwartz struck at him, the stick was thrown from his hand. Each of the evil brothers attempted to strike the old man, only to be thrown back upon the floor. Wrapping his long cloak about him, the old man told them that he would come back at midnight, and then never call again.

That night the evil brothers awoke to hear a terrible storm. The roof was gone from their room, and in the darkness, bobbing around like a cork, was the old man. He told them that they would find his calling card on the kitchen table. At dawn they went downstairs to find that the whole valley was in ruin; everything had been flooded and swept away. Their cattle, crops, and gold were all gone. On the table they found a card. Their caller had been the South-West Wind.

He was true to his word. Neither he nor the other winds blew again to bring rain to the valley. The land became a desert, the brothers penniless, and at last they left the valley and went to the city to become goldsmiths, taking with them all that was left of their inheritance, some curious pieces of gold plate. When they mixed copper with the gold to fool the public, the people would not buy the substitute. What little they did make they spent for drink, and soon there was no money left. At last their only possession was a drinking mug belonging to Gluck. On the mug was a face which seemed to peer at whoever was looking at the mug. It broke Gluck's heart when his brothers told him to melt down the mug, but he knew better than to refuse. After they left him to go to the tavern, Gluck put his mug into the furnace. To his surprise he heard a voice speak to him from the flames. Gluck had thought aloud that it would be wonderful if the Golden River really turned to gold, but the voice told him that it would not be good at all. Opening the furnace, Gluck saw the face on the mug emerge on another little man. When the man came out of the furnace, he told Gluck that he was the King of the Golden River. Imprisoned on the mug by a rival, he was now free because of Gluck. Then he told Gluck that whoever should climb to the top of the mountain and cast three drops of holy water into the Golden River would turn the river to gold. But the first attempt must succeed, and should anyone cast unholy water into the river, he would be turned to a black stone. So saying, the king evaporated.

The brothers returned and beat Gluck unmercifully for losing the last of the plate. When he told them the story, however, they decided to try their luck, and they got into a terrible fight to see who should go first. The constable, hearing the noise, went to arrest them. Hans escaped, but Schwartz was carried off to prison. Then Hans stole some holy water, for no priest would give any to such a scoundrel, and journeyed to the mountain. There he found almost impossible obstacles, but he climbed on. Three times he stopped to drink some of the holy water, for he was about to die of thirst. Each time, as he started to drink, a child or an old man or a dog appeared on the path and begged for a few drops of water, for each was dying of thirst. But Hans scorned them and drank the water himself. At last he reached the top and threw the water into the river. Instantly he was turned to a black stone.

Back home, good Gluck worked to pay his brother's fine. When he was freed, Schwartz also left for the Golden River. He bought holy water from a bad priest. Like his brother, he was beset with many difficulties. And like his brother, he met the three who begged a few drops of water; but he passed on, keeping the water for himself. Then he reached the top and threw his three drops into the stream. He too was turned to black stone.

When Schwartz did not come back, Gluck decided to try his luck. A priest gladly gave him holy water, for he was a good boy. The mountain was even more difficult for him than it had been for his brothers, for he was young and weak. But when he stopped to drink and the old man appeared and asked for water, Gluck shared with him. His way grew lighter. He stopped again and saw the child lying in the path. Again he shared his water, and again the way became less difficult. When he had almost reached the top, he saw the dog gasping for breath, needing water. He had very little left and at first thought he would pass by, but then he looked into the beast's eyes and his heart was moved. He poured the remaining drops into the dog's open mouth. Then the dog disappeared and in his place stood the King of the Golden River. He told Gluck that his brothers had been turned to stone because their water had been unholy through their refusal to help the weak and the dying. Then the king plucked a flower containing three drops of dew and told Gluck to cast them into the river. As he did so the king disappeared. At first Gluck was disappointed because the river did not turn to gold. Instead, it began to disappear. Descending into the valley, as the king had told him to do, he heard the water gurgling under the ground. Green grass and plants began to grow as if by magic. Then Gluck understood that the river had turned to gold by making the land fertile and valuable again. He went to live in the valley and prospered. The poor were always welcomed at his door. To this day the people point out the spot where the river turned into the valley, a place still bordered by the two black brothers.

DMITRI, a Greek boy who loves Photini

HADGI-STAVROS, a Greek bandit

MRS. SIMONS, an Englishwoman

Critique:

Practically unknown in this country, About's novel deserves to be more widely read, for it is ingenious, clever, and witty. Edmond About, who was well-known and honored in his own country, is the equal of many French writers whom we consider great. It would be difficult to find a book by any of his contemporaries that is so completely enjoyable as this one.

The Story:

While the German botanist, Hermann Schultz, was lodging with a Greek family in Athens, he learned of a notorious Greek bandit so powerful that the government could not destroy his band and so cruel that he had decapitated two young girls he had been holding for ransom. Hadgi-Stavros, the King of the Mountains, was greatly feared, but he was also greatly admired by many of his countrymen. John Harris, an American who was Hermann's fellow lodger, snorted in disgust as the landlord recited with admiration all the exploits of the bandit. Harris was so indignant he was unaware that when he spoke Photini, a young Greek girl who came to the house in order to learn foreign languages from the lodgers, looked at him with love in her eyes.

The newspapers announced the defeat of Hadgi-Stavros and his brigands, and Hermann believed it safe to leave Athens in order to continue his botanical research. Unfamiliar with the territory, however, he lost his way. Finally he met the landlord's son, Dmitri, who was acting as guide for two Englishwomen, Mrs. Simons and her daughter Mary Ann. Hermann joined their party. When Mrs. Simons, arrogant and querulous, demanded that they stop to eat, Dmitri told her they could find food at the next village. But when they arrived there, the village was deserted; everyone had fled. Dmitri said they could stop at a monastery, only a ten-minute walk away. At the monastery a monk told them that bandits were in the district and he advised them to flee for their lives.

A few minutes later the brigands appeared and surrounded them, despite Mrs. Simons' indignant assertion that she was English. They were led to the hide-out of the chief, where Hadgi-Stavros was sitting dictating letters to business firms, to clients, to his daughter who was away at school. When he was through, he ordered food for the captives and Mrs. Simons felt much better.

By clever questioning, Hadgi-Stavros learned that Mrs. Simons was extremely wealthy, and he ordered that she should be held for ransom. When Hermann protested that he was without money or influential friends, Hadgi-Stavros said that he could take Mrs. Simons' note back to Athens. But when the bandit learned that Hermann was a scientist, a learned man, he decided to hold him for ransom as well.

Mrs. Simons insisted that she would pay nothing, that the soldiers would follow and rescue them. Hermann was discouraged, for he knew that the soldiers would do nothing of the kind. One day a troop of soldiers appeared, and the leader, Captain Pericles, was received with affection. While the bandits went off on a raid, Pericles kept guard over the prisoners. Pretending that he had rescued them, he collected as evidence against the bandit the valuables of the two women. When Hermann protested, he was put under guard. Only after the brigands had returned and were seen in friendly activity with the soldiers was Mrs. Simons convinced that Captain Pericles was in league with Hadgi-Stavros.

Hermann planned to escape by going down a ravine and across a stream, but the plan was abandoned because he could help only one of the women down the steep slope to safety. Later he had another idea. He had heard Hadgi-Stavros dictate to his English bankers, the company owned by Mrs. Simons and her brother. He had Hadgi-Stavros sign two receipts, one for the ransom of Mrs. Simons and Mary Ann, another for his own. The idea was that the banker would deduct the sum from Hadgi-Stavros' account and by the time the bandit discovered that he had been swindled they would be far away. The plan worked, except that Mrs. Simons' brother did not honor the receipt for the botanist. Hermann was condemned to stay. But Mrs. Simons, who had hinted at matrimony for her daughter and Hermann, told him that surely he could escape. She insisted that the first thing he must do when he returned to Athens was to call on her.

Hermann's opportunity to escape came a few days later, when the bandit allowed him, in company with two guards, to go out looking for plants. Hermann ran away from the guards and would have outdistanced his pursuers if his suspenders had not broken. He was recaptured and put under guard. Then he succeeded in getting his guard drunk and escaping across the ravine. Coming face to face with one of the dogs guarding the camp, he fed it some of the arsenic he carried in his specimen box. In his escape he had accidentally drowned his drunken guard, and when the man's body was discovered the bandits set out in pursuit. Hermann was captured once more. Hadgi-Stavros ordered Hermann struck twenty times across the toes and twenty times across the fingers. In anger and pain Hermann told Hadgi-Stavros that he had been duped in the payment of the ransom money. The bandit was furious. Hermann had robbed him, ruined him, he declared.

He offered a reward to any of his men who would devise horrible tortures for Hermann. Meanwhile the prisoner had his hair plucked from his head; later he was put near an open fire to roast. While there, he succeeded in putting arsenic into the food. Then Dmitri arrived in the camp with a letter from John Harris. Hadgi-Stavros read it and turned pale. Harris was holding his daughter as a hostage aboard a ship until Hermann was released, and the daughter was the homely Photini who had loved Harris since she met him at the boarding-house. In anxiety for his daughter, Hadgi-Stavros ordered Hermann to be treated for his wounds and then set free. Before Hermann left the camp, however, Hadgi-Stavros and those who had eaten fell ill, poisoned by the arsenic.

Fighting broke out among the bandits. Some wished to kill the unconscious king and Hermann as well. Those loyal to Hadgi-Stavros defended their leader while Hermann attempted to cure the sick bandit. The fighting ended when Harris and some friends arrived to rescue Hermann and the king.

Hadgi-Stavros went back to Athens and Photini. At a ball Harris and Hermann saw Mrs. Simons and Mary Ann, but Mrs. Simons treated Hermann with icy politeness. The next day Harris and Hermann went to call on them, but the women had left suddenly for Paris. Hermann gave up all hopes of marriage with the beautiful Mary Ann.

KING PARADOX

Type of work: Novel

Author: Pío Baroja (1872-1956)

Type of plot: Social satire

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Spain, Tangier, and the imaginary Bu-Tata, in Uganga, Africa

SILVESTRE PARADOX, a modern adventurer

AVELINO DIZ, his skeptical friend

ARTHUR SIPSOM, an English manufacturer of needles
EICHTHAL THONELGEBEN, a scientist
HARDIBRÁS, a crippled soldier
UGÚ, a friendly Negro
BAGÚ, a jealous medicine man

Critique:

Pío Baroja y Nessi believes that fiction must parallel life. Therefore his writing is abrupt, episodic, simple, unrevised, with a wealth of unselected details. His Basque temperament shows in his underlying melancholy and pessimism. At the same time he has deep sympathy for the underdog and the disinherited; he has written a great deal about the needy and the oppressed. His plots, lacking proportion, are not unified or well rounded, and his ideas often become the chief protagonists in his books. Three times he stops King Paradox with interludes which, like classical Greek choruses, tie the story together, and in frequent soliloquies he points out that life is a commonplace, monotonous melody played before a limitless horizon. Even in his imaginary Utopia it is impossible to escape the evils of contemporary culture and civilization. Except for a series of twenty-two volumes called Memories of a Man of Action, the story of a nineteenth-century soldier of fortune related to the author, Baroja conceived most of his books as trilogies. One of the nine he has written is The Fantastic Life, of which Paradox Rey is the third and best volume.

The Story:

After many adventures Dr. Silvestre Paradox, a short, chubby man of about forty-five, settled in a small Valencian town. Tiring at last of his quiet life, he announced one morning to his friend, Avelino Diz, his intention of taking a trip to Cananí, on the Gulf of Guinea. A British banker, Abraham Wolf, was setting out on his yacht Cornucopia with a party of scientists and explorers for the purpose of establishing a Jewish colony in Africa, and he had invited Paradox to go with him. Paradox suggested that Diz join the expedition.

In Tangier they met several other members of the party, including General Pérez and his daughter Dora, and a crippled, scarred soldier named Hardibrás. They drank to the success of the venture in whiskey. When one of the company fed whiskey to a rooster, the fowl broke into human speech and deplored what humans drink. Paradox declared that only Nature is just and honorable. He was eager to go where people lived naturally.

They boarded the yacht, Hardibrás swinging himself aboard by the hook he wore in place of his lost hand. There Paradox and Diz met others of the expedition: Mingote, a revolutionist who had tried to assassinate the King of Portugal; Pelayo, who had been Paradox's secretary until his employer fired him for crooked dealings; Sipsom, an English manufacturer; Miss Pich, a feminist writer and ex-ballet dancer, and "The Cheese Kid," a former French cancan dancer. Wolf himself was not on board. He was conferring with Monsieur Chabouly, a French chocolate king who was also Emperor of Western Nigritia, in an attempt to establish peaceful diplomatic relations between Chabouly's domain and the new state of Cananí.

The yacht put out to sea. On the third day stormy waves washed the captain overboard. Because the mate and the crew were drunk, Paradox and two others were forced to take over the yacht. Paradox, alone at the wheel, conversed with the wind and the sea, who told him that they had wills of their own. Yock, his dog, admired his master's resolution and strength, and declared that he was almost worthy of being a dog.

The storm increasing in fury, the mast broke and crashed upon the deck. Paradox called the passengers together and suggested that one of them, Goizueta, be made captain because of maritime experience he had had. Goizueta was elected. His first act, after saving one bottle of brandy for medicine, was to throw the rest overboard.

For a week they sailed through heavy fog that never lifted to reveal their position. At last the coal gave out and they drifted. One night some of the passengers and crew, Miss Pich, Mingote, and Pelayo among them, stole the only lifeboat and deserted the ship.

When the fog lifted, the passengers saw a beach not far away. The yacht struck a rock, but all were able to save themselves on rafts which they loaded with supplies from the ship. The next morning the yacht broke up, leaving the party marooned on a desert island.

It was then proposed that Paradox be put in charge. After modestly protesting, he accepted and assigned jobs to all the survivors. But he failed to make provisions for their defense. The next night a band of Negroes came in two canoes, surprised the sleepers, and took them bound to Bu-Tata.

The first demand Prime Minister Funangué made was for rum. One of the party, Sipsom, explained that they could provide rum only if they were allowed to return to their base of supplies. In his greed Funangué decided to ignore the advice of Bagú, the medicine man, who wanted all the whites slain. A friendly native, Ugú, was assigned to instruct the prisoners in tribal language and customs. From Ugú the captives learned Bagú's prejudices and superstitions. When the witch doctor later appeared, Sipsom declared that one of the prisoners was a wizard fated to die on the same day as Bagú. If Bagú sided with them, however, the white magician would help the medicine man to marry Princess Mahu, King Kiri's daughter. Bagú agreed.

King Kiri, engaged in his favorite pastime of killing subjects whom he disliked, paused in his diversion long enough to receive the prisoners. After a conversation about vested interests, he ordered that their lives be spared. Giving them permission to get supplies from their camp, he dispatched them under guard in two canoes. During the trip the prisoners, having lulled the suspicions of the guards, were about to take their guns and free themselves, but Paradox objected. He said that he had other plans. Diz scoffed at the way his friend put on airs.

After damaging one canoe, the prisoners used the delay to impress the Negroes with their white superiority by working magic tricks. A Frenchman in the party led a discussion on the rights of man. The scheme worked. After two weeks the Negroes agreed to desert their king and accompany the whites to Fortunate Island, a defensible plateau suggested by Ugú. Although Paradox preached the virtues of life out of doors, the others built Fortune House, a communal dwelling.

When King Kiri's army appeared, Paradox's machine gun quickly repulsed them and a searchlight finally put the natives to flight. Peace having come to Fortune House, the Negroes built huts and spent their evenings at magic-lantern shows. The Fortune House Herald began publication.

Prime Minister Funangué and two attendants, appearing under a flag of truce, brought King Kiri's appeal for help. The Fulani were attacking Bu-Tata. Paradox and Thonelgeben, the engineer, returned to the capital with the Negroes. At Paradox's suggestion, the river was dynamited to turn Bu-Tata into an island. Bagú objected to such interference with nature and discussed the change with fish, serpents, and frogs. Only the bat refused to voice an opinion.

One day warriors from Bu-Tata appeared at Fortune House with the head of King Kiri and begged one of the whites to become their ruler. At a meeting all debated monarchical theories. When they failed to agree, Sipsom showed Paradox to the natives and announced that he had been chosen by popular vote. All returned to Bu-Tata for a coronation feast.

But by that time Paradox, reconciled to the advantages of civilization over life close to nature, was tired of Africa. At a session of Congress he argued against state support of art and criticized formal education.

Pelayo and Mingote, captured by Moors after the storm, arrived in Bu-Tata. Miss Pich had been violated by savages. The others had been eaten.

Political life continued. Two couples of the whites got married. Sipsom held law court and gave judgment in complicated cases. Then the French captured Bu-Tata and burned it. The whites were released at the request of "The Cheese Kid." Bagú was shot.

Three years later an epidemic filled the Bu-Tata Hospital. French doctors declared the outbreak the result of civilization, for one of the doctors had unknowingly taken smallpox to a native village while fighting another epidemic. Civilization had also driven Princess Mahu to dancing nude in a night club. As an enterprising journalist stated in L'Echo of Bu-Tata, the French army had brought civilization to that backward country.

THE KING, THE GREATEST ALCALDE

Type of work: Drama

Author: Lope de Vega (Lope Félix de Vega Carpio, 1562-1635)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Spain

First presented: 1635

Principal characters:

SANCHO, a poor laborer

NUNO, a farmer

ELVIRA, his daughter

DON TELLO DE NEIRA, a nobleman

FELICIANA, his sister

PELAYO, a swineherd

DON ALFONSO VII, King of Leon and Castile

Critique:

Today we would call The King, the Greatest Alcalde, a social drama, for it portrays vividly the struggle of the peasantry against the nobility. The power is on the side of the aristocracy, but honor on the side of the poor. There is tragedy here, the tragedy of honor lost in spite of bitter fighting to retain it. But there is comedy also, Pelayo being one of the best clowns in all literature. That Lope de Vega loved the common people is evident throughout the play. Justice triumphs in the end, but too late to save the honor of the virtuous Elvira. The playwright intended that his audience should weep for her and for all the poor of his country, even while rejoicing at the happy conclusion of the story.

The Story:

Sancho, a poor peasant, was in love with an equally poor girl, Elvira, the daughter of Nuno, a farmer. When the old man gave Sancho permission to wed his daughter, he insisted that Sancho secure also the consent of Don Tello, master of all the surrounding lands, and of Don Tello's sister, Feliciana. In obedience to Nuno, Sancho went with Pelayo, a swineherd, to the castle to ask his lord's approval of the marriage. Both Don Tello and his sister Feliciana readily gave their consent and their blessing, and declared that they themselves would attend the wedding.

But when Don Tello saw the beautiful Elvira, he was filled with such passion for her that he decided to postpone the wedding, take Elvira to satisfy his own lust, and then give her to Sancho for his wife. Dismissing the priest, he told the assembled guests that the wedding must wait until the next day. Sancho and Elvira felt themselves already married, however, since the priest had heard them declare their true love for each other, and Sancho planned to go to Elvira's room that night. When Elvira opened her door, she confronted not her lover but Don Tello and his attendants, all masked, who carried her off to the castle.

Sancho and Nuno, learning of this betrayal, were ready to die. Nuno cautioned Sancho not to despair, however, for he knew his daughter would die rather than lose her honor. Nuno knew his daughter well. Although Don Tello pleaded with her and threatened her, she would not give herself to him. Feliciana begged him to remember his good name and his honor and not to force the girl.

Sancho and Nuno, going to Don Tello, pretended that they had heard but could not believe that he had stolen Elvira away. Don Tello pretended also that he was outraged at such a story and would have whipped those who told such lies to defame his honor. But when Elvira entered the room, Don Tello flew into a rage and ordered Sancho and Nuno beaten to death. They fled for their lives. Don Tello then vowed that he would force Elvira to submit to him or be killed. Again Sancho wanted to die, but once more Nuno persuaded him that there was still hope. He sent Sancho and Pelayo to the court of Alfonso, King of Castile, for the king was a good man and well-known for his justice in dealing with high and low alike.

When the king heard Sancho's story, he immediately wrote a letter to Don Tello, ordering him to release Elvira at once. Don Tello ignored the letter and declared that on his own land his people would do only his will. Pelayo assured Sancho that Don Tello had not yet possessed Elvira, for he would have obeyed the king had his lust been satisfied. Sancho and Pelayo went again to the king, to tell him that Don Tello had not obeyed his orders. The king promised to go in person to Don Tello and force him to return Elvira to her father and husband-to-be. He intended to go in disguise, taking with him only two attendants.

Don Tello, filled with wild rage and passion at Elvira's refusal to accept him, swore that he would take her by force. Nuno spoke with her through the bars of the room where she was confined and told her that Sancho had gone for help, and she promised again to die rather than lose her virtue. When Sancho and Pelayo returned with word that the king was sending help, Nuno was not much encouraged, for he knew that Don Tello kept his castle well guarded and could not be overcome by just three men. What Nuno did not know was that the king himself was coming, even though Pelayo was hard put to it to keep the secret.

When King Alfonso arrived, he questioned Nuno's servants and was convinced that Sancho and Nuno told the truth. Then he went in disguise to Don Tello's castle. There he was rudely received by that haughty nobleman. At last the king revealed himself and ordered Elvira brought before him. Elvira told her story, of her pure love for Sancho, of obtaining her father's and Don Tello's permission, of her seizure by Don Tello and his men, and finally of her lost honor. For Don Tello had carried out his vow. He had ordered her taken into a wood and there, even though she fought until she was weak, he had ravished her. She declared that she could never know joy again, for her honor was lost forever.

The king ordered Don Tello beheaded, both for his treatment of the innocent girl and for his failure to obey the king's command sent in his earlier letter. Although Feliciana pleaded for her brother, the king refused to be moved by her tears. Don Tello confessed that he deserved the penalty, for he had sinned twice, against his own honor and against the king. Then the king pronounced his final sentence. He would wed Elvira to Don Tello, then execute him. As his widow Elvira would inherit half his lands and gold. These would be her dowry when she married Sancho. Feliciana he would take to court, to wait on the queen until a noble husband could be secured for her. The peasants blessed the king's wisdom and actions, for he had righted all their wrongs.

KINGS IN EXILE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Alphonse Daudet (1840-1897)

Type of plot: Political romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1879

Principal characters:

CHRISTIAN II, exiled King of Illyria

FREDERICA, Queen of Illyria

PRINCE LEOPOLD, their son

ELYSÉE MÉRAUT, the prince's tutor

SÉPHORA LEVIS, Christian's mistress

Critique:

More tragic than its successors, Kings in Exile is a forerunner of the highly imaginative and popular Graustarkian romance. As a novel, this book is interesting and satisfying. Daudet's style is a marvelous combination of the simple and the grand, the archaic and the new.

The Story:

When a revolution broke out in Illyria, King Christian II and Queen Frederica fought bravely against the rebels, and after the story of the siege of Ragusa became known throughout Europe much was said about the wonderful bravery of the king. In reality, most of the credit for the defense of the city should have gone to Frederica, who was in every way a queen. Christian was a king who had never had any great desire to wear the crown or occupy the throne.

At last the deposed rulers fled to Paris, where they took rooms in a hotel. There they were greeted by the Duke of Rosen, his son, and his daughter-in-law. Three years before, the duke, a former Illyrian minister, had been deposed by the king to placate the liberal elements of the country. Now he had come to offer his services to his sovereign once more. They were accepted.

The monarchs thought that their stay in Paris would be brief, that the new republic would soon collapse and the monarchy be restored. Accordingly, Frederica refused to unpack anything. There was an air of the temporary and transitory about their lodgings.

Later it became clear that the republic would last and that the monarchy was doomed. Frederica resigned herself to a long exile from Illyria. The royal family purchased a house and settled down to wait. As time passed, Christian became more and more a frequenter of Parisian theaters and cafés until his activities were known all over the city and the subject of much conversation and scandal. The Duke of Rosen's daughter-in-law became his mistress.

Following the recommendations of two priests, the queen had engaged a tutor for the young prince. He was Elysée Méraut, who was supposed to teach the prince all that he would need to know to be a good sovereign. But the prince was not particularly intellectual. Furthermore, his father did not encourage the lessons, for he had given up all hope of ever regaining his lost throne; in fact, he was glad to escape the responsibilities of the crown.

Although the Duke of Rosen tried to do his best with the royal finances, the monarchs were, in reality, bankrupt. Elysée discovered that fact when he learned that the king was selling decorations, citations, and military orders to cover his debts. When the queen learned of the situation, she consulted the duke, who admitted that he had been using his own funds to support the monarchs in a regal style. She forbade him to continue his expenditures and the household took on an air of austerity.

In the meantime the king had given up his mistress and had become enamored of Séphora Levis, the wife of Tom Levis, a broker who posed as an Englishman and who had made a fortune out of catering to the whims and needs of exiled royalty. Séphora did not love the king. She promised him, however, that she would become his mistress after he had abdicated his throne. She wished to show him, she insisted, that she loved him for himself and not for his title. In reality, Séphora, Levis, and one of the king's councillors were involved in a plot to profit handsomely by Christian's abdication, for the Illyrian diet had offered the king a large private fortune if he would renounce the throne for himself and his descendants.

At first the king was unwilling to abdicate because he enjoyed too much the privileges of royalty without being willing to assume the responsibilities of his position. But at last he gave Séphora a title and promised her that he would give up his claim to the throne. Elysée, learning of his intention, notified the queen. She and Leopold went at once to the king's room, where he had just signed the act of renunciation. After informing him of a plan to invade Illyria, a plot hitherto kept from the pleasure-loving monarch, Frederica threatened to jump from the window with her child unless Christian destroyed the document he had signed. The king yielded to her desperate demands.

But the invasion attempt failed, for the Illyrian authorities had been warned in advance of the conspirators in Paris. Frederica came to the conclusion that there was only one course for Christian to take; he should abdicate in favor of his son. The king signed an act of abdication by which the young prince became King Leopold V of Illyria and Dalmatia.

Meanwhile a feeling very close to love had grown up between the neglected queen and the loyal tutor. One day, while the prince and Elysée were shooting at a mark in the garden, Leopold was accidentally wounded in one eye. The queen, in sorrow and anger, banished the tutor, and he went back to his dingy apartment.

Frederica took her son to consult a famous Parisian oculist. The doctor told her that the prince had lost the sight of one eye, that he would certainly lose the sight of the other eye, and that an operation was impossible because it would imperil his life. The queen was in despair.

A short time later she heard that Elysée Méraut was dying. As he lay on his deathbed, he heard the door open. Then there came to him a familiar voice—the voice of the young King Leopold, whom the loyal monarchist had loved. Frederica had brought him to see his old tutor. Elysée Méraut died a happy man.

KIPPS

Type of work: Novel

Author: H. G. Wells (1866-1946)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: England

First published: 1905

Principal characters:

ARTHUR KIPPS, a simple soul

ANN PORNICK, a neighbor girl

HELEN WALSINGHAM, a "lady"

MR. CHITTERLOW, Kipps' friend

Critique:

When H. G. Wells gave Kipps a subtitle, The Story of a Simple Soul, he summarized the novel briefly and concisely. Kipps was certainly simple, but he was also delightful. His rise in the world brought little change in his character, although he tried valiantly to make the change. Thus his downfall caused him little heartache and in one sense brought him happiness, for he could be himself at last.

The Story:

Young Arthur Kipps knew there was something mysterious about his birth, but his memories of his mother were so vague that they were all but meaningless. He knew only that she had gone away, leaving him in the care of his aunt and uncle and providing a small sum for his education. His was a bleak childhood spent in a wretched school in which he learned nothing. His vacations were dominated by his aunt's notions of what was proper. His unhappy childhood was lightened somewhat, however, by his friendship with a boy of "low" class and the boy's sister, Ann Pornick. One day he and Ann tore a sixpence note in two, each keeping a half. This was Kipps' first venture in love, but it was short-lived. When he finished school he was apprenticed to a draper. Soon afterward the Pornicks moved away and Ann went into domestic service.

His life as an apprentice was as dull as his childhood. After seven years he was given a position in the firm at twenty pounds a year. He was engaged several times, that being the custom among his friends. But his next real infatuation, after Ann, was for Miss Helen Walsingham, a lady in the true sense. She taught woodcarving in a class he attended for self-improvement. Kipps felt keenly his ignorance about the ways of the world. Helen was so far above him in station that he could only stare at her in awe, for he could neither talk nor act in any way other than clumsily.

But Kipps' fortunes were soon to change. Through an accident he made the acquaintance of Mr. Chitterlow, a would-be playwright and actor. Because Chitterlow poured whiskey into Kipps at an alarming rate, the young man got drunk and stayed away from his residence, which was also his business address, all night, and he found himself the next morning with a month's notice. As he cursed himself for a fool, Chitterlow burst upon him again with news that a person answering Kipps' description was being advertised for by a solicitor. When Kipps investigated, he found that he had inherited a fortune, twelve hundred pounds a year and a handsome house, to be exact. He learned then that he had been the illegitimate son of a gentleman whose father would not let him marry Kipps' mother. Both his parents were dead, as was his grandfather. The old gentleman had relented before his death and left his fortune to his unknown grandson.

Bewildered by his new wealth, Kipps could do nothing constructive for some time. He felt a great need for knowledge of things of which he was dismally ignorant. He was besieged by requests for charity and by salesmen of all descriptions. Chitterlow persuaded him to buy a quarter interest in a play which he was writing, and his uncle invested money for him in all sorts of bargains in antiques which might one day be valuable.

Soon after he became wealthy Kipps met Helen Walsingham again. He felt as unsure of himself as ever, but there was a definite change in her attitude. Formerly she had been aloof; now she was warm and friendly. Before long she had maneuvered him into a proposal and agreed to teach him the things he needed to know in his new position. Kipps found himself scrutinized and instructed on every move he made, for Helen attempted to change his speech, his habits of dress, his social manners, and his attitudes. At first he was grateful, but although he was not aware of it, his infatuation was changing to gloom. Helen even persuaded him to change solicitors and to give his business to her brother, who had a short time before opened an office.

While visiting his aunt and uncle, Kipps met Ann Pornick again. She was not aware of his new fortune, even though he had recently seen her brother and told him the news. Pornick had turned Socialist, and his contempt for Kipps' new wealth, coupled with jealousy, had prevented his telling Ann of his old friend's good luck. Ann, acting naturally with Kipps, made him yearn for the simple life he had once known. The fact that she was in service bothered his new feeling of class superiority, however, and he tried to put her out of his mind. When he met her again, as a servant in the house in which he was a guest, he could control himself no longer. He threw caution and caste to the winds and asked her to marry him. She, having now learned of his position, protested feebly at the difference in their stations, but soon succumbed to his pleas and married him.

Their married life settled into the humdrum made necessary by idleness. He had let his fine house, and they prepared to build a home. Ann wanted a small house in which she could do her own work, but Kipps planned a larger one of about six rooms. But by the time the architect and Kipps' uncle finished with him, he found himself committed to a house of eleven bedrooms. Ann felt so inferior to him and longed so much for a simpler life that she often wept. Kipps felt the same longings but, convinced that he ought to live well and in society, did not identify them as such.

An abrupt change took place in their lives when he learned from Helen Walsingham that her brother had used Kipps' money for speculation and had lost everything before fleeing the country. Expecting to be penniless again, Kipps and Ann were satisfied when they learned that they still had about four thousand pounds, perhaps more. He fulfilled an ambition of some duration by opening a little bookshop. He knew nothing about books but he prospered enough to meet their now simple wants. The unfinished mansion was sold, and the happy couple settled down to a simple life that pleased them both. Then Chitterlow hit a stroke of luck and sold his play in which Kipps had bought a quarter interest. The play was a huge success, and Kipps collected many times his original investment of one hundred pounds.

When Ann presented him with a son, Kipps' joy was overflowing. Although he was almost as rich as he had been when he had his twelve hundred a year, he longed no more for self-improvement. He thought himself the happiest man alive. Who knows? Perhaps he was.

THE KNIGHT OF THE BURNING PESTLE

Type of work: Drama

Author: Francis Beaumont (1584?-1616)

Type of plot: Mock-heroic comedy

Time of plot: Early seventeenth century

Locale: England and Moldavia

First presented: c. 1607

Principal characters:

GEORGE, a London greengrocer

NELL, his wife

RALPH, an apprentice to George

VENTUREWELL, a London merchant

JASPER MERRYTHOUGHT, his apprentice

MASTER HUMPHREY, a slow-witted youth

LUCE, Venturewell's daughter

MERRYTHOUGHT, a carefree old gentleman

Critique:

Francis Beaumont, the son of a knight, could well have been cruel in a dramatic treatment of the workaday citizens of London, but in The Knight of the Burning Pestle, he reveals, beneath the hilarious burlesque of the plot, a warm sympathy for and a large understanding of the London lower middle classes, as represented by George, the greengrocer, his wife Nell, and Ralph, their apprentice. An outstanding feature of the play is the farcical audience participation. This device, a startling innovation in 1607, survives to the present day in semi-dramatic situations of broad humor. The Knight of the Burning Pestle was probably written under the influence of the keen interest taken by the literate of James I's time in Spanish prose fiction; surely Beaumont had heard of, if he had not read, Cervantes' Don Quixote, echoes of which mark the play.

The Story:

A production in a London theater was abruptly interrupted when George, a greengrocer, declared that he wanted to see a new kind of play, one in which the common man of London was glorified. Sitting beside him in the audience, George's wife Nell further suggested that there be a grocer in the play and that he kill a lion with a pestle. The indulgent speaker of the prologue agreed to these demands after George had offered his own apprentice, Ralph, to play the part of the commoner-hero. So the play began.

For presuming to love Luce Venturewell, the daughter of his master, apprentice Jasper Merrythought was discharged. Old Venturewell had chosen Master Humphrey, a foolish young citizen, for his daughter, but Luce, in league with Jasper, told the gullible Humphrey that to win her love he must abduct her and take her to Waltham Forest, where she planned to meet Jasper. (In the audience, Nell, the grocer's wife, commented that Humphrey was a fine young man.)

In a grocer's shop Ralph read a chivalric romance and, yearning for the olden times, determined himself to become a knight-errant. He enlisted his two apprentices, Tim and George, to be his foils; the one, his squire; the other, his dwarf. Dubbing himself The Knight of the Burning Pestle, Ralph explained the rules of knight-errantry to his amused followers. (Nell, pleased with Ralph's first appearance on the stage, clamored for his immediate return.)

In the meantime Jasper went home and collected his patrimony—all of ten shillings—from his indigent but carefree father, old Merrythought. Mrs. Merrythought, sick of hard times, packed her few valuables into a small chest and, with her younger son, Michael, left home to seek a better fortune. (In the pit, George and Nell grew impatient for the reappearance of Ralph, their prodigious apprentice.)

Simple-minded Humphrey told old Venturewell of Luce's whimsical conditions for their marriage, and the old man consented to the plan.

Mrs. Merrythought and Michael, traveling afoot, arrived in Waltham Forest. While resting, they grew frightened and ran away when Ralph, as the Knight of the Burning Pestle, appeared with his retainers. (George and Nell, from their places at the edge of the stage, shouted a welcome to Ralph.) Ralph, assuming that Mrs. Merrythought had fled from some evil knight, followed her in order to rescue her from her distress. Jasper, arriving in the forest to meet Luce, picked up the casket containing Mrs. Merrythought's valuables. (Nell, scandalized, declared that she would tell Ralph what Jasper had done.)

When Mrs. Merrythought reported her loss to Ralph, he, in extravagantly courteous language, promised to assist her in regaining her valuables. (George and Nell commended themselves for having trained such a polite and virtuous apprentice.)

Humphrey and Luce came also to the forest, where they found Jasper waiting. Jasper, after thrashing Humphrey soundly, departed with Luce. (George and Nell, sorry for Humphrey, offered to call back Ralph to fight Jasper. The protests of the theater boy notwithstanding, the grocer and his wife wanted to change the plot to see Jasper properly punished.) Ralph immediately abandoned his search for Mrs. Merrythought's valuables and set out after the runaways. Overtaking them, he challenged Jasper in the language of knight-errantry. (Nell, at this juncture, exhorted Ralph to break Jasper's head.) Jasper, taking Ralph's pestle from him, knocked down the Knight of the Burning Pestle. (George tried to explain Ralph's defeat by saying that Jasper was endowed with magical powers.)

thought, and Michael put up for the night at the Bell Inn in Waltham. When they mistook the inn for a castle, the innkeeper indulgently joined them in their make-believe.

Humphrey, meanwhile, had returned to old Venturewell, to whom he complained of his treatment at the hands of Jasper. Irate, Venturewell went to old Merrythought and threatened to kill Jasper. (George and Nell at this point were so taken with the plot of the play that they believed it to be real.) Old Merrythought, carefree as usual, paid no heed to Venturewell's vengeful threats.

That night, while Luce was asleep in Waltham Forest, Jasper decided to test her love for him. Drawing his sword, he aroused the girl with threats that he intended to kill her because her father had discharged him. (Nell excitedly urged George to raise the London watch, to prevent what appeared to her to be certain violence.) As Luce trustingly submitted to Jasper's threats, Venturewell, Humphrey, and their men appeared and rescued her. Jasper, hopeful that he might somehow explain his behavior to Luce, followed them.

Next morning, at the Bell Inn, Ralph, unable to pay the reckoning, was threatened by the landlord. (George gave Ralph twelve shillings so that he could pay.) Mrs. Merrythought and Michael, disenchanted, went home. But Ralph, still in search of romantic adventure, was directed by the innkeeper to a barber shop in the town, where, he said, a giant named Barbaroso committed enormities every day. (At this point Mrs. Merrythought returned to the stage, only to be dragged off by George and Nell, who could not wait to see Ralph's fight with the barber.)

Ralph, after challenging the barber to mortal combat, knocked him down. While he begged for mercy, Ralph directed his retainers to liberate the barber's victims. One was a knight whose face was covered with lather. Another was a man on whom the barber had done minor surgery.

As other victims appeared, the barber was spared on the condition that he no longer subject humans to such indignities. (George and Nell beamed with pride at Ralph's conquest of the giant Barbaroso, and Nell allowed Mrs. Merrythought and Michael to appear on the stage.)

Mrs. Merrythought despaired because she was unable to get old Merrythought to have a serious thought. (Nell, furious at the old man's carefree indifference, ordered a beer to calm her temper. Then the action of the play became somewhat too pedestrian for the tastes of George and Nell. The couple next requested that Ralph be involved in a truly exotic adventure.)

Ralph suddenly found himself an honored guest at the court of Moldavia. Courteously rejecting Princess Pompiana's favors, he declared that he was promised to Susan, the daughter of a cobbler in London. (George gave Ralph a handful of small coins to distribute as largess to the royal household. Nell commended Ralph's loyalty and patriotism in preferring a London girl to a princess of a foreign land.)

Luce, meanwhile, was confined to her room with the prospect of marriage to Humphrey in three days' time. Mrs. Merrythought sought aid, unsuccessfully, from old Venturewell. Venturewell received a letter of repentance from Jasper, allegedly written by the youth as he lay dying of a broken heart, with the request that his body be conveyed to Luce. Hard upon the letter came a coffin, which was carried to Luce's room. Jasper, quite alive, sprang from the coffin, made explanations to Luce, placed her in the coffin, and had it removed from the room. He hid in the closet. Venturewell, still vengeful, ordered the coffin to be delivered to old Merrythought, who by that time was penniless, although still merry. (George, no respecter of plot, demanded that Ralph appear again.) Ralph, in the guise of Maylord, presented the month of May to the city of London.

Jasper, meanwhile, covered his face with flour and, appearing as a ghost, told old Venturewell that he would never see his daughter again. Thoroughly frightened and repentant of his past actions, the old man thrashed Humphrey, who had come to see Luce, and sent him away. (George and Nell, their interest flagging, demanded diversion in which Ralph would be the center of attention.) Ralph appeared as a highly efficient captain leading a parade of London volunteers.

The coffin containing Luce was delivered to old Merrythought, who continued to be indifferent. When Jasper appeared and revealed Luce's presence, the young people prevailed upon old Merrythought to take back Mrs. Merrythought and Michael. Venturewell, still mindful of Jasper's ghost, told old Merrythought that he forgave all Jasper's transgressions. Jasper and Luce then confronted Venturewell, who offered them his blessings. (George and Nell, unaware of dramatic proprieties, asked for the stage death of Ralph so that the play could end properly.) Ralph, with a forked arrow through his head, delivered an absurd speech about Princess Pompiana and Susan. (Highly pleased with the sad ending, Nell invited the audience to partake of tobacco and wine at her house.)

THE LADY FROM THE SEA

Type of work: Drama

Author: Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: A small town in northern Norway

First presented: 1889

Principal characters:

DOCTOR WANGEL, a physician

ELLIDA, his second wife

BOLETTA, and
HILDA, his daughters by a former marriage
ARNHOLM, a schoolmaster
LYNGSTRAND, a sculptor
A STRANGER

Critique:

The Lady from the Sea was the first of the psychological dramas written by Ibsen, who had formerly devoted himself almost entirely to social criticism. Here the characters are not merely part of a class, for they are strongly and finely drawn in their own right. Also, there are two subplots, another departure from the great dramatist's usual style. Technically, the play does not measure up to the perfection of the social dramas, largely because the treatment of his material was new to Ibsen. The story is intensely moving, however, and worthy of the attention of all readers. The drama was published in 1888, prior to its first presentation.

The Story:

There was no real affection between Ellida Wangel and her two stepdaughters, Boletta and Hilda. She had married their father, Doctor Wangel, several years before, soon after the death of his first wife. He had met Ellida in the seacoast town in which she lived, a town she loved because it was near the sea. In fact, the sea seemed to dominate her whole life, and she felt stifled in her new home, which was surrounded by mountains.

Arnholm, Boletta's former tutor, paid a visit to the Wangel home. He had known and loved Ellida before her marriage to Doctor Wangel, but she had refused his suit because, as she told him, she was betrothed to another. As the two former friends talked, a traveling sculptor, Lyngstrand, stopped to tell them of a group he hoped to model. Lyngstrand had been at sea and there had met a sailor who told him a strange story. The sailor had married a woman who had promised to wait for him, but three years ago he had read that his wife had married another man. The sailor had told Lyngstrand that his wife was still his, that he would have her even though she had broken her vows.

This strange tale moved Ellida, seemed even to frighten her. Her moodiness following the telling of the story made her husband believe she was unhappy because she was away from the sea, and he offered to move his family to the seashore so that Ellida could regain her peace of mind. But Ellida knew that this move would not bring her happiness, while it would make him and the girls unhappy to leave their home. And so she told him the real cause of her misery.

Some years before she had come under the spell of a sailor whose ship was in port for only a few days. He too loved the sea and seemed to be part of it. Indeed, he and Ellida seemed to be animals or birds of the sea, so closely did they identify themselves with the vast waters. Then the sailor murdered his captain, for a reason unknown to Ellida, and he was forced to flee. Before he left, he took his ring and one from her hand, joined them together, and threw them into the sea. He told her that his act joined them in marriage and that she was to wait for him.

At the time she seemed to have no will of her own in the matter, but to be completely under his spell. Later she regained her senses and wrote to tell him that all was over between them, that the joining of the rings was not a lasting bond. But he ignored her letters and continued to write that he would come back to her.

Ellida told her husband that she had forgotten the sailor until three years ago, when she was carrying the doctor's child. Then, suddenly, the sailor seemed very close to her. Her child, who lived only a few months, was born—or so she believed—with the eyes of the stranger. She had felt such guilt that from that time on she had not lived with her husband as his wife. The anguish she had suffered was affecting her mind and she feared that she would go mad. She loved her husband, but she was drawn to the man of the sea whom she had not seen in ten years.

Doctor Wangel, trying to comfort his wife, was also worried about her sanity. One day a Stranger appeared in their garden. He was the sailor, come to claim Ellida. He told her that he had come to hold her to the vow she had taken years before. Ellida said that she could never leave her husband, but the Stranger would not listen. Then the doctor told the Stranger that he would never allow his wife to leave him, that the Stranger could not force her to go against her will. The Stranger said that he would never force her, but she would come to him of her own free will. Those words, of her own free will, seemed to fascinate Ellida. She repeated them over and over and gained strength from them. The Stranger left, saying that he would return for her answer the next night and telling her that if she refused to join him, she would never see him again.

Ellida begged her husband to save her from the Stranger. He tried to persuade her that her mind had been conditioned by the story of the sailor and his unfaithful wife that Lyngstrand had told her. He reminded her also that the sailor did not even look as she had remembered him. But Ellida would not be comforted. She told her husband that there was only one way she could ever make the right decision and save her sanity. The doctor must release her from her marriage vows, not by divorce but only by a verbal release. Then she would be free to choose between her husband and the Stranger. She said that she had never been free. First she had been under the will of the Stranger, then under the will of her husband.

The doctor refused her request because he thought he must save her from the Stranger and from herself. He felt that the Stranger had an evil influence over his wife, and he wanted to save her from disaster. He promised her, however, that after the Stranger left, he would release her from her vow to him and give her the freedom she wished.

The next night the Stranger came again, as he had promised, and Ellida and her husband met him in the garden. When the Stranger asked Ellida to come with him of her own free will, the doctor ordered the Stranger to leave the country or be exposed as a murderer. The Stranger showed them a pistol which he said he would use to take his own life rather than give up his freedom.

Then Ellida told her husband again that he must release her from her marriage vows, for although he could keep her body tied in this place he could not fetter her soul and her desires. Seeing that she was right and that his refusal would drive his wife out of her reason, the doctor told her that he would release her from her bargain with him. She saw that he loved her enough to put her happiness above his own. She turned to the Stranger, who was pleading with her to leave with him on the ship standing offshore, and told him that now she could never go with him. The Stranger, realizing that there was something between these two that was stronger than his will, left them after promising never to return again.

Ellida assured her husband that her mind was whole once more and that she would never again long for the Stranger or the sea. The unknown no longer had a power over her, for at last she had made a decision of her own free will. Because she had been free to choose or reject the fascination of the Stranger, she had found the will to reject him. Now she could go with her husband and live again as his wife. She knew too that she could win his daughters to her and think of them as her own. Ellida would never again feel like the wild, eager birds of the sea. She would bind herself forever to the land, and in her bondage she would find freedom.

THE LADY OF THE LAKE

Type of work: Poem

Author: Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot: Semihistorical romance

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Scottish Highlands

First published: 1810

Principal characters:

JAMES OF DOUGLAS, a banished nobleman

ELLEN DOUGLAS, his daughter

MALCOLM GRAEME, loved by Ellen

RODERICK DHU, a rebel Highland chief

JAMES FITZ-JAMES, a nobleman of royal birth

ALLAN-BANE, a minstrel

Critique:

As the poet of Scottish history and legend Sir Walter Scott stands in a class alone. His poetry is in a sense painting, for his descriptions are so vivid and intense that his readers cannot fail to see the scenes he reveals to them. It is obvious that he loved the locale he described and understood the people who inhabited the wild Highlands. In The Lady of the Lake he delved into Gaelic history, to retell a legend that had been popular for generations. The result was one of his best-known poems, loved by readers of all ages.

The Story:

As he followed a stag during a hunt, James Fitz-James became lost in the Highlands. He wandered around until he came to Loch Katrine, a beautiful lake surrounded by steep mountains. There he met the lovely Ellen, who told him that his coming had been foretold by Allan-Bane, an ancient minstrel who served her father. When she offered the hunter food and shelter for the night, Ellen did not volunteer to tell him her name or anything of her family history, and courtesy forbade his asking questions. Fitz-James was disturbed, however, because she bore such a marked resemblance to members of the Douglas clan, a family banished by the king. When he departed the next morning, he still knew nothing about the young girl whose beauty and grace had deeply touched his heart.

Fitz-James was correct in his fear that Ellen was of the Douglas clan. Her father was James of Douglas, once a powerful friend of the king, but now hunted and with a price on his head. He and Ellen and his sister were protected by Roderick Dhu, a rebel against the king and the leader of a large and powerful Highland clan. Roderick Dhu wanted Ellen's hand in marriage, but although she honored him for the aid he gave her father she detested him for his many cruel and merciless deeds. He killed and plundered at will, trying to avenge himself on the king and the Lowlanders who he felt had robbed him and his people of their land and wealth. Among the men he hated was Malcolm Graeme, a young nobleman, Ellen's former suitor, whom she loved. After Ellen's refusal of his proposal, Roderick Dhu called his clan together to fight Malcolm and the other supporters of the king. His excuse was that he feared Malcolm would lead the king to the hiding place of Douglas.

Like lightning, burning beacons and swift-riding messengers carried through the Highlands word that the clan was gathering. Young men left their brides at the church door and mere boys replaced fathers who had died since the last gathering. The women and children were placed on a lonely and protected island for safety, for a fierce and dangerous battle was to be fought. A hermit monk prophesied that the party who spilled the first foe's blood would be the victor. The prophecy suited Roderick Dhu, whose men had seen a spy lurking in the mountains and even now had lured the stranger into paths which would lead him into a trap. He would be killed by Roderick Dhu's men and thus the Highlanders would be assured of victory.

James of Douglas left Ellen. Although he did not tell her his destination, she knew that he had gone to give himself up to the king in order to prevent the bloodshed of a great battle. Allan-Bane tried to cheer Ellen by telling her that his harp sang of glad tidings, but she would not hear him. As she sat grieving, Fitz-James appeared again. Ellen knew that he had been tricked by Roderick Dhu's men, for no one could gain entrance to a place so hidden and secret without their knowledge. But Fitz-James, refusing to heed her warning, asked her to return to the court with him. She refused, telling him of her love for Malcolm Graeme. Then Fitz-James gave her his ring which had been given to him by the king. He said the king owed him a favor and would grant any request made by the bearer of the ring. It would also promise a safe journey through the Lowlands to anyone wearing it. Fitz-James placed the ring on Ellen's finger and then departed quickly.

His guide led him through the mountain paths until they came upon a crazed woman who sang a warning song to Fitz-James. The guide thrust his sword into her. Fitz-James then killed the guide and returned to the side of the crazed woman who, before she died, told him that Roderick Dhu had killed her lover and caused her to lose her sanity. Fitz-James vowed that he would meet Roderick Dhu and avenge the woman. Having been warned by her as well as by Ellen, he was traveling cautiously when he stumbled on a guard stationed by a watch fire. The sentry called him a spy, wanted by Roderick Dhu, but offered him rest and safety, for the laws of the clansmen demanded courtesy even to one's enemy. The guard, after promising to lead Fitz-

James safely through Roderick Dhu's lines, kept his word, even though Fitz-James called Roderick Dhu a coward and a murderer. When they reached a place of safety, the sentry revealed himself as Roderick Dhu. His promise fulfilled, he then challenged Fitz-James to a duel. In personal combat Roderick Dhu proved the stronger, but Fitz-James, who was more skilled, overcame the rebel. Then Fitz-James blew his horn and called his men to carry Roderick Dhu to a prison cell.

In the meantime James of Douglas went to the court to give himself up. First, however, he took part in some games being staged that day and won every event he entered. The whisper went through the crowds that only a Douglas could possess such skill and strength. Then Douglas offered himself to the king as a ransom for his friends and clansmen. When the king ordered him thrown into prison, the people sided with Douglas and would have risen against the king. Douglas quieted them, for he would not act against his monarch, and allowed himself to be taken. The king sent messengers to the Highlanders with word that there was no need to fight; Douglas had surrendered and Roderick Dhu was a prisoner.

Ellen and Allan-Bane went to the court to seek the release of her father. The ring given her by Fitz-James afforded her safety along the way. Before news came that a truce had been arranged, Allan-Bane went to Roderick Dhu's cell and sang to him of a fierce battle that had been fought. Roderick Dhu died with a smile, for he believed that his clansmen had fought bravely.

Ellen prepared for her audience with the king. Fitz-James went to her quarters to conduct her to the court, but when they arrived she noted that everyone bowed before Fitz-James. It was not until then that she knew Fitz-James was in reality the king. He told her to claim the favor promised by the ring, but there was nothing she could ask. The king had already restored her father to favor and Roderick Dhu was dead, so that she could not plead mercy for him. She tried to stammer something about Malcolm Graeme, but the king read her heart and called Malcolm to her side. He forgave Malcolm for trying to aid the rebels and redeemed the ring Ellen wore by joining her with her beloved.

Locale: The small market town of Cool Clary

HEBBLE TYSON, mayor of Cool Clary

MARGARET DEVIZE, his sister

NICHOLAS, and

HUMPHREY, her sons

ALIZON ELIOT, betrothed to Humphrey

JENNET JOURDEMAYNE, a witch

Critique:

A poetic drama set in the late Middle Ages, The Lady's Not for Burning is a strange mixture of comedy and poetry. The excellent humor is in the lines of the play, however, as much as in the development of situation and plot. The discharged soldier, egoist and misanthrope, is a character whom Shaw might have created, but the situation into which he projects himself is one of un-Shavian whimsy and symbolism. The play has been successful here and abroad. Christopher Fry has restored poetry and humor to the modern stage.

The Story:

Thomas Mendip wanted to be hanged, but he could get no one to take an interest in his case because everyone in Cool Clary was interested in a witch who was accused of having turned old Skippis, the rag and bone man, into a dog. Thomas begged the mayor's clerk, Richard, to get him an audience with the mayor so that he could confess his crime. But Richard had other things on his mind. The mayor's nephew, Humphrey Devize, had been betrothed to Alizon Eliot, and the girl was due to arrive any minute. No one had time for a fool who wanted to be hanged.

Alizon was one of six daughters whose father feared he had too many girls to marry off. He had placed Alizon in a convent, but after he had got rid of his other daughters easily enough he changed his mind about her and promised her to Humphrey. Humphrey's brother Nicholas had read in the stars that Alizon belonged to him, however, and so he knocked his brother down, hoping to kill him and take Alizon for himself. Humphrey, although he was not dead, lay still. He had not knocked himself down and so he would not pick himself up. Their mother, Margaret Devize, sister of the mayor, sometimes thought motherhood was too much for any woman. Since the boys had become untidy from lying in the rain and mud, she feared Humphrey's unclean linens might discourage Alizon.

When Mayor Hebble Tyson found Thomas waiting to be hanged, he was very much upset. Hebble was a little tired of strangers dropping into town with such ridiculous requests. It was all very irregular. Suspecting that someone was making a mockery of his authority, he threatened to have Thomas tortured if he did not go away and stop his bother. But Thomas held out for hanging or nothing. He confessed to killing old Skipps and a worthless pander. He did not expect to get the favor of hanging for nothing; he knew the rules, all right.

Thomas' interview with Hebble was interrupted by the announcement from Nicholas that a witch was waiting to see the mayor. Poor Hebble, upset at that news, insisted that he would not have his honor toyed with.

The witch was young and beautiful. Her name was Jennet Jourdemayne, a wealthy young orphan whose property would be confiscated if she were condemned for witchcraft. Jennet thought the accusations a joke, for she had been accused of turning old Skipps into a dog and of doing other evil deeds besides. She had come to Hebble for the protection of his laughter at the crimes of which the mob outside accused her. Hebble, not amused, sent for the constable to arrest her. Thomas tried to divert attention from her to himself by insisting that he had murdered Skipps and the pander, but no one paid the least attention to him. He even told all assembled that the end of the world would come that night. All he got for his pains was to be thrown into the cellar with Jennet, to await her burning on the morrow.

Hebble and his associates had a problem on their hands. Jennet would admit nothing and Thomas would not stop confessing. Thomas was a poor ex-soldier and Jennet had property; she had to be the guilty one. At last Hebble had an idea. They would leave the two together while he and the others listened at an open door. The two were brought forth from the cellar, Thomas still wearing thumb screws to make him stop confessing. Jennet told Thomas of her father, a scientist who had given his life to his dreams. She would have no such nonsense. Facts and facts alone would rule her life—until tomorrow, when she would be burned. Fancy and imagination, she said, had caused her present trouble. Overhearing this conversation, Hebble was convinced that Jennet was a witch. At any rate she was wealthy, and her property would go to the city when she was burned.

From the conversation Hebble also learned that Thomas wanted to be hanged because he found life mean and dull. Therefore his punishment was to spend the night in joy and revelry at the party which would announce the betrothal of Humphrey and Alizon. Thomas would not agree to attend until Jennet was allowed to go to the party with him. Dressed in one of Margaret's old gowns, she was sent to the party, where Humphrey, the bridegroom-to-be, no longer wanted Alizon. Since Humphrey would not claim her, neither would Nicholas. Unknown to them, Alizon had found that she loved Richard and that Richard returned her love. They slipped away and were married by the priest who had found Richard in the poor box when he was just a tiny baby.

Unhappily for Thomas, he had fallen in love with Jennet and she with him. He had no wish to be in love; life was miserable enough. Jennet, on the other hand, did not want to renounce her factual world for one of love and fancy. But Jennet knew now that Thomas had not committed murder, that he had heard the mobs accusing her of turning Skipps into a dog and said he murdered the ragman only to divert suspicion from her. Then Humphrey went to Jennet and offered to get her free from the charge of witchery if she would entertain him in her cell that night. Although her body loved the thought of living, her mind and heart rebelled, and she turned down his offer. She loved Thomas too much to take life at such a price.

Fortunately for all, old Skippis was found alive. Hebble, still coveting Jennet's property, would not be satisfied, but a soft-hearted justice allowed Thomas and Jennet to slip out of town in the dark. Thomas hated to face living again, but he decided to forego the pleasure of dying for another fifty years and spend his time of waiting with Jennet.

L'AIGLON

Type of work: Drama

Author: Edmond Rostand (1868-1918)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: 1830-1832

Locale: Austria

First presented: 1900

Principal characters:

FRANZ, Duke of Reichstadt and Napoleon's son, called L'Aiglon

EMPEROR FRANZ, his grandfather

MARIE-LOUISE, Duchess of Parma, his mother

COUNTRESS CAMERATA, his cousin

THE ARCHDUCHESS, his aunt

PRINCE METTERNICH, an Austrian statesman

SERAPHIN FLAMBEAU, one of Napoleon's soldiers

COUNT SEDLINSKY, director of police

THÈRESE OF LORGET, a French exile whom Franz loved

FANNY ELSSLER, a dancer

Critique:

Edmond Rostand's sympathetic treatment of sensitive people is as evident in his portrait of Napoleon's idealistic but hesitant son as it is in that of his ugly but unselfish Cyrano de Bergerac. L'Aiglon is a verse drama in six acts, much of which must be cut, because of time limitations, when the play is presented on the modern stage. Either way, in print or on the stage, L'Aiglon is an impressive play. Perhaps the reason Cyrano de Bergerac is better known is that the historical feeling is not there so binding, whereas in L'Aiglon the character presented will always be known in history as the weak son of a dominant father.

The Story:

Marie-Louise, daughter of the Emperor Franz of Austria, had rented a villa at Baden, near Vienna, for herself, her retinue, and her son Franz. Franz had been given the title of Duke of Reichstadt by the Austrians as a sop to his feelings when they all but imprisoned him in that country to keep him from arousing the French to follow Napoleon's son as they had followed Napoleon himself.

Marie-Louise pretended a greater sorrow for her husband's death than she truly felt; actually she would have been happy enough living again at the Austrian court if it had not been for Franz, whose sorrow was so deep that he took no interest in anything his mother suggested.

Count Metternich was Franz's official jailer, though such a term was never used. It was he who arranged the police guard, under Count Sedlinsky, to spy on every move L'Aiglon made. Metternich allowed Franz to ride his horses where he would, but always there was an unseen guard along. Metternich also provided tutors for the lad, but they were warned never to speak Napoleon's name. Even the boy's history lessons were given without mention of Napoleon's exploits.

L'Aiglon was then a frail, blond lad of eighteen. He was not strong, his cough leaving him strength only to ride the horses he loved and to find a way to learn his father's history. But there were many people in Austria who were willing to back his bid to return as François, Emperor of France. The Austrian soldiers in his regiment admired his spirit and were known to cry out, "Long live Napoleon!" against the orders of those who wanted them to call out only, "Long live the duke!" The French exiles, hoping against hope, noted in reports from Paris that all the theaters were running plays about Napoleon, and that there was a cry going up to take his ashes back to Paris. The tailor and the fitter L'Aiglon's mother brought from Paris turned out to be Bonapartists, the fitter being his cousin, the Countess Camerata. But the real history of his father he learned from a little dancer, Fanny Elssler, who memorized the stories of Napoleon's campaigns and recited them to him.

A year later, after he had found a cache of books on Napoleon in Franz's room at Schoenbrunn, Metternich allowed Franz to read all the books he pleased, but he set the guards even stronger around the young duke. For a while he deprived Franz of Prokesch, a Bonapartist friend, but Franz's aunt, the arch-duchess, persuaded Metternich to let Prokesch come back. In return she exacted a promise from Franz that he would ask the emperor, his grandfather, to let him go back to France before he made any other plans with his friends.

Franz and Prokesch began plotting, however, using wooden soldiers on a table top to map battle strategy. The soldiers, which had been in Austrian colors heretofore, were now painted in French uniforms, exact to the last button. Metternich surprised the boys while they planned their battles and had the soldiers thrown away. At the same time Franz realized that the lackey who had guarded him most was also a friend, a man who had been a foot soldier in Napoleon's army for seventeen years. He had repainted the wooden soldiers and he raised the most hope in Franz's heart. Though Franz himself knew he was like a child with his nose pressed against a glass wishing for things in a store window, Flambeau, the lackey, gave him enough confidence to vow that he would return to France.

In the meantime Emperor Franz, having come to Schoenbrunn, held an audience for his subjects. In a grandfatherly way he granted many requests including one from his disguised grandson, who asked to go to his father's land. When Franz threw off his Tirolean disguise, the emperor closed the audience chamber. Just as Franz had persuaded his grandfather to let him go back to France as emperor, Metternich appeared. He seemed to agree that Franz might rule in France, but he set up so many obstacles that Franz realized he had been tricked.

That night Franz left one of his father's old tricorn hats on his table as a signal to Flambeau that he would enter the plot to return to Paris. Overjoyed at seeing the hat, Flambeau took off his lackey's suit to show his old French uniform beneath. Metternich, having come into the room with his private key, was almost persuaded by Flambeau that Napoleon himself was sleeping in the next room. The shock of seeing the slender, trembling Franz instead of his heavy-set father appear was nearly as bad for Metternich as it was for Flambeau. Flambeau escaped through a window.

Then Metternich tore Franz's pride to ribbons as he stood the boy in front of the mirror and pointed out how weak he looked, how feeble his brow and hands were, how like the Hapsburgs—but not at all like Napoleon.

Metternich gave a fancy dress ball in the Roman ruins in the park at Schoen-brunn. Among the costumed crowds it was easy for Franz's confederates, Flambeau and Fanny Elssler, to have him change cloaks with his cousin, the Countess Camerata, who was dressed in a uniform exactly like L'Aiglon's. While the ever-vigilant guards followed her, Franz went with Flambeau to Wagram Field, where horses were to be waiting for their escape.

But they were early and the horses were not ready. Then, as Franz was getting into his saddle to ride for the border, he heard of a plot against him. Realizing that the killers would find the countess in his place, he started to turn back. The countess herself, having escaped, came up begging him to flee. Too late he realized that the police had caught up with him. His fellow conspirators crept away, except for Flambeau, who killed himself rather than face a firing squad. As he was dying, Flambeau thought he was back in the thick of the battle fought on Wagram Field many years before. Franz, carrying on the pretense, told him where each regiment stood, which advanced, which won, how Napoleon raised his hand in sign of victory. As Flambeau breathed his last, voices of Napoleon's long-dead troops sounded across the field. Franz realized he would have to make a great sacrifice to match those the French soldiers had made there long ago.

A short time later, as Franz lay on his deathbed, his family tried to keep from him the seriousness of his condition. He realized something was wrong when the archduchess got up from her own sickbed to see him. When Franz and his aunt went into a smaller room for mass, the Austrian royal family gathered quietly in his bedroom; it was the Austrian custom for the whole family to be present at a royal death. Prokesch came with the countess, bringing Thèrese, the little French exile Franz loved. An old general, who had been the duke's aide, watched at the door to see when Franz would partake of the Holy Bread. Then he opened the door quietly so the family could see the lad for the last time. A sob, escaping from Thèrese, reached the duke's ears and he realized that his time had come.

After sending away the Austrian family, but keeping the Frenchmen with him, François, Prince of France, had the old general read to him the account of the christening in Paris of Napoleon's son. With the Te Deum following that account, François died.

THE LAST ATHENIAN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Viktor Rydberg (1829-1895)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Fourth century

Locale: Athens

First published: 1859

Principal characters:

CHRYSANTEUS, archon of Athens, a pagan and a philosopher

HERMIONE, Chrysanteus' daughter

PETER, Bishop of Athens, enemy of Chrysanteus

ANNAEUS DOMITIUS, Roman proconsul at Athens

CHARMIDES, a young Epicurean, lover of Hermione

CLEMENS, a young priest, foster son of Bishop Peter

Critique:

Rydberg has been translated into English more than any other Swedish novelist of the nineteenth century. In addition to this historical novel dealing with the early history of Christianity, he wrote several non-fictional volumes about the Church Fathers and the history of Christianity. The obvious doctrine of this novel is a strong plea for freedom of religious conscience and worship. While it is a glorification of the Greek ideals of reason, wisdom, truth, and harmony, it is not an anti-Christian novel directed against the principles and ideals of Christianity. It is really a thesis against bigotry, cruelty, and intolerance, as personified in the early leaders of the Church in Athens.

The Story:

Athens in the fourth century, during the reign of the Roman Emperor Constantius, was divided by three factions. Dominant among the three was one Christian faction headed by Bishop Peter of Athens. Opposing them, though less in number, was the faction which adhered to the heresy of Athanasius. The third faction was the group which still clung to the gods of ancient Greece and the reasonable philosophy of Plato. The last group was headed by Chrysanteus, archon of Athens and its richest citizen. Representing Rome in the city was Annaeus Domitius, the proconsul, who by traveling a middle path hoped to keep some semblance of order in and about the city. His efforts were hindered by the fact that Julian the Apostate was about to succeed Constantius as the emperor of Rome; Constantius, a Christian, had favored the non-Athanasian Christians, but Julian, who was a pagan, favored the people who clung to the old gods.

Under the favor of Constantius, Bishop Peter and his followers practically ruled Athens and dictated orders to the proconsul. When the Athanasians were accused of killing Bishop Peter's father, a hermit who lived at the top of a pillar, Domitius turned over the troops of Rome to the bishop and discreetly left Athens to evade responsibility for what might happen. He did not want to take sides in the quarrel, and he feared that the hatred of the Christians might be turned against the pagans, including Chrysteus. Domitius knew that if Constantius succeeded in retaining the empire, Chrysanteus' death would be of little moment; but if Julian were to succeed in becoming emperor, his old tutor, for Chrysanteus had been that, would be a very important person, one whom the proconsul did not want as a corpse about his neck.

As Domitius feared, riot and slaughter broke out in Athens, for Bishop Peter turned the troops and his followers against the heretic Christians and against the pagans. Word came to Domitius at his country villa, however, that Julian was emperor, Constantius having died. Domitius immediately went back to Athens with the news, arriving in time to prevent a Christian mob from entering Chrysanteus' dwelling to pillage and murder. Within a few hours the Roman troops, returned to the proconsul's command, restored quiet in Athens and published Julian's order that freedom of worship and belief were to be accorded all men. Bishop Peter and his Christian faction were reduced, to all appearances, to a position no better than that of any other group. They were ordered to restore to the pagans all the temples they had taken over and to replace treasures they had plundered and destroyed.

Actually, the bishop was more dangerous than ever. He had many spies within and without the city; he had, in addition, a large body of devoted and obedient fanatics at his call. Furthermore, he had as his foster son a young man who was actually Chrysanteus' long-lost son, Clemens. Reared as a Christian, the boy had become a priest. Through Clemens, Bishop Peter plotted to destroy Chrysanteus. The bishop also plotted to convert Hermione, Chrysanteus' daughter, to Christianity, not through any pious motives but simply to undermine the position of Chrysanteus and to secure his immediate wealth.

Fate seemed to go against Bishop Peter when Chrysanteus discovered, quite by chance, that Clemens was his son and that Bishop Peter was an escaped slave who had once belonged to the household of Chrysanteus. The bishop was thrown into prison by the archon and Clemens was restored to his father's home. But Clemens was so fanatic a Christian that he soon left his father's house and became a hermit, dwelling in a cave on the outskirts of the city.

In the meantime Charmides, an Epicurean betrothed to Hermione, fell into the bad graces of both Hermione and her father because of his profligate habits. He also fell prey to a Jewish broker, to whom he owed large sums of money, for the Jew became his enemy when he learned that his daughter was in love with Charmides. At the moment of his greatest despair, he was befriended by Bishop Peter, whose followers had succeeded in securing his release from prison. Bishop Peter saw in Charmides another tool in his battle against paganism and Chrysanteus. Upon Charmides' promise to turn Christian, the bishop interceded with the Jew, showing the Jew that a reformed Charmides would still have an opportunity to marry Chrysanteus' daughter. The Jew, seeing a chance to recoup all the money he had lent to the penniless Charmides, agreed to the bishop's plan.

The plan worked smoothly. Charmides, reformed, was received again by Chrysanteus and Hermione, and a date was set for the wedding. Nothing was said of the fact that Charmides had been baptized as a Christian. But on his wedding night Charmides was killed, murdered by a young Jew who had discovered that Charmides had seduced the usurer's daughter, to whom the assassin had been betrothed. After the death of Charmides, much to Chrysanteus' discomfiture, the Christians claimed the body of Charmides for burial and proved by documents that the dead man had been one of their number.

Further disaster overtook pagan Chrysanteus when his son went mad after being attacked by another hermit. As if that were not enough, Julian the Apos-tate was killed in a battle with the Persians. The new emperor, Jovian, was not only a Christian, but also an adherent to that branch of the Church represented by Bishop Peter. The bishop, supported by Roman troops and the proconsul, was again the real ruler of Athens.

Immediately upon hearing of Julian's death, Chrysanteus and Hermione fled to the mountains, where they were befriended by another small sect of Christians, a group that had been declared heretics by the bishop and consequently had no love for him. Learning that Chrysanteus and Hermione had taken asylum with the outcasts, Bishop Peter, still avaricious for Chrysanteus' great wealth, prevailed upon the proconsul to lead a crusade into the mountains against the heretics. Domitius was willing to do so, hoping thereby to win acclaim and honors from the new emperor. There was a short but bloody campaign. In it, Chrysanteus was killed and Hermione taken prisoner. Hermione was forced to submit to baptism. Rather than remain alive as a Christian under those circumstances, she killed herself immediately. Her death left the wealth of Chrysanteus in the hands of Bishop Peter. A short time later his reasons for desiring the wealth became known; with it he intended to buy the bishopric of Rome, which even then was regarded as the seat of the Church. His superior at Constantinople suspected that Bishop Peter must intend to turn heretic, for the bishopric of Rome had turned to the beliefs of the Athanasians.

These suspicions being confirmed by agents sent to Athens, orders were sent to Bishop Peter's fellow priests to kill him. He was given a draught of poison which did not cause immediate death; he lived, ironically enough, to receive emissaries from Rome who offered him the coveted bishopric just before he died.

THE LAST CHRONICLE OF BARSET

Type of work: Novel

Author: Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: "Barsetshire," England

First published: 1867

Principal characters:

MR. CRAWLEY, Curate of Hogglegstock

MRS. CRAWLEY, his wife

GRACE CRAWLEY, their daughter

MR. PROUDIE, Bishop of Barchester

MRS. PROUDIE, his wife

HENRY GRANTLY, Grace's suitor

LILY DALE, Grace's friend

JOHN EAMES, Lily's suitor

Critique:

To readers who are familiar with Trollope's novels the shire of Barset undoubtedly exists and should be shown on the maps. Barchester and its towers, Plumstead Episcopi, and Hogglegstock seem as real as if they had actually stood for a thousand years. Mrs. Proudie, the Thornes of Ullathorne, Archdeacon Grantly and his wife, and the weak Quiverfuls are among Trollope's characters who make up an ever-living community. The genius of Anthony Trollope lies in his understanding of human wisdom and human ignorance.

The Story:

In the community of Hogglegstock the citizens were upset because Mr. Crawley, the curate, had been accused of stealing a check for twenty pounds. In Archdeacon Grantly's home, where there was concern lest Henry Grantly might marry Grace Crawley, the curate's schoolteacher daughter, feeling was high.

Bishop Proudie and his wife were set against the unfortunate Crawley. Mrs. Proudie, who exerted great power over her husband, persuaded the bishop to write a letter forbidding Mr. Crawley to preach in his church until the case should have been settled one way or another. Mr. Crawley refused the injunction. Mr. and Mrs. Proudie quarreled over the answer, and Mr. Proudie sent for Mr. Crawley to attend him in the bishop's palace at once. When Mr. Crawley arrived, he was hot and tired from walking. He repeated what he had stated in his letter and left the bishop and his wife amazed at his boldness.

Mr. Crawley was not kept from performing his duties on Christmas morning. Since he could not recall how he had come into possession of the money in question, he informed his wife that he had but two choices—either to go to jail or to bedlam.

At last Henry Grantly decided to ask Grace Crawley to marry him, even though he should be going against his parents' wishes. At the same time Lily Dale, Grace Crawley's friend, was being wooed by young John Eames, a clerk in the Income Tax Office in London and a suitor, once rejected, whom Lily's mother favored. Eames was the friend of a London artist named Conway Dalrymple, who was painting a portrait of Miss Clara Van Siever, a mutual friend, in the sitting-room of Mrs. Dobbs Broughton. Meanwhile the aged Mrs. Van Siever was engaged in forcing Dobbs Broughton to pay money he owed to her.

Not long afterward John Eames met Henry Grantly. Neither liked the other at first. John, meeting Lily in Lady Julia de Guest's home, where Grace was also a guest, discussed his unfavorable meeting with Henry Grantly in front of Grace. When Henry proposed to Grace, she refused him and returned home to be with her father during his trial. Lily told John that she planned to die an old maid, her heart having been broken by Adolphus Crosbie, a former suitor.

Mr. Toogood, a distant relative, was to defend Mr. Crawley. John Eames was brought into the Crawley case by Mr. Toogood, who wanted John to go to Florence and attempt to persuade Mr. Arabin, an influential clergyman, to come to Mr. Crawley's rescue. There was another reason why Arabin should return to England. Mrs. Arabin's father, Mr. Harding, was ailing and growing weaker each day.

Conway Dalrymple worked on Miss Van Siever's picture, which was still a secret from Dobbs Broughton, in whose house it was being painted. Although Broughton had ordered the artist out of his house, Mrs. Broughton wanted the picture painted, regardless of her jealous husband's reactions.

The clerical commission summoned by Bishop Proudie reached no decision concerning Mr. Crawley. It was resolved that nothing should be done until the civil courts had decided his case.

Archdeacon Grantly tried to engage the help of Lady Lufton to prevent the marriage of his son to Grace Crawley, but Lady Lufton refused. The archdeacon finally promised that he would no longer oppose the marriage if Mr. Crawley should be found innocent of any crime.

Dobbs Broughton was being pressed hard for money by old Mrs. Van Siever. Clara Van Siever was to marry Musselboro, Broughton's former partner. Dalrymple, still hoping to marry Clara, was putting the last touches to the canvas when Mrs. Van Siever entered the Broughton house. At her word he destroyed the portrait. Over Clara's objections, Mrs. Van Siever announced that her daughter was to marry Musselboro.

After the Van Sievers left, Musselboro arrived with news that Dobbs Broughton had killed himself that morning. Clara and Dalrymple resolved to face Mrs. Van Siever's wrath together.

Mrs. Proudie continued her fight to have Mr. Crawley removed. After a quarrel between the bishop and Mrs. Proudie, she retired to her room and there died of a heart attack. True to the resolution imposed upon him by Mrs. Proudie before her death, Mr. Crawley preached a final sermon in his church and never again entered it as the curate.

On the continent John Eames learned from Mrs. Arabin the cause of Mr. Crawley's troubles. Mrs. Arabin, who had received the check from a tenant, had turned it over to Mr. Crawley without telling her husband, the dean, of the transaction. She had only recently heard of the charges and she was hurrying home to England to do what could be done to straighten out the matter. In the meantime Mr. Toogood traced the theft of the check to the tenant who had forwarded it to Mrs. Arabin.

Mr. Toogood and Henry Grantly took the good news to Mr. and Mrs. Crawley. When she heard their story, Mrs. Crawley, who had defended her husband from the beginning, broke into tears. The messengers had to explain the situation carefully to Mr. Crawley, who could not at first believe that his innocence was about to be proved. Then Mr. Harding, the aged incumbent in St. Ewold's, died. Archdeacon Grantly offered the living to Mr. Crawley as a recompense for all he had suffered. In midsummer Grace Crawley became Mrs. Henry Grantly.

John Eames did not marry Lily Dale after all, for Lily was unable to make her decision, but Dalrymple married Clara Van Siever as he had planned. Musselboro, who had lost Clara, proceeded to marry the widow of his old partner and thus Mrs. Broughton's sorrows were brought to an end.

ANGÈLE MAURY, an actress
HANNAH KERNAHANS, her aunt
TOM KERNAHANS, and
MARTIN KERNAHANS, Hannah's sons
NORRIE O'BYRNE, in love with Tom

Critique:

Against a background of imminent war, Angèle Maury struggled against the iron will of the aunt who had never admitted her existence and who was determined to keep this stranger out of her family and her life. The story is a dramatic one, tense and stark, but told with great restraint and simplicity. The personal struggle between Angèle and Hannah seems only to reflect the greater struggle between those peoples who wanted to be free and the political despots who would not let go their hold.

The Story:

Angèle Maury was an actress, half French, half Irish, who had taken her mother's name as her stage name in preference to Kernahans, her Irish father's name. Both her parents were dead. On an impulse she stopped to visit her father's people when her company toured Ireland. She found her aunt, Hannah Kernahans, strangely hostile to her and learned that Aunt Hannah had never told her three children of their uncle's marriage or of his daughter.

It was obvious that Aunt Hannah was fiercely jealous of any intruders from the outside world. She loved all her children, but Tom, the oldest son, was tied to her by a silver cord so strong it seemed unlikely the bond would ever be broken. Tom had long been loved by Norrie O'Byrne, but he was not sensitive to her love. Martin, the second son, had grown up quite independent. A student, he had traveled all over Europe on scholarships and had lived wildly at times. His mother either could not or did not care to tie him to her so closely.

What none of the children knew, and Angèle did not learn, was that her father and their father had both loved Aunt Hannah. She had accepted Angèle's father, but before the wedding he had discovered her steel will and had asked to be released from the engagement. She then married his brother, giving the impression that it was she who had changed her mind. But she never forgave Angèle's father for embarrassing her, and she would never forgive Angèle for being her father's child. She sensed in Angèle an enemy to the isolated life she lived with Tom.

Soon after her arrival Martin told Angèle that he wanted her and offered her anything but marriage; he was not yet ready for those ties. Angèle, not taking him seriously, thought that she was only someone new whom he would soon forget. The fact that they were first cousins also stood in the way of a serious proposal. But Martin brooded over her treatment of him and worried also about the impending war. Hitler, having taken Czechoslovakia, stood on the threshold of Poland. Ireland was neutral, but Martin knew that he could not stand idly by while the world blew up under his feet. Only Martin and Angèle took the war seriously. Knowing that her mother's people would be deeply affected by the war, she was annoyed to see Aunt Hannah brush aside the whole affair with a shrug. Tom refused to see that no one could remain completely neutral when war finally came.

One day Tom told Angèle that he loved her. Unused to strong emotion, he had not recognized his feelings until they were too intense to ignore. Angèle, returning his love, realized that Aunt Hannah would not like their engagement, lest Tom get away from her. Aunt Hannah was clever enough to make Tom believe she was delighted, but she subtly put obstacles in their way. Since they were first cousins, they would have to get special dispensations from Rome. Angèle wanted to return to France on their honeymoon, in spite of the dangers of war. Aunt Hannah used her weapons cleverly, fooling Tom but not deceiving Angèle at all. She sensed that it would take more will power than Tom had ever shown for him to overcome these obstacles and see his mother's hold on him. Angèle's hope was that Tom would shake off his chains and be free and independent.

Martin brought matters to a head. It angered him to hear Angèle talk of returning to France before war broke out, for he realized that Germany would soon march into Poland. If Angèle wanted to see France, to act like a Frenchwoman, she should return to her people and help them in their time of crisis. Aunt Hannah encouraged the idea, all the time acting considerate and loving. She knew that if she could once get Angèle away from Tom, he would come back to the fold easily enough. Martin, of course, hoped for the separation so that he could have time to make Angèle love him. He knew that she could never win against his mother, and he sincerely felt that she and Tom were not suited to each other.

When Church officials failed to hurry dispensation proceedings, Angèle fretted at the time lost. She even considered going by herself to France. Aunt Hannah tried to goad her into leaving alone, but she did not wish to hurt Tom just to please his mother. Tom kept promising Angèle that he would find a way to hurry matters, but she took little hope; fast action was not in his nature.

Martin, too Irish to sign up with the British, prepared to leave to join the French army. Angèle even wished that she were a man so that she would have to go back to France. Then the issue would be clear, not muddled in emotional reactions. Before he left, Martin told Angèle again that he loved her. He told her too that she did not really love his brother, that she was too strong a person to love anyone as weak as Tom. He warned her that Hannah would win, that she would never let Tom go. Martin begged her to return to France with him the next day. Although she rejected the plan, Angèle thanked Martin for his honesty and allowed him to kiss her goodbye.

In the meantime Hannah made her final play for Tom. Pretending to feel sorry for Angèle because she was so torn between Tom and France, she told him that Angèle and Martin were the same kind, that Martin was desperately in love with his cousin. She said also that Angèle had fallen in love with Tom because he was attractive and because she thought that he and Martin were much alike. Although it hurt her to tell him, Hannah declared, she knew that Angèle would never be happy with Tom in Ireland, and it was only the girl's sense of obligation that made her stick to her promise. Hannah, knowing that she could handle that problem when she got to it, played too on the suitability of Norrie O'Byrne.

Shortly after his talk with his mother Tom saw Martin and Angèle kissing goodbye. He thought then that his mother had been right, as usual. He went to Angèle, released her from her betrothal to him, and apologized for being a selfish fool in taking her love. Angèle knew then that she was beaten. She told Tom that she really loved him but that she realized their marriage would never work out. It was futile to try to make him see his mother as she really was.

Angèle also told Aunt Hannah why she was leaving—that she did love Tom but knew she could never fight the bond or restore Tom's confidence in himself. She went away with Martin, to return for good to France, and left Tom lost forever, the silver cord unbroken.

Critique:

The Last of the Vikings tells the story of a Lofoten fisherman, Kriståver Myran, as simply as Knut Hamsun tells the story of Isak, the farmer and builder in Growth of the Soil. Both types are obsolete in the modern world since the fisherman now goes to sea in a motor-driven ship and the farmer has little new land to break to his plow, but both characters are powerfully drawn. It is hard to forget the rigors of the Lofoten fishing season after reading about Kriståver and his crew. The novel is as simple in design and style as it is compelling in its picture of people, local in time and place, but universal in their qualities of courage and endurance.

The Story:

When Kriståver Myran brought home his own Lofoten boat, his oldest son Lars was tall and strong enough to join the next fishing trip to the islands off the coast of Norway. Lofoten men thought of their boats as descendants of dragon-prowed Viking ships, and Lars dreamed that he was an early Norseman who would do battle when the time came to sail north.

Kriståver had bought the Seal cheaply at auction, though even that low price was more than he could pay without guarantors. People said he must want to die early, to have bought that boat which had capsized during the last three winters. Kriståver was sure he could tame her.

His crew consisted of Lars; Elezeus Hylla, a brother-in-law; Henry Rabben, who was always combing his beard; Kaneles Gomon, boyish except for his yellow mustache; and Arnt Awson, a shoreman who had never before sailed on a Lofoten boat. The boats to travel with them were Peter Suzansa's Sea-fire, Andreas Ekra's Storm-bird, and Jacob Damnit-all-with-a-limp's Sea-bird. Kristàver has some trouble keeping the Seal up with the other boats as they sailed through the fjord to the open sea. As he and the rest lay in the long bunk on deck after their first day's sailing, he slept, but even in sleep he was working on his problem. Half-awake, he got up and moved some of the cargo back a few yards. The next day the boat, in better humor, pleased Kristàver's crew as she plowed steadily past the other boats. For days they sailed through the snow and anchored at night. The men began to look alike, snow-covered, and to learn to stand wind and cold.

As they passed Helgeland, the Nordland boats came out to join them. Soon the waters were covered with sailing ships and a few steamers. Held over by the weather at Bødø, Jacob was nearly killed in a fight. Henry Rabben carried him on board and the next day Jacob was sailing along with the rest. Whenever the Southlanders met the Nordlanders, there was likely to be a fight in which everybody joined.

One day, across the West Fjord, they sighted Lofoten, a long chain of snow-streaked mountains. At the foot of the mountain wall lay the fishing station from which rose the odor of fish-oil, pitch, and fish. Peter's crew and Kristàver's were to share a hut there for the winter.

When the Inspector raised the signal-flag for the first sea-going day, everybody was ready to head for the banks. It was a great day when they first put out the nets. Each man knew that only plenty of cod in those nets could make it worth while to bear the wind, snow, and sea for months in that frozen place. The first day's catch was poor, and the men were discouraged when bad weather kept them imprisoned at the station. They slept all day. When it was time for supper, each man went to his own chest to take out the flat bread, cheese, and butter his own wife or mother had put in for him; the fishermen felt that they were paying a short visit home. After the storm they found their nets torn and tangled; a bad beginning.

When the cod came, there was no time for rest. The men pulled on their nets and filled their boats until they lay far down in the water. There was hardly time to rest after cleaning the fish before Kristàver had the men out for the next day's fishing. Even with their big woolen gloves, their hands were rubbed raw, and ice clung to their clothes. But, with fourteen hundred cod in a day, each man figured he would be wealthy by spring. They worked until Saturday night, when they dropped into a heavy sleep that lasted until dark on Sunday. Then, rousing themselves, they called for "Melja," a dish fit for a wedding. They broke flat bread, put boiled fish-liver over it, then grated goat's milk cheese, and long streams of treacle. They had lived on coffee and bread for so long they could not get enough "Melja," and Henry Rabben had to make more and more for them.

Lars was not yet a full-fledged Lofoten man; he was a "scaurie" until he stood treat. To save him embarrassment, his father gave him money to buy French brandy for all who came to the hut. Then he could hold up his head among the fishermen.

As the fishing slackened, the men began to wonder whether this would be a golden year after all. After weeks passed with no cod running, Kristàver listened to the inner voice that had led him right before; this time it told him to turn east. He spoke to Peter about it and then led his men silently down to the Seal at night to row away. As dawn came, they saw a host of boats coming out of harbors, all hurrying as though they had news of fish. Then they saw a whale spouting. Where there is a whale, there are herring; where there are herring, there are cod.

After the whale had been driven into a fjord, trouble began because the steamers came and blocked the entrance to keep the fishermen out. The fishermen, seeing shoals of fish just inside the fjord, were frantic to get them. The cod were gold just outside their reach. Men cannot stand back under such circumstances, and so they began to fight the men on the steamers. Driven back by streams of boiling water from hoses, the fishermen were about to give up when Kaneles swam under the steamer and came up on the other side to turn the hoses on the steamer men. Then the fight started all over the ships until the fishermen drove their little boats past the steamers. Soon the fjord was packed with boats. The fish were so thick that nets filled immediately, but the boats were so close that the nets fouled. Not until the next day, when the Inspector brought law into the fjord, could the fishermen pull in their nets. Then Arnt came into his own. He built a cabin on the shore so that Kristàver's men would not freeze while they slept at night. Elezeus was nearly frozen that first night and he never recovered, but Henry Rabben gave him the sacrament and he died in peace.

Sailing back to the fishing station, the Seal heeled over in a storm. Kaneles was knocked unconscious, but Kristàver held him while the others clung to the keel. Peter Suzansa, in the Sea-fire, was swept by them in the storm. Jacob Damnit-all-with-a-limp was able to tack around and drive his boat over the keel while his own men pulled in the survivors, all but Kaneles.

When his boat was recovered after the storm, Kristàver put his new mast four inches farther aft than it had been before. After that he was able to make her stand up. When he sailed home in the fair spring winds, he felt that she was a Viking ship and he a chieftain.

Critique:

Outside of Italy, Pirandello has been much better known for his dramas than for his novels, although his fiction has always been highly regarded in his native land. In this particular case, part of the plot of the novel was also used in a play, as the first part of the novel formed the basis for Pirandello's Sicilian comedy, Liola. When the novel appeared, some critics objected to it, saying that the action was impossible in terms of real life.

In 1921, Pirandello wrote a preface to the book in which he pointed out that a similar happening had actually occurred in Buffalo, New York, in that same year. He went on to state that it was his opinion this type of criticism should not be used in evaluating a work of the creative imagination; he said that the novel, like any other medium of art, dealt not with individuals but with mankind and all of the incidents and individuals which make up the total composite of man. He felt that the illusion of the present might very possibly be the reality of the future.

The Story:

As boys, Mattia Pascal and his brother Roberto lived an easy life with their wealthy widowed mother. While the boys were growing up, however, the fortune their merchant father had left them was gradually acquired by a dishonest man named Malagna, to whom the mother confided all her business affairs. One by one the farms and city property belonging to the Pascals were mortgaged and then sold. Everyone except the widow Pascal realized how dishonest Malagna was. Her confidence in her agent enabled him to rob her of everything over a period of many years.

When he was in his teens, Mattia Pascal fell in love with a beautiful young girl, Romilda Pescarone. Unfortunately for the affair, Malagna, whose two wives had failed to give him any children, had his eye on Romilda for himself. A bad situation developed when Romilda became pregnant; her mother, a termagant who seized any opportunity to improve her position, saw a chance to capitalize on the evil. She advised Romilda to take Malagna as her lover and let him think the child was his. The mother thought that he would be so happy to have his impotence seemingly disproved that he would at least make Romilda, her mother, and the child very comfortable.

Although Romilda told Malagna the truth, the two kept the whole affair a secret. Malagna's wife discovered, through Mattia Pascal, what had happened. In revenge on her husband, whom she had suspected of playing her false, she in turn became pregnant by Mattia. The husband, realizing what had happened as soon as his wife told him of her pregnancy, was furious. In his anger he refused to help Romilda, saying it was bad enough that he should be compelled to support one of Mattia Pascal's bastards. In a way the prospect pleased him, for the Pascal fortune he had stolen would now go eventually to Mattia's child by Malagna's wife.

Mattia and Romilda were married, but their marriage was a most unhappy one. Because Malagna had foreclosed on the last bit of property owned by the Pascals, the newlyweds and Mattia's mother were forced to move into the hovel owned by Romilda's mother. Mattia's aunt finally took pity on his mother and took her away, but Mattia, who was unable to find a job, and his wife continued to live with his shrewish mother-in-law. Their situation was relieved somewhat by Mattia's success in getting a political appointment as the caretaker of a municipal library in the town. The post was a sinecure; Mattia spent most of his time reading and catching rats that infested the place.

Mattia's mother and his child both died suddenly and within a day of one another. A few days after his mother's burial Mattia received several hundred lire from his brother, who had married into a rich family. The funeral expenses were already paid for and Mattia put the money away. One day he suddenly decided to travel. He took the money his brother had sent and went to Monte Carlo. There he won a fortune. Although he lost most of it again, he stopped playing after seeing the corpse of a destitute young gambler who had shot himself.

On his way home with the eighty-two thousand lire he had won, Mattia read in a newspaper an account of his death and burial. The people in his village, it appeared, had discovered a body some days after his secret departure, and his relatives had identified it as his. When the shock of the story wore off, Mattia realized how lucky he was: he had been released suddenly from an unhappy marriage and a mountain of debts; in addition, he had enough money in his pockets to live comfortably for many years.

Instead of going back to his native village, Mattia went to Rome and assumed a new identity. He shaved off his beard, had his hair cut shorter, and called himself Adriano Meis. The only part of his appearance he could not change was a crossed eye; to disguise that identifying characteristic, he began wearing dark glasses.

As Adriano Meis, Mattia rented a room in a private home and spent his days walking and reading. But he gradually discovered that his lack of a past was bothersome; he hated to live a literal lie. He discovered also that without an official record, any proof of identity, he was limited in his activities. He could not even buy a dog, lest he get into trouble in buying a license for it. At the same time he could not afford to have his real identity become known because he would be sent to prison for deserting his wife and evading his debts. Most discouraging of all, he fell in love with the daughter of his landlord, a girl named Adriana. He could not marry her, however, for he could not prove his own existence. His life was that of a shadow in the world of men.

The circumstance which finally convinced him that he could not go on masquerading as Adriano Meis was the theft of twelve thousand lire by his landlord's son-in-law. Everyone knew that the man had taken the money, but the victim was unable to go to the police, for fear they would investigate him and ask embarrassing questions. When he did not go to the police, everyone became suspicious, even the girl who loved him. Mattia took his money one evening and wandered
